Land Fraud Crackdown

FIVE YEARS AGO the AFL-CIO proposed to a congressional committee legislation designed to halt fraudulent interstate land sales. Last year the proposal was enacted as part of the Housing & Urban Development Act of 1968.

Last month the regulations required by the law went into effect under the supervision of HUD and another major piece of consumer protection legislation became operative.

The record is replete with widespread victimization of land purchasers, especially elderly persons looking for a retirement home. Local and national advertising containing misleading and often fraudulent descriptions of the properties offered for sale, hooked innocent victims.

Few groups were willing to take on the problem until the trade union movement decided that in the national interest legislation to keep land speculators from bilking unwary consumers was required.

With the law now on the books the job is to make sure that the fairly thorough HUD regulations are enforced and that the consumer is protected finally from the sharp practices of buy-by-mail land speculators.

The Green Carpet Treatment

A Word Edgewise:

School Decentralization Poses Trap for Unthinking Liberals

By John P. Roche

THERE IS PROBABLY no greater political trap awaiting the unwary liberal than the concept of "decentralization." In New York City, for example, there is a great brouhaha about decentralizing the schools.

The argument for it is that minority groups, Negroes and Puerto Ricans, have been educationally victimized by a vast, impersonal, white bureaucracy which has been busy committing "cultural genocide" by imposing "colonial" habits on the helpless children of the ghetto. This unfortunately has had overtones of anti-Semitism since, in Milton Himmelfarb's sharp phrase, "the merit system has been denounced as a Jewish conspiracy."

Several arguments are mixed up in this controversy. There are those who seem to think that New York City is Kenya, when in fact the Bureau of the Census estimated in 1965 that less than 20 percent of the city's population is Negro and less than 30 percent Negro, Puerto Rican, and miscellaneous "Spanish-Americans."

However, let us put this particular dispute aside and stick to the implications and probable consequences of school decentralization. Here we must begin with the proposition that centralization of schools, whether in rural or urban areas, has been the classic governmental technique for improving the level of education and, more important, for equalizing educational outlays.

In other words, centralization has been the instrument of reform, of taking taxes collected in wealthy sections and spreading their benefits in areas of poverty. And decentralization has been the battle cry of rich conservatives who want to keep their money close to home.

For example, this statement: "The citizens of Glen Park feel they don't benefit from being part of the city of Gary. We have no say in what the city does with our tax money and we feel it's time we had control of our own destiny." This is the traditional rationale for decentralization. In this case it is being used in Gary, Ind., to justify a breakaway by an overwhelmingly white, middle-class subdivision of the city.

The proponents of decentralization in New York go blithely on their way assuming, contrary to all the rules of American politics, that they can get both "community-controlled" schools in the slums and the existing financial blessings of centralization.

Norman Mailer, for example, has announced for mayor of New York on a program calling for the city to become a separate state and offering "complete autonomy" to the Negro ghettos.

As all of us who grew up without money can testify, the essential prerequisite for "autonomy" is a credit card. Who precisely is going to provide a credit card for Harlem or Bedford-Stuyvesant? The 70 plus percent of the city's population which is by and large neither poor nor black?

Indeed, "complete autonomy" for the ghettos is as reactionary a notion as one can imagine, one that would probably delight the hearts of right-wing racists.

THEY MIGHT EVEN be able to persuade "Mayor" Mailer to wall off the autonomous sections behind a "Black Power Barricade" so nothing could interfere with the exercise of "community power." The slogan would simply go: "We ask nothing from them; they ask nothing from us." It is, of course, a foundation for real "cultural genocide," or—in the case of those Negroes who advocate it—"cultural suicide."

In general political terms, it is clear that the Nixon Administration plans few head-on assaults against the social legislation of the past five years. But the Republicans may have devised a neat way of supporting the principles while eroding the substance: they will support, for example, aid to education but call for decentralized administration. (Block grants to the states are the first stage in the process of erosion.)

In practical terms, this undermines federal standards, gives the state governments a big bag to play with, and broadly speaking transfers power from the highly responsive federal officials to semi-invisible state bureaucrats. Nixon and the GOP have every right to try this—they did win the election—but it is wildly perverse if liberals, captivated by some vision of decentralized utopia, act as volunteer Republican advance men.

Error Called on Cronin:

Rhubarb Pops Up in Congress Over Thumbed-Out Umpires

THREE MEMBERS OF CONGRESS from New York are still battling for American Baseball League umpires Al Salerno and Bill Valentine, who were fired last September for advocating an umpires' union.

Senators Jacob Javits and Charles E. Goodell (R-N.Y.) and Rep. Alexander Pirnie (R-N.Y.) are pressing for resolution of their cases now.

The umpires were fired after they sent letters to their fellow American League umpires suggesting the formation of an American Baseball League Umpires Association similar to the National Baseball League Umpires Association.

American League Pres. Joe Cronin said that both umpires were dismissed on grounds of incompetency.

"If Salerno and Valentine are incompetent," Pirnie asked on the floor of the House recently, "what are the grounds for judging their incompetence?"

He wanted to know why they were not dismissed earlier—one had six years of seniority and the other seven—instead of three days after they proposed the union.

Pirnie said that baseball managers and writers have answered this question, including:

Al Dark, veteran American League manager: "I don't know the whole deal, but I'll tell you these guys were two pretty good umpires. I'll take both of them on the field every game and feel I'm going to get a good, honest, hustling effort—and that's all any manager can expect."

Dick Williams, manager Boston Red Sox: "I had several jams with them, but I consider both of them good umpires and I'd like to see them have their jobs back."

Shirley Povich, Washington Post: "When asked what qualifications his two unfrocked umpires lacked, Cronin said they were 'just inefficient, that's all.' To Cronin's credit, this was not a snap judgment. In Salerno's case, it took the AL president seven years to arrive at it; in Valentine's case, six years."

Red Smith, syndicated columnist: "If they were never good enough, as Cronin says, it took him a hell of a while to find out. Joe has to be one of the least perceptive or most indulgent employers this side of Utopia."

Since the two umpires were fired, American League umpires have joined the National League umpires group which was organized in 1963.

Offers have been made to Cronin to reinstate Salerno and Valentine on a provisional basis but he has rejected them. Then, through an intermediary, Cronin contacted Salerno and offered him a post as scout for umpires in the minor leagues. Salerno, wishing to continue his umpiring career, rejected the offer.

"How pungent could irony be?" Pirnie asked. "A man is told he is incompetent to umpire in the American League, yet he is told his incompetency qualifies him to scout for competent American League umpires."

SALERNO AND VALENTINE have filed their cases with the National Labor Relations Board. The case is pending before the regional office in Boston.

"Even assuming the NLRB hears their case," Pirnie said, "and decides favorably, a baseball season will probably have long since passed."

"Precedents in similar labor union organization cases do not offer good omens."

Pirnie said that "justice warrants and the image of baseball demands" that both men be immediately reinstated. (PAI).

Heads Unions' List:

Grievance Arbitration Termed Key GE-Westinghouse Issue

LACK OF AN ARBITRATION procedure to settle plant-level grievances is a constant source of irritation in the electrical manufacturing industry, said a spokesman for the 10-union group preparing contract talks with General Electric and Westinghouse.

An effective arbitration procedure will be a key union goal in the 1969 negotiations, said James D. Compton, chairman of the steering committee of the AFL-CIO Coordinated Bargaining Committee for General Electric and Westinghouse. The unions are convinced, he said, that "industrial peace is best achieved" through arbitration of grievances and it will head the unions' bargaining demands this year.

Another top priority issue in the negotiations will be wages, Compton stressed.

"We want to catch up with the cost of living, and we want to be sure that we are meeting the settlements that are being achieved in other industries," he added.

Compton cited both the auto and steel industries as areas where the coordinated bargaining team is looking to comparable wage scales.

Questioned by reporters on Labor News Conference, Compton said that cooperation among the unions is "exceptional" this year. "We stand as one group of cooperating unions," he said, exchanging information, sharing staff and working together to achieve major common contract goals. The public affairs interview is broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EDT, on the Mutual radio network.

Compton said the coordinated bargaining technique was first used in the electrical industry to counter the "divide and conquer" tactics used by the two electrical giants in dealing with individual unions. He said that by "splitting the unions apart," the companies had been able to make "inferior settlements."

Questionnaires have been distributed to the more than 200,000 workers in General Electric and Westinghouse, Compton said, asking them to rate the importance of the 10 major goals agreed to by delegates from the locals of all the international unions making up the Coordinated Bargaining Committee. He said that a series of grass roots meetings is now under way to explain the issues to the workers at the local level.

THE SURVEY of the 200,000 workers is expected to bring in many solid and knowledgeable answers, Compton said. And he promised that the coordinated bargaining committee would echo the will of the membership.

"It would certainly be a very obvious failure if we did not respond to their wishes after we asked them what they wanted," he observed.

Compton said that with refinements of techniques developed in the 1966 negotiations and since, "we believe that 1969 is going to be far more successful" and that the unions will be "far more unified" than ever this year.

He also noted that there have been a number of refinements in this year's coordinated bargaining operations over the 1966 efforts.

"We have refined our method of disseminating publicity, maintaining our contacts with all of our various affiliates and their local unions," Compton said.

Reporters questioning Compton, who is also assistant to the president of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, were Alan Adams of Business Week magazine, and Tom Coman of the Bureau of National Affairs.

THE IMPRESSIVE BIPARTISAN vote in the House Judiciary Committee (28 to 6) for a constitutional amendment for direct election of the President should not be interpreted as meaning that long-sought electoral reform is close at hand.

There remain a number of obstacles not the least of which is the fact that Pres. Nixon at first declined to endorse the proposal, urging rather a system for proportioning the electoral vote.

A constitutional amendment requires a two-thirds vote in both Houses. The overwhelming vote in the House committee was made possible when the ranking Republican, Rep. William M. McCulloch (R-Ohio), joined Committee Chairman Emanuel Celler (D-N.Y.) in strongly endorsing it.

The Senate poses far greater problems than the House which is largely made up of members elected under one-man, one-vote. Small states, which have a heavy impact under the present system of election of a President, also carry a strong voice in the Senate. They may well not want to change the system.

Sen. Birch Bayh (D-Ind.), chief sponsor in the Senate, expects the Senate Judiciary Committee to report the bill out favorably but says it will be "touch and go" on the floor. It will not be easy to secure a two-thirds vote.

The present strategy is to wait until the House acts in the hope that it will help to produce a sizable momentum which will change Senate votes.

Despite his reluctance to endorse the amendment initially, it now appears that the President will support a Congress-approved measure. However, it must be ratified by three-quarters or 38 of the 50 states by Jan. 20, 1971 to be effective for the 1972 presidential election.

A total of 29 state legislatures will meet in 1970. If they all ratify the amendment—which appears highly unlikely—it will still take an additional nine states to act prior to the Jan. 20 deadline in 1971.

THE PRIME HOPE would be that an urgent plea by the President might convince a number of governors to call special sessions of their legislatures in 1970.

If there is no strong appeal and equally strong response by the governors the earliest that the amendment—if it passes Congress—could be effective is the 1976 elections.

The key section of the committee-passed amendment states: "The people of the several states and the district constituting the seat of government of the United States shall elect the President and the Vice President."

Under the amendment, the candidate receiving the most popular votes, from whatever state, shall be elected. If no candidate receives 40 percent or more of the popular vote, the two top vote getters would compete in a runoff.

The present system provides that a presidential candidate who carries a state shall receive all of its electoral votes—even if the winner receives only a slender margin.

If no candidate receives a majority of the electoral vote the House of Representatives elects the President.

One reason for the great spur of activity for electoral reform is the scare received in 1968 when there was great fear that George Wallace would receive sufficient electoral votes to throw the election into the House. There were visions of a demigod, holding the balance of power and determining the outcome.

Three times in the last century—1824, 1876, and 1888—the man who received a majority of the electoral vote was denied the White House because of the strange workings of the Electoral College.

House Judiciary Committee Chairman Celler, however, said "the first bold step has been taken." It will take massive public pressure for the ultimate fruition to be realized.

EFFECTIVE ARBITRATION machinery is a key goal of the 10-union group preparing for contract talks in the electrical industry, said James D. Compton, center, chairman of the steering committee of the AFL-CIO Coordinated Bargaining Committee for General Electric and Westinghouse. He was questioned on Labor News Conference by Tom Coman, left, of the Bureau of National Affairs and Alan Adams of Business Week magazine.

THERE WEREN'T ENOUGH SEATS for all of the members of the National Council of Senior Citizens who came to hear panels of experts discuss "economics of aging" at hearings held by the Senate's Special Committee on Aging. Committee Chairman Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.) invited the elderly standees to sit on the steps between the witness table and the chairs that filled the rest of the hearing room. Social Security Commissioner Robert M. Ball, in the background at right, was testifying.

Trade Unions of 9 Countries Unite In Campaign for Gains at GE Plants

Bogota, Colombia—Unions from nine nations have pledged mutual assistance toward improving wages and working conditions for 400,000 employes of General Electric Co. around the globe.

They also appealed to GE to cease its efforts to "subjugate" workers and adopt policies that "recognize and respect fundamental trade union rights."

The pledge and the appeal came in a resolution adopted at the first world meeting of GE unions here. The two-day conference was sponsored by the Intl. Metalworkers' Federation's committee on multinational electrical and electronic companies.

Unions represented were from Argentina, Brazil, Colombia, France, Ireland, Italy, Venezuela, Mexico and the United States. AFL-CIO affiliates participating were Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Machinists, Steelworkers and Allied Industrial Workers.

Their delegates were: IUE—Pres. Paul Jennings, James Compton, George Collins and John Shambo; IBEW—Sec. Joseph D. Keenan and Paul Menger; IAM—Vice Pres. Gilbert Brunner; AIW—Research Dir. Donald Cagle; USWA—George Turner, staff representative.

The resolution called upon unions at GE plants around the world to cooperate through the IMF by collecting and distributing information on wages, working conditions, pensions, vacations, grievance procedures and health and safety programs.

It welcomed an earlier IMF decision to set up permanent working groups in various world companies and urged the federation's executive committee to extend its programs of organizational and educational cooperation to cover all GE workers.

"We believe," it added, "that this should include the coordination of moral and material support to unions engaged in strikes or conflicts or subject to employer reprisals or persecution."

The resolution expressed support for "the valiant efforts of GE workers, particularly in the developing countries of the world, to win and assure their right to organize and bargain collectively."

Attention was called to "the frequent violation of these trade union rights by multinational companies such as GE" in a number of countries, including Ireland, Colombia, Mexico and Uruguay.

Jennings, chairman of the IMF's committee, was among the conference speakers who stressed the theme of unity that emerged in the resolution.

"We must think internationally, just as the company does," Jennings said. "We must recognize that each problem we encounter has its counterpart in some other country, and we must find solutions that improve not only our own situation, but the situations of others."

He cited as an example of growing unity among world GE unions, the assistance from the United States, Canada and other countries to the Irish Transport & General Workers Union in its 1968 strike against GE.

This assistance, he pointed out, helped the Irish workers win union recognition and showed the company that an attack by it on one union is going to be answered by other GE unions, regardless of the country they are located in.

Jennings voiced a "feeling of shame" on the part of U.S. unions that a U.S. corporation—GE—exploits workers around the globe and pays them "miserably low wages."

The work of the conference included an exchange of reports on GE's financial structure, profits and policies, and the labor relations experiences unions have had with it.

Delegates took a break from sessions to walk a picket line as a display of "solidarity" for a Colombian union on strike against Olivetti Corp., a multinational company with close ties to GE.

Psychiatrists Join Service Employes

Oakland, Calif.—Concerned psychiatrists, psychologists and psychiatric social workers employed by Alameda County have joined the Service Employes in hopes that higher salaries will help them maintain their professional standards.

The 40 professionals are with the psychiatric clinic at Alameda County's Highland Hospital. Psychiatrists hold M.D. degrees; psychologists have Ph.D. degrees and social workers have masters' degrees.

Their salaries in Alameda County average 7.5 percent below other California metropolitan areas for like professional categories, SEIU Social Workers Local 535 reported.

Because of sub-standard salaries, the county has been unable to fill many psychiatric posts, the union noted, and the situation is expected to worsen this summer when mental health care services will be expanded.

3.5% in April:

Jobless Rate Rises For Second Month

workers held at the March level of 3.1 percent.

The jobless rate for adult women, which had held steady for five prior consecutive months, rose from 3.5 to 3.8 percent between March and April. The adult men's rate was 2 percent, up one-tenth of 1 percent. For full time workers the rate rose from 2.9 to 3.2 percent, and for blue-collar workers from 3.7 to 4.1 percent.

The teenagers' unemployment rate, 12.8 percent, showed little change over the month, after rising 1 percent between February and March.

Persons unemployed 15 weeks or longer totaled nearly 400,000 in April, seasonally adjusted. BLS observed that this measure of unemployment has risen by about 75,000 in 1969 after falling steadily in the last half of 1968.

On the jobs side, non-farm employment of 69.8 million in April was up by only 35,000 over March when seasonally adjusted. This was the smallest monthly gain since January 1968. It contrasts with an average monthly gain during the September-February period of 325,000.

The slow-down in employment growth occurred in both the goods and services sectors. Employment in the goods-producing industries dropped slightly in April, after showing no change in March. Jobs in the service-producing industries rose by 55,000, well below the average gains of the past six months.

Employment in contract construction declined by 25,000 seasonally adjusted from March to just over 3.4 million. The drop followed a decline in employment of 60,000 between February and March.

Manufacturing employment at 20.1 million in April was unchanged from March, making it the first month since September 1968 in which factory jobs have failed to increase significantly.

Employment in state and local government increased by 30,000 in April and jobs in finance, insurance and real estate were up by 16,000, making these the only two categories to show a significant increase for the month.

The civilian labor force declined by about 45,000, seasonally adjusted, between March and April to 80,450,000. The drop sharply contrasted with a steady growth in the labor force that has been averaging 400,000 a month since last October.

In another area, the Labor Dept. reported that the average hourly earnings of rank-and-file workers on non-farm payrolls rose by 1 cent in April to $2.99. Average weekly earnings were up 8 cents over the month to $112.13.

The seasonally adjusted workweek for all rank-and-file workers was unchanged in April at 37.8 hours. Increases in weekly hours in construction and mining were offset by declines in manufacturing, trade, and finance, insurance, and real estate.

The average workweek in manufacturing, at 40.7 hours, was down one-tenth of an hour from March. With the exception of February, when hours were affected by bad weather, the manufacturing workweek has remained relatively stable, fluctuating within a range of 40.6 and 40.8 hours.

Factory overtime fell by three-tenths of 1 hour to 3.4 hours in April, seasonally adjusted. The over-the-month reduction brought factory overtime hours to their lowest levels in about a year.

Continuity of Contracts in Mergers Pressed in Labor Brief to NLRB

An employer who takes over the business of another employer should be bound by the entire labor contract of his predecessor, the AFL-CIO argued in a brief filed with the National Labor Relations Board.

So should the incumbent union be bound by the existing contract for its full duration, the federation's legal counsel said in urging the board to follow the Supreme Court's ruling in a 1964 successorship case—Wiley and Sons v. Livingston, involving the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union.

The full five-member board heard oral arguments and received briefs in four unfair labor practice cases. In each case, unions filed charges, and the NLRB general counsel issued complaints that employers violated the labor law when they refused to honor contracts in effect at the time of merger or takeover.

The board will rule later in the four cases—Sheet Metal Workers Local 496 and Kota Div. of Dura Corp., a subsidiary of Walter Kidde & Co., Inc.; Hotel & Restaurant Locals 402 and 500 against Mission Valley Travelodge; Chemical Workers Local 773 and Hackney Iron & Steel Co.; William J. Burns Intl. Detective Agency, Inc., and Local 162 of the United Plant Guard Workers and Local 1, American Federation of Guards.

The issue in each case was whether the employer commits an unfair practice under the labor act when he fails to keep existing contract terms in effect on completion of a merger.

The NLRB counsel, and the unions, opposed employer arguments that the Wiley decision applies only to arbitration agreements and not to entire contracts.

The high court ruled in the Wiley case that "the disappearance by merger of a corporate employer" who holds a contract with a union "does not automatically terminate all rights" of the covered employes.

In "appropriate circumstances, present here," the court continued, "the successor employer may be required to arbitrate with the union under the agreement."

It would be illogical, counsel for the NLRB told the board, "to hold that the arbitration clause continues and the other clauses of the contract do not. . . . A successor stands in the shoes of the predecessor and is bound by the contract."

The AFL-CIO reminded the board that " the greatest wave of mergers in American history is now rolling through the economy."

It cited Federation Pres. George Meany's Apr. 1 testimony before the House Ways & Means Committee that "not only are the bigs taking over the smalls, but minnows are swallowing whales, and the bigs are merging with other bigs." The concern, Meany testified, is "not with large conglomerate corporations merely because they are large" but because of the effects—plant closedowns and impacts on collective bargaining and the local community.

The federation brief answered six questions on which the board asked labor, management and government to comment. It asked the NLRB to rule in the pending cases that a successor employer is bound by the entire labor contract of his predecessor, and so is the incumbent union; changed circumstances will call for flexible interpretation of the contract language; there is no rational reason to change the duration of the contract. The business community, it said, has found the Wiley decision's effects "quite manageable."

Meat Cutters Film Explains Boycott

Chicago—The Meat Cutters have released a union-made film, "Our Struggle in the South," to tell why labor is boycotting Frosty Morn, Valleydale and Reelfoot meat products wherever they are sold.

The 14-minute film, in color and sound, features union strikers at Neuhoff Co. plants in Clarksville, Tenn., struck a year ago, and Montgomery, Ala., on strike since last September. The movie is available without charge from the Meat Cutters education department, 2800 N. Sheridan Rd., Chicago, Ill.

The nationwide "Don't Buy" campaign has been endorsed by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and state central bodies in the South. The film concludes with the declaration of striker Howard Chester that the "low-wage habit," widespread in southern industry, must be broken by a united labor movement.

Administration Plan:

Farm Labor Board Proposed by Shultz

departmental negotiations.

Here is how Shultz explained it to the subcommittee:

First, he said, "I am here to support the right of farm workers" to union representation and collective bargaining.

But "a boycott directed against an employer's merchandise, designed to force that employer to sign a union contract . . . is not a satisfactory way to settle labor conflicts, especially those involving issues of representation."

The boycott reference was an obvious comment on the California table grape boycott, initiated by the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee and strongly supported by the labor movement.

If boycotts are to be prevented or prohibited, Shultz went on, there must be "an alternative" which provides both "an orderly answer" to the problem of union representation in the fields and "a satisfactory method for dealing with the possibility of strikes during the harvest season."

'Too Dissimilar'

Shultz said agriculture is too dissimilar to other industries to use the mechanism of the NLRB.

He opposed any type of pre-hire union representation agreement, such as that used in the construction industry, giving this argument: "Construction workers as distinguished from agricultural workers are largely organized and the craft representation lines are widely recognized. Agricultural workers, on the other hand, are largely unorganized and therefore employers should not be permitted to enter into collective bargaining agreements unless an election first indicates majority representation by the contracting union."

Without spelling out the legislative details, Shultz said labor-management relations on large farms should be "associated" with the National Labor Relations Act, but with special provisions and machinery.

The proposed Farm Labor Relations Board would have three members, its own general counsel and a full staff of trial examiners and regional directors comparable to that of the NLRB. But, Shultz stressed, its members and staff would be drawn from people familiar with the farm industry and would not be "bound by 34 years of industrial precedent established under the NLRB."

To an extent, the separate body parallels the recommendations of the anti-union Farm Bureau. The Farm Bureau, however, has asked also for a flat ban on strikes.

Jurisdiction of the Farm Labor Relations Board, Shultz said, would be confined to the large farms presently covered by the minimum wage provision of the Fair Labor Standards Act—about 2 percent of the nation's farms employing 45 percent of the nation's farm workers.

To deal with the harvest strike problem, Shultz advanced "the following steps as a suggestion and as a means of opening up discussion of the issue."

The law, he said, could require a 10-day notice of intent to strike or lock out workers. He added:

"At this point, the party threatened with a strike or lockout could prevent a disruption of work if that party is willing to accept the binding recommendations of a neutral."

Alternative to Strike

If a grower, for example, were served with a strike notice in July and the season when a strike would hurt him the most were in September, this is what he could do:

By declaring his willingness to accept the recommendations of a fact-finder, he could pick the month of September or any other 30-day period of his choosing for the fact-finding and mediation to take place.

During that period, the union could not strike. If it struck before then, its members would be obligated to return to work for the 30 days.

By the 25th day of the fact-finding period, the recommendation for settlement would be submitted to both parties. If the union accepted the proposal, the growers would be obligated to do likewise. But if the union turned it down, neither party would be under any obligations and the union could strike. By then, of course, the harvest would presumably be completed and the strike would have little impact.

"The fact-finder should be chosen by the parties from a list of five names selected by the Secretary of Agriculture," Shultz said.

In reply to questions, Shultz said he had no idea how much it would cost to set up a farm labor board structure such as the Administration was suggesting. But he said "we can make estimates" if congressional committees find the concept meritorious.

Nixon Names William Brown Head of EEOC

Pres. Nixon has named William H. Brown, a Philadelphia attorney and a Negro, to be chairman of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission following his confirmation by the Senate as a commission member.

Brown succeeds Clifford L. Alexander, Jr., who resigned the chairmanship, charging that the Administration was not vigorously enforcing civil rights laws. Alexander remains a member of the commission.

Brown's confirmation went through the Senate after GOP Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen withdrew earlier opposition. The nomination was approved by a voice vote with a few audible nays.

James E. Allen, another Nixon nominee who drew some opposition, was confirmed as U.S. Commissioner of Education by a 55 to 15 vote. The opposition came mainly from Sen. Strom S. Thurmond (R-S.C.) and Southern senators dissatisfied with Allen's stand for school busing where needed.

The Senate also confirmed Robert D. Moran, a Springfield, Mass., attorney and labor arbitrator, as the Labor Dept.'s new Wage-Hour Administrator.

LeRoy Upton Dead, IATSE Vice President

St. Louis, Mo.—LeRoy Upton, second vice president of the Theatrical Stage Employes, was buried here after services in St. Joan of Arc Church. He died after a long illness.

Upton had been a member of IATSE Local 6 since 1924 and was business agent prior to his election as an international vice president of the union in 1957. He was a member of the Institute of Radio Engineers and attended Hadley Technical School and the National Radio Institute.

NEW WAGE-HOUR legislation introduced by Rep. John H. Dent (D-Pa.) and Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.) has the labor movement's strong support, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller said at a Capitol Hill conference on the bill. Seated, facing the camera, are Pres. I. W. Abel of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky of the Clothing Workers, Dent and Williams.

Drive Opens For $2-Hour Minimum Pay

- Raise the minimum wage for workers in Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands by a sum equal to the increase for other workers.
- Bring all workers under the overtime provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act and pay overtime after eight hour in a day as well as 40 hours in a week.
- Close the loopholes which denied full hours or wage coverage to agricultural processing workers, seasonal recreation establishment employes, logging workers, taxi drivers, rail, pipeline and air carrier employes, transit workers and numerous other groups of workers.
- Tighten child labor provisions and raise the minimum age for hazardous farm work to 18.
- Repeal the provision which permits tips to be offset against the minimum wage.
- Allow the Secretary of Labor, as well as aggrieved employes, to bring suit to collect unpaid minimum wages or overtime compensation.

Taking part in the Capitol Hill announcement ceremony were I. W. Abel, president of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. and of the Steelworkers; Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky of the Clothing Workers; Pres. Louis Stulberg of the Ladies' Garment Workers; Pres. William Pollock of the Textile Workers Union of America; Sec.-Treas. Robert L. Diefenbach of the Hotel & Restaurant Employes, and top staff officials of the Service Employes, Meat Cutters, Retail Clerks and Communications Workers. A number of other unions also took part in the discussions leading up to the introduction of the bills.

Virginia Labor Upheld In Insurance Rate Case

Richmond—More than 1 million Virginia motorists may be in line for auto insurance rebates because the State AFL-CIO carried a case to Virginia's highest court—and won.

The landmark decision by the Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals upheld the state labor federation and a group of liberal members of the legislature who fought a 1967 increase in automobile liability insurance.

Virginia's regulatory agency, the State Corporation Commission, approved an 8.2 percent rate hike based on claims by insurance companies that they were losing money at existing rates. It followed the same guidelines in determining profit-and-loss that it had over the years.

The State AFL-CIO argued in vain before the commission that earnings from investment of loss reserve funds should be included in determining whether the companies were entitled to a higher premium.

This is the money the insurance firms set aside to meet claims. By investing it, the companies earn additional income.

Not only didn't the state commission consider this investment revenue, the State AFL-CIO noted, but it also refused to require the companies to furnish information on their actual operating costs in the state. Instead it accepted a nationwide average as a basis for determining expenses.

During the commission hearings, AFL-CIO Atty. George W. Shadoan, State Sen. Henry E. Howell and others opposing the rate increase were repeatedly rebuffed in their efforts to challenge the need for higher rates.

They made their points before the state Supreme Court, however, and the judges ordered the regulatory commission to hold new hearings which would take into account all of the insurance companies' income and its actual operating expenses in the state.

The State AFL-CIO has urged the commission to order the insurance companies to rebate 8.2 percent of all premiums collected since the 1967 rate ruling.

Julian F. Carper, president of the state labor body, said prompt refund of the increase and a return to the pre-1967 rates is "the least we should expect." The regulatory agency has not indicated what its next step will be.

Report Urges Transfer of Rights Agency

A report prepared for the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights recommends a reorganization of the federal equal employment opportunity programs.

It proposes to shift the Office of Federal Contract Compliance from the Labor Dept. to the government's Equal Employment Opportunity Commission and asks "more determined application of sanctions" against federal contractors who fail to comply with a presidential Executive Order prohibiting discrimination.

The contract compliance office investigates civil rights compliance of companies that do business with the federal government. The EEOC has overall responsibility for enforcement of the equal employment provisions of the Civil Rights Act.

The report was prepared by the Brookings Institution but its criticism of federal contract compliance enforcement is endorsed in a cover letter by the acting staff director of the Civil Rights Commission, Howard A. Glickstein.

"It is the judgment of the commission," Glickstein wrote, "that by continuing to contract with employers who practice discrimination, the federal government not only fails to use a powerful, readily available mechanism to help end discrimination in private employment, but in addition spends public funds actually to subsidize such discrimination."

The Civil Rights Commission is a bipartisan, fact-finding agency set up by Congress in 1957, before passage of major civil rights legislation.

Workers Asked to Spend 18 Cents for Tax Justice

A new AFL-CIO pamphlet outlines the tax loopholes for the rich that take money from the paychecks of wage earners and sets forth the federation's tax reform program in clear, concise terms.

Plugging the loopholes, which cost the federal government about $16 billion annually, the pamphlet points out, would provide revenue to make taxes fairer and funds to finance urgently needed programs.

Special interest lobbyists "are doing everything they can to block meaningful reform," the pamphlet notes, adding: "It will take a mighty outpouring of public indignation to counteract their influence."

Union members are told they can join the "outpouring" for a mere 18-cent investment—the postage needed by a worker to write his congressman and two senators.

The pamphlet, We Want Tax Justice, is available from the AFL-CIO Pamphlet Division, 815 Sixteenth St., N.W., Washington, D. C. 20006.

$1 Billion Expansion:

Nixon Asks Step-Up In Attack on Hunger

Pres. Nixon, under pressure for a stronger drive to eliminate hunger in America, has called for an expansion of the government's food programs for the poor.

In a message to Congress, Nixon estimated that his proposed expansion would cost $2.5 billion a year when in full operation in 1971, up from the $1.5 billion he requested for fiscal 1970 food programs.

To get the program started "sometime after the beginning of the calendar year 1970," the President said $274 million would be trimmed from other fiscal 1970 budget requests and added to food assistance programs.

Daniel Patrick Moynihan, assistant to the President for urban affairs, was unable to say where the money would come from but promised it would not be taken from any "poverty-related program."

Nixon recommended major revisions in the food stamp program, the key element in federal anti-hunger efforts, as well as some changes in direct food distribution programs.

Under the food stamp program poor families who qualify are now entitled to buy stamps that are worth more than their cost in buying groceries. The price discount is based on family size and income.

The President proposed that each family taking part in the program should get enough stamps to provide what the Dept. of Agriculture considers a nutritionally complete diet. This is not now the case.

For example, at present a family of four with an income of $20 a month or less can purchase for $2 stamps redeemable for $60. The department says a complete diet for this family would cost $100.

A second proposal would offer stamps free to those in "the very low income brackets." These were later described as persons who received less than $30 a month. A number of members of Congress have called for a higher cutoff point.

Other Nixon proposals called for blending the stamp program with a revised welfare system he expects to propose later and permitting both stamps and direct food distribution in the same counties.

At present, the jurisdiction must choose either the stamps or the direct distribution of food packages, not both.

Nixon also announced the establishment of a "pilot program" through which needy women would be issued "vouchers" redeemable for infant foods and special foods to prevent malnutrition in pregnancy.

In other areas of his message, the President said he would shortly announce a White House conference on food and nutrition and he directed the Urban Affairs Council to consider setting up a new Food & Nutrition Service to administer food programs.

He also asked the Secretary of Health, Education & Welfare and the director of the Office of Economic Opportunity "to take a number of steps" to enlarge research into malnutrition and expand their activities in combating it.

"The moment is at hand to put an end to hunger in America itself for all time," Nixon said.

Social Ills Stressed As Basic Handicaps

The nation has passed the halfway mark in its program of finding jobs for the handicapped and should now concentrate on overcoming the job disabilities caused by substandard social conditions. AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler stressed this theme as he addressed the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped at its annual conference in Washington.

Labor is "pleased because much progress has been made" in training and finding jobs for the handicapped, and is ready to help in seeing that much more is done, Schnitzler reported.

He said it is no longer possible to "escape the conclusion that substandard social conditions have a great bearing on disabilities. For if disabilities can be prevented, fewer handicapped persons will need help" in finding employment.

Schnitzler said "I am referring to the handicaps of poverty, poor environment and lack of adequate medical and psychological care."

A recent health survey commissioned by Blue Cross showed, he said, that the incidence of heart disease in poor areas was four times as great as in average areas, six times greater for nervous and mental disorders, eight times higher for visual defects, three times higher for orthopedic defects.

Labor participation in the two-day conference included an AFL-CIO co-sponsored luncheon for state winners of the 1969 "Ability Counts" essay contest for high school writers, a tour of the city for the students sponsored by the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; a luncheon at the Capitol sponsored by the federation's Building & Construction Trades Dept.; and a reception at which IBEW members and their ladies were hosts.

Kathy Saxton, 17, of Bonneville High School in Ogden, Utah, won the $1,000 first place award of the Disabled American Veterans in the "Ability Counts" contest. Other top winners were Janey Looney of Lake Charles, La., $600; John Muessel of Madison, Ind., $400; Christina Fredet, Springville, Me., $300, and Lucy Sikes, Murfreesboro, Tenn., $200.

The prizes were presented by Schnitzler and IBEW Pres.-emeritus Gordon M. Freeman. Expenses of first place winners in 47 states, the Virgin Islands and the District of Columbia were contributed by AFL-CIO state federations.

Besides Schnitzler, principal conference speakers were Labor Sec. George P. Shultz; Board Chairman Louis C. Lustenberger of the W. T. Grant Co. stores; Mrs. Elizabeth Koontz, new Women's Bureau director; Sen. Robert J. Dole (R-Kan.), and Mrs. Rene Carpenter of the NBC-TV "Today" show.

Shultz asked the conference to seek answers to questions like these: Why must people be compelled to work eight hours a day? Why can't jobs be redesigned for handicapped persons? Why can't jobs be matched to the personality of the worker?

The conference gave its Distinguished Service award to William Passmore, double hip amputee and antipoverty worker in East Chicago, Ind.; Rep. Charles E. Bennett (D-Fla.), and Stevie Wonder, blind singer from Detroit.

A special award of appreciation was voted by the committee to former Vice Pres. and Mrs. Hubert H. Humphrey for their joint efforts on behalf of the handicapped. Irving Geist of New York City was cited for his years of support for rehabilitation work.

Insurance Men Map Growth, Increase Dues

Miami Beach—Delegates to the Insurance Workers convention here approved a "program of expansion" and voted a higher dues structure to carry it out.

IWIU Pres. William A. Gillen said 95 percent of the union's 25,000 members are debit insurance agents. The target in the new campaign, he indicated, will be insurance adjusters, clerical personnel and other insurance company employes.

The 350 delegates re-elected Gillen, Sec.-Treas. Charles Heisel and other incumbent officers over a slate of opposition candidates. They also approved a $1 dues increase, to be divided equally between the international union and the locals.

To carry out its organizing drive, Gillen said, both the field and headquarters staff will be expanded.

Delegates were told that their union's organizing efforts for some time have been concentrated on Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. offices. Of 76 elections at Metropolitan, Gillen said, the IWIU has won 61.

He told the delegates that now "we must fill the holes in our operation. We must branch out into new fields in our jurisdiction."

Heisel told the convention that "excessive" turnover of employes is one of the pressing problems of the insurance industry. The union is working towards reducing the turnover, he noted, by improving conditions of employment and encouraging stability and professionalism.

Plumbing Firms Found Guilty of Price-Fixing

Pittsburgh—The federal government has won a price-fixing conviction here that could bring civil suits seeking billions of dollars in damages against the nation's largest manufacturers of plumbing fixtures.

"This case," a Justice Dept. attorney commented, "makes all the other price-fixing cases seem pale by comparison."

Convicted by a U.S. District Court jury after five hours of deliberation were Borg-Warner Corp., Chicago; American Standard Corp., New York; the Kohler Co., Kohler, Wis.; two American Standard executives—Joseph P. Decker and Daniel J. Quinn and Norman R. Held, a Kohler executive.

They were found guilty of fixing the prices on such fixtures as bathtubs, toilets and sinks during a four-year period between September 1962 and the date of the government's indictments, Oct. 6, 1966.

U.S. District Judge Louis Rosenberg ordered an investigation before sentencing the defendants. He could hand out maximum fines of $50,000 to each defendant and maximum prison sentences of one year to each individual.

The defendants, who announced they would appeal the conviction, were the last of 15 corporations and eight executives indicted.

When the 12 other corporations and five of their executives entered no contest pleas last year, Judge Rosenberg levied fines totaling $370,000 and imposed jail sentences on four of the executives.

The government said that the price-fixing involved about $1 billion in sales—or about 98 percent of the enameled cast iron plumbing fixtures and 80 percent of the vitreous plumbing fixtures sold in the United States during the four-year period.

In describing the scope of the case, a government official estimated that more than 300 private triple-damage anti-trust suits have been filed against the plumbing manufacturers as a result of the government's case.

The suits have been filed by almost every state, many cities and numerous private builders.

support his family. During World War I, he worked in ammunition factories in the Newark area and in 1920 got his first job in a bakery.

In 1924 Schnitzler became a member of Local 84 of the Bakery & Confectionery Workers and was soon active in his local union.

Schnitzler's rise in his union was swift and steady. He was a general representative, second vice president and financial secretary. In 1946, he was elected to the newly created post of general secretary-treasurer and was chosen as president in March 1950.

On Nov. 25, 1952, Schnitzler became secretary-treasurer of the AFL, replacing Meany who had been chosen as president to succeed the late William Green.

On Dec. 5, 1955, Schnitzler was unanimously elected the first secretary-treasurer of the AFL-CIO. He was unanimously re-elected at each succeeding convention.

He is married to the former Edith Eckhart. They have two children.

Surtax Extension Opposed Until Tied to 'Tax Justice'

800 Trade Views On Bargaining

By David L. Perlman

New York—Union and management negotiators who face each other across the bargaining table sat side by side here during a two-day Collective Bargaining Forum.

They were joined by public officials, arbitrators, university professors invited to take part in the exchange of views sponsored by the Institute of Collective Bargaining & Group Relations—a pioneering endeavor supported by both labor and management. In all, there were some 800 participants.

This first of what is scheduled to be an annual forum saw the president of the AFL-CIO and the chairman of the industrial relations committee of the National Association of Manufacturers share the same speaker's podium.

The president of New York's Commerce & Industry Association introduced the president of the Machinists. And the chairman of the National Labor Relations Board moderated a panel discussion by labor and management lawyers on NLRB decisions and policies.

It wasn't the millenium. Disagreements were sharp. Just about every management spokesman worked in a reference to the great danger to the country of "inflationary" wage increases.

But underlying the conflict of views was the premise which led to the convening of the conference—"a belief that there is no viable alternative to collective bargaining for the settlements of disputes be-

CONGRATULATIONS FROM Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler and Pres. George Meany are extended to Lane Kirkland, right, who was elected by the Executive Council to fill out the term of Schnitzler who is retiring as of June 30, 1969.

AFL-CIO Secretary-Treasurer:

Kirkland Elected to Succeed Schnitzler

The AFL-CIO Executive Council elected Lane Kirkland secretary-treasurer of the federation as of July 1, 1969, to fill out the term of William F. Schnitzler who will retire at the end of June.

The council accepted "with deepest regret" Schnitzler's decision to retire and said it looked forward to "his continuing advice and counsel as secretary-treasurer emeritus."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, in announcing the election of Kirkland to a press conference, said there were no other nominees for the post. Kirkland has served as executive assistant to the president of the AFL-CIO since 1960.

The council resolution on Schnitzler hailed him as "friend and colleague, trade union leader and distinguished American," and reviewed his long service to the AFL-CIO and the trade union movement. Schnitzler has been AFL-CIO secretary-treasurer since the founding of the organization in December 1955.

The retiring secretary-treasurer spoke briefly at the press conference saying he was looking forward to retirement at 65, a decision that was entirely his own, and of his pride in years of serving with Meany as one of the executive officers of the federation.

Kirkland, 47, a native of Camden, S.C., and a member of the Masters, Mates & Pilots, served as a maritime officer after graduation from the U.S. Merchant Marine Academy in 1942. He joined the

Boggs Succeeds Gritta As Metal Trades Head

The resignation of B. A. Gritta as president of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. was announced by the department's executive council, which named Maywood Boggs of the Boilermakers as his successor.

The announcement said that Gritta, after more than 20 years of service to the Metal Trades Dept., had tendered his resignation May 9 and retired as president, due to health problems. He was designated president emeritus of the department.

Boggs, who lives in Richmond, Va., and is a vice president of his union, will assume his new office July 1.

Gritta, who has been a member of the Sheet Metal Workers for 43 years, served the labor movement actively most of his working life, the council noted.

After more than 20 years of work at his trade, he was appointed general Metal Trades Dept.

Council Demands Action on Reform

By Saul Miller

The AFL-CIO "will not support any extension of the surtax until it is combined with immediate, substantial and equitable reform of the federal income tax structure," the federation's Executive Council declared here.

At its two-day spring meeting in Washington, the council strongly reaffirmed the AFL-CIO proposals for tax justice presented to Congress by Federation Pres. George Meany and said there is "no rational reason for lengthy delays. The time to bring the American standard of fair play into the tax structure is now."

The council moved also to throw its full support to four critical strikes and disputes across the nation—the hospital workers at Charleston, S.C., the state road workers in West Virginia, the continuing grape workers' struggle in California and the Oil Workers' Shell boycott.

It declared, in a statement on the ABM controversy, that Pres. Nixon should be supported as commander-in-chief in fulfilling his duty to determine the most effective way of meeting the nation's vital defense needs. (Story, Page 3.)

And it voiced its readiness to discuss "with any responsible authority" of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions "the restoration of free world labor unity" in terms of the reasons that led to the AFL-CIO's withdrawal. (Story, Page 2.)

The council accepted the decision of Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler to retire as of June 30, 1969, and elected Lane Kirkland, executive assistant to Meany, to fill out the term until the next convention in October 1969. (Story this page.)

It approved also a report by a council committee to propose to the next convention that the number of vice presidents and council members be expanded from 27 to 33. If the convention approves the change, six additional vice presidents will be elected in October.

In its tax statement, the council took note of Pres. Nixon's tax program, including extension of the 10 percent surtax beyond its June 30 termination date and other proposals for tax reform. It welcomed the President's recommendation for repeal of the 7 percent tax credit for business investment, but said "this one proposal does not satisfy the long overdue and critically urgent need for tax justice." (Text, Page 6.)

Building Trades Launch Major Legislative Drive

Nearly 3,000 national, state and local union leaders launched a major legislative drive by the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

Their goal: action by Congress on a program covering both bread-and-butter trade union issues and broad-ranging measures to meet the nation's overall needs.

Three Cabinet members and top congressional leaders of both parties came to the opening and closing sessions of the four-day conference.

And for two days, the BCTD delegates visited on Capitol Hill with the congressmen and senators from their home states—presenting, explaining and urging labor's legislative goals.

Before they returned home, delegates turned in "report cards" on their congressional visits. The attitudes shown by congressmen and senators to the labor-supported bills will be a guide to union legislative representatives in mapping strategy and priorities.

Delegates talked to their legislators about the on-site picketing bill, about job safety legislation, about extension of the Davis-Bacon Act representative in 1949, and a year later was elected secretary-treasurer of the department.

Gritta became president of the department in 1962 and was re-elected at 1963 and 1967 conventions.

Boggs is a native of Goochland County, Va. He has been a Boilermakers' vice president since 1956. Before that he had been on the international staff of his union since 1941, except for a period of nearly two years when he served the War Production Board as a special assistant to the director of the Office of War Utilities.

Started in Texas

Gritta, a native of New York state, served his apprenticeship in Galveston, Tex. He held several supervisory and management positions in the sheet metal industry in Texas, and served as commissioner of the Galveston Housing Authority from 1940 to 1948, including two terms as chairman.

Later he was elected business agent for his union, and also served the Metal Trades Council, the Building & Construction Trades Council and the Galveston central labor body. Before his appointment to the Metal Trades Dept. staff in Washington, Gritta was executive secretary of the Texas Building & Construction Trades Council.

Until his retirement, Gritta was a member of the Navy Wage Committee for several years, and also served these additional organizations:

The AFL-CIO Committee on Safety & Occupational Health, AFL-CIO Committee on Social Security, AFL-CIO Committee on Education, Technical Advisory Committee for the President's Conference on Occupational Safety, Defense Orientation Conference Association, AFL-CIO Peace Corps Volunteer Committee, National Labor-Management Manpower Policy Committee, National Wage Policy Committee of the Coordinated Federal Wage System, and the Dept. of Defense Wage Committee.

RETIRING PRES. B. A. Gritta of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. will be succeeded July 1 by Maywood Boggs, right. Gritta asked to be relieved for health reasons after 20 years of department service, including seven years as president. Boggs has been a Boilermakers' vice president since 1956.

Grape Strikers Hailed, Boycott Drive Pressed

The need for total support of the United Farm Workers is greater than ever before, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared in calling on every affiliate, every officer and every union member "to accept this struggle as a struggle of all trade unionists."

"More than anything else, this means the recognition and total support of the boycott against table grapes," the council said in a statement reviewing the career of "this, the youngest member" of the AFL-CIO family.

The statement noted that "after almost four long and trying years of striking and boycotting" to build their union, the stamina and courage of UFWOC officers and members "continues to amaze America and to inspire trade unionists throughout the nation."

The reward for this effort has been the winning of 11 contracts "and the establishment therein of levels of dignity and security for field laborers never before attained."

Yet that segment of the industry which produces fresh table grapes in California and Arizona vineyards "continues to pursue its backward policies and to bitterly oppose the workers' organizational efforts," the statement asserted.

Many growers were discovered by the Labor Dept. recently to have sponsored and financed an artificial "union" to discredit and destroy the legitimate union led by Cesar Chavez, the council said. In addition they engaged two nationally prominent public relation-advertising agencies "to promote their image and destroy the UFWOC." It added:

'The Great Cause'

"The great cause of the farm workers . . . remains among the most just and meritorious in the history of American labor.

"These workers and this crusade have stirred the conscience and aroused the sympathy of decent-thinking people throughout the world.

"AFL-CIO takes pride in having pioneered in this effort and in having continued as a strong and constant supporter of the farm worker. Never has there been an issue so universally joined in by the family of AFL-CIO."

Forego Differences

The statement related that even labor organizations outside the AFL-CIO "find the 'common cause' character of this struggle so overwhelming that they are able to forego other differences" to assist the struggling union.

The federation is "appreciative of every effort in the national community, both within and outside the ranks of organized labor, for all acts . . . which aid the AFL-CIO Farm Workers," the statement declared.

While some UFWOC members walk boycott picket lines, the council pointed out that "others are walking the highway from Coachella, Calif., to Calexico, on the Mexican-U.S. border, in a demonstration designed to enlist the sympathy and support of the 'green card' commuters who have broken previous strikes." The cross-border commuters are being used by grape growers, who refuse to recognize the union, as strikebreakers.

Council Details Position On ICFTU Relationship

The AFL-CIO is ready to discuss with any responsible authority of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions "the restoration of free world labor unity," but such discussions must be conducted in terms of the reasons that led to the AFL-CIO's withdrawal.

That was the position laid out by the federation's Executive Council in a statement on the relationships between the AFL-CIO and the ICFTU. The statement details on a step-by-step basis the actions of the ICFTU and its general secretary, Harm G. Buiter, that led to the withdrawal.

The statement documents the activities of Buiter in seeking to gain admission for the Auto Workers—who disaffiliated from the AFL-CIO—into the ICFTU.

The council strongly reaffirmed its earlier position, declaring that it is "impermissible and self-defeating for the ICFTU as a world organization to seek or accept the affiliation of any breakaway organization that is trying to split any one of its affiliated national trade union centers."

The AFL-CIO was a founding member of the ICFTU, the council pointed out, was deeply involved in its activities for 19 years and the decision to leave "was not taken lightly or without careful consideration."

The council said it wished the ICFTU well despite the AFL-CIO leaving the organization and pledged to continue to work for "those ideals and aims which brought together the free trade unionists of the world to found the ICFTU."

The ICFTU, the council warned, must never become an "international haven for splitters of its affiliated national trade union centers," and the assistance given by some top officers of the ICFTU to the UAW to become an affiliate of the world organization "is a grave violation of this principle."

The statement cited numerous instances in which Buiter violated the ICFTU constitution and the general regulations governing its procedures, especially on admission of affiliates.

Attempts have been made to confuse the issue of admitting breakaway, secessionist organizations such as the UAW, but a careful examination shows that there is no precedent for the UAW application or its consideration, the statement said.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council voted at its February 1969 meeting to withdraw from the ICFTU.

UTW Wins Election At Canadian Mill

Iroquois, Ont.—The United Textile Workers won bargaining rights for more than 400 employes of Caldwell Linen Mills here in an election conducted by the Ontario Labor Relations Board. The vote was 244 for UTWA, 135 for the unaffiliated Union of District 50, which had represented the workers for 10 years.

$25,000 Contribution:

AFL-CIO Votes Aid To Hospital Strikers

The AFL-CIO gave its full support to striking Charleston, S.C., hospital workers by establishing a strike fund, voting a contribution of $25,000, and urging all affiliated unions to contribute generously to help the strikers.

Affirming a pledge made earlier by federation Pres. George Meany, the Executive Council said "the AFL-CIO has fully supported, and will continue to support," the struggle of hospital aides in the South Carolina city "to win decent wages and working conditions, and a sense of their own dignity and worth as first class citizens in their own community."

Some 600 workers, whose strike has persisted against the relentless opposition of the state's governor, are "seeking to accomplish" their modest aims by organizing into Local 1199B of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, the council statement noted. It continued:

"Because they have no other recourse to win union recognition and to bargain collectively, the hospital workers were compelled to strike.

"For nearly two months now they have marched on the picket lines, where they have been joined by their fellow unionists, by civil rights leaders from other parts of the country, and by a growing number of citizens of Charleston—white as well as black."

Hope for Success

This evidence of cooperation among community forces, civil rights organizations and labor holds out hope, the council declared, for "success in the AFL-CIO's effort to organize the lowest paid and most exploited people in our society."

The council said it is "determined to do everything in the power of the AFL-CIO to help win this most important struggle." It declared confidence that "with the kind of unity that has been demonstrated in Charleston, the effort to achieve the basic economic and human rights of these working people must succeed."

To implement this pledge, it concluded, "we today establish with a $25,000 contribution the AFL-CIO Charleston Hospital Strike Fund and urge all affiliates to contribute generously to help the strikers."

Strikers cheered the news on the picket lines and en route to the daily confrontations they have had with militia, state police and sheriffs. The uniformed forces have drawn a ring of steel, including bayonets and troop carriers, around the two hospitals whose lowest-paid workers are striking for union recognition—the state-owned Medical College Hospital and the locally-operated County Hospital.

Hospital authorities are reported ready to meet with the strikers as city officials have done, but Gov. Robert E. McNair (D) has refused to agree. The New York Times reported May 10 that "a settlement could be reached if the governor would move even slightly from his adamant position against negotiations . . . or recognition" of the union.

A public rally in support of the strikers, May 11, drew a throng of more than 14,000, many of whom came from distant points in the East, South and Midwest.

Dir. Cesar Chavez of the United Farm Workers Committee sent a $100 contribution from the union along with "warm fraternal greetings" to Local 1199B Pres. Mary Moultrie from farm workers "striking and boycotting for nearly four years to gain social and economic justice for the impoverished field laborers of this nation."

"Do not despair. Keep your spirits high," the message said. "We too are poor, but as you are learning today, the impoverished and depressed workers are really not forgotten as long as the good people in organized labor, in the churches and the civil rights movement join, as they are doing for you and for us, in these great crusades for human justice."

The rally also heard a message of support from AFL-CIO Dir. of Organization William L. Kircher and others, including five members of Congress and New York City's Deputy Mayor Timothy Costello.

Boycott Pressed Against Shell Oil

The AFL-CIO Executive Council called on the entire labor movement to support the Shell Oil boycott and urged "all Americans who believe in the right of workers to fair and decent treatment" from their employers to return Shell credit cards to the company at P.O. Box 80, Tulsa, Okla.

The council noted "with satisfaction" that thousands of buyers have returned their cards to Shell, the only major oil firm to refuse an acceptable settlement with the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers in 1969 contract talks.

"The battle is not over," the council said. "We will not be satisfied until Shell agrees to a fair and just settlement."

From 1953 to 1958 he served as assistant director of the AFL and AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security. In 1958 he became director of research and education of the Operating Engineers, returning to the AFL-CIO in 1960 to become executive assistant to Meany.

He is president of the Institute of Collective Bargaining & Group Relations, a director of the American Foundation on Automation & Employment, a board member of Community Health, Inc., and a member of the U.S. Merchant Marine Academy Advisory Board. He serves also as a fellow of the American Public Health Association and of the American Association for the Advancement of Science.

Earlier he had served as a member of the Federal Hospital Council, adviser to world maritime conferences, on the Missile Sites Labor Commission and the President's Maritime Advisory Committee.

Council Demands 'Tax Justice' Action

Ties Surtax Stand To Basic Reforms

Of the President's other proposals, the council said they "would not succeed in moving the tax structure very far toward tax justice" and that they fail to directly attack the "major loopholes which unconscionably reduce the tax burdens on the wealthy." The President's program, the council further pointed out, provides "no relief" for those of moderate and middle income, who bear the brunt of the tax burden."

Support for Strikers

In statements adopted on the four labor disputes the council:

- Affirmed its full support of the strike of hospital workers at Charleston, S.C., voted $25,000 to assist the strikers and called on all affiliated unions to contribute generously. (Story, Page 2.)
- Backed the strike of state road workers in West Virginia for recognition and good faith bargaining and voted $10,000 to help them in their struggle. (Story this page.)
- Renewed its call to all union members to make the struggle of the grape workers in California their own with complete support of the boycott against table grapes. (Story, Page 2.)
- Urged stepped-up help of the Shell boycott to aid the Oil Workers win fair and decent treatment from the company. (Story, Page 2.)

The council also received a report from Pres. P. L. Siemiller of the Machinists on the serious threat to carrier flight safety at National Airlines due to the lockout and firing of more than 1,000 union mechanics.

The report of the committee on the structure of the Executive Council declared that the federation, through membership on the council, "should be in a position to recognize new areas of real or potential growth and significance in the development of trade unionism, and to extend to a wider segment of the leadership of affiliated unions the opportunity for greater service to the membership of the labor movement at large."

The most practical way to accomplish this objective, it said, is to enlarge the council from 27 to 33 vice presidents.

At three press conferences during the two-day meeting Meany told reporters:

He has responded to a request from British Trades Union Congress leaders to discuss the situation informally with ICFTU leaders and others during the conference of the Intl. Labor Organization in June in Geneva. Meany and a number of council members will be attending the ILO conference.

The AFL-CIO can "under no circumstances" accept the proposals for farm workers' collective bargaining presented by Labor Sec. George Shultz to Congress on behalf of the Administration. Meany said he will spell out his objections in detailed testimony that he will present on May 16.

It is "a little too early" to pass judgment on the Nixon Administration overall, that it is proceeding cautiously, "maybe too cautiously" in some areas. The current meeting at the White House of the President with the entire Executive Council was a very good session, Meany said, as were the sessions of the AFL-CIO Economic Policy Committee recently with leaders of the Administration on economic policy problems.

The federation's Economic Policy Committee is conducting an in-depth study of the Mexican border runaway plant problem along with other problems of the "export of American jobs."

Pres. Nixon's speech on Viet Nam was a very sober talk that presented the "facts squarely" and was pretty much the same fundamental position taken by Pres. Johnson.

Meany reported also that the council had voted to renew its support of the A. Philip Randolph Institute with an appropriation of $2,000 a month for the next 12 months.

The next meeting of the council was set for Aug. 7-8 in New York City.

Support Pledged Nixon On 'Vital Defense Needs'

Pres. Nixon should be supported as commander-in-chief in fulfilling his duty to determine the most effective way of meeting the vital defense needs of the nation, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

The council adopted a statement on the current controversy over the adoption of the Safeguard ABM system declaring that it "does not join in any debate over how effective the proposed ABM system will actually be in action."

It pointed out, however, that "this nation must at least endeavor to protect enough of our deterent force to enable our country to discourage any potential enemy from initiating a nuclear assault against the American people."

Because of these circumstances, the council added, the President "should be supported in fulfilling his duty to determine—in consultation with scientists, military experts, the Congress and other constitutionally appropriate authorities"—the best way of meeting the nation's defense problems.

The statement declared that "while we recognize that there can be honest differences of opinion over a particular method of assuring maximum security for our country, we emphasize that there can never be a good argument for our country's not assuring itself the best available national defense."

Since its founding, the council said, the AFL-CIO has "never joined in attacks upon the efforts of any Administration to carry out this solemn responsibility" of providing a strong national defense, and "we shall not do so now."

The objective of meeting the pressing social and economic problems facing the country should not be regarded as precluding the need for a strong defense because "both are essential to the security and progress of the nation," the council stressed.

The AFL-CIO, the statement pointed out, is "awake to the grim facts of international life today" and cited the expanding military budget of the Soviet Union, the USSR's anti-missile system and the development of missiles with multiple warheads.

Constant Examination

The President's proposals, the council noted, called for "continuation of research and development, and each successive deployment phase is to be constantly examined and reviewed in the light of technological advances and the international situation at hand."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told a press conference that the AFL-CIO has no expertise on the ABM system and that the statement cannot be considered either a pro or con position on the technical capabilities.

He commented that there is a real possibility that the Administration's decision on the ABM system may be altered or modified.

The council approved the ABM statement on a vote of 19 aye votes, 5 opposed and 3 abstaining.

$50,000 Grant Voted for Latin Impact Projects

The successful Impact Projects program of the American Institute for Free Labor Development, financed completely by AFL-CIO, funds, was voted an additional $50,000 by the Executive Council to continue its work.

Since the program was initiated in November 1964, the council has approved $400,000 for impact projects, prior to the latest appropriation. The money has been used for 184 projects in 22 Latin American countries—projects of essentially low cost that can be started immediately and completed in a short period of time.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told reporters that the program has proven successful in aiding workers to improve their living conditions and that the AFL-CIO is proud of its involvement and the use of trade union funds to help workers in Latin America.

Similar impact programs are being carried on in Africa through the African-American Labor Center, and others are being planned for Asia, he said.

The projects covered in the Latin American program include community center and school repairs and expansions, producers cooperatives, health services and drug cooperatives, educational equipment, disaster relief, consumers cooperatives, pilot housing assistance and community improvement.

The program has provided outright grants totaling about $210,000 and interest free loans of about $250,000.

The net effect, said Meany was to aid Latin American workers and help them create a stronger free and democratic labor movement.

West Virginia Highway Strikers Backed With $10,000 Donation

There is no valid reason why the nation's public employes should be denied orderly legal procedures for a solution of their just grievances, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared in supporting the strike of West Virginia State Road Commission employes with a $10,000 contribution.

The council called on all affiliated bodies to "give of their resources until victory is won" by the 3,400 state road workers who have joined the Laborers. It urged Gov. Arch A. Moore and his state road commissioner to recognize the union "and begin bargaining in good faith" on the issues in dispute.

Since the usual economic pressures are not present in the West Virginia conflict, council members declared that "the AFL-CIO endorses and will fully support a voluntary boycott of tourism in the entire state . . . until this issue is brought to an equitable and satisfactory solution."

The GOP governor fired the road employes Mar. 11 for stopping work in protest against the state's refusal to recognize or deal with their union. The Laborers filed suit in U.S. District Court at Charleston, accusing Moore of violating the constitutional rights of the workers.

While labor and community leaders rallied to the support of the strikers, eight civil rights leaders called on the governor "immediately to rescind the decision" to fire the workers "so they may enjoy the right to job security and union representation to which every American worker is entitled."

Signers were AFL-CIO Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph, Bayard Rustin, the Rev. Ralph D. Abernathy, Mrs. Martin Luther King, Jr., Roy Wilkins, Whitney M. Young, Jr., Rep. Shirley Chisolm (D-N.Y.) and Pres. Dorothy Height of the National Council of Negro Women.

In Charleston, a special meeting of the West Virginia AFL-CIO authorized promotion of a boycott against the state's tourist industry, and a general work stoppage by the state's 100,000 workers if the strike continues. Delegates authorized federation Pres. Miles C. Stanley to activate the tourist boycott plan on or after June 1.

In Washington, the AFL-CIO Executive Council noted that "across the land, thousands of public employes are rising to assert their collective opposition" to a system of low wages, inadequate job security and a denial of benefits "generally enjoyed" in private industry.

Some state and local governments still refuse, the council said, to meet the need for an orderly settlement of just grievances. State Road Commission employes are victims of such neglect, it said.

The council declared "the AFL-CIO believes that public employes should have the same legal right" to organize and bargain as the majority of other workers.

The decision of the Moore administration "to choose a mass firing of workers in lieu of negotiation, mediation or conciliation" ignores the history and tradition of free collective bargaining and is "reminiscent of the law of the jungle which prevailed" in this country a half century ago, the council charged.

Unionist Appointed At Quebec University

Montreal—Julien Major, legislative director of the Pulp, Sulphite & Paper Mill Workers in Canada, has been named a governor of the new University of Quebec.

He will be one of three governors who will administer control over courses of study and financing of the university, which will initially have campuses at Montreal, Trois-Rivieres and Chicoutimi.

Fred Hartley Dies, T-H Act Co-Author

Former Rep. Fred A. Hartley, Jr., co-author of the Taft-Hartley Act of 1947, died after a long illness at a Linden, N.J., convalescent home. He was 67.

Hartley was a Republican congressman for 20 years before retiring in 1948 to become a management consultant on labor relations. The T-H law, which he and the late Sen. Robert A. Taft (R-O.) sponsored, was vetoed by Pres. Truman but a Republican-controlled Congress passed it over the veto.

Labor denounced the act for stripping from labor some of the protections provided by the Wagner Act. Truman called it unjust to workers.

LABOR-BACKED candidate for mayor of Los Angeles, Thomas Bradley, talks about his campaign to union leaders and staff at a meeting at AFL-CIO headquarters. AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler are among those present. Bradley will oppose incumbent Mayor Sam Yorty in a runoff election May 27.

Changes in Law Sought to Permit Funds for Day Care, Scholarships

The Clothing Workers are asking Congress to amend the Taft-Hartley Act to allow employer contributions to joint labor-management trust funds which would finance day care centers and student scholarships.

Bills have been introduced in both houses of Congress calling for the amendment.

Significantly, the Clothing Manufacturers Association already has agreed to pay one-half of 1 percent of its payrolls into the trust funds that would benefit the children of the 130,000 ACWA members.

Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky told the Senate Labor subcommittee that favorable action by Congress on the legislation could encourage the private sector of the economy to help achieve the nation's social goals.

The ACWA statement was delivered by union Vice Pres. Howard D. Samuel during the subcommittee's hearings on the Senate version of the proposed amendment to the Labor Management Relations Act.

The joint trust funds would provide scholarships to youngsters seeking post-secondary education and provide funds for day care centers serving children of working mothers.

Employers or unions may finance such activities now, but may not collaborate in those operations because the law allows only limited purposes for jointly administered trust funds.

"Just as the government is now helping and seeks even further to help our citizens to achieve their education goals," the Potofsky statement stressed, "so too, the Amalgamated believes strongly that the private sector of the economy should be encouraged to help our citizens achieve their full potential."

He said that the trade union movement—through the process of collective bargaining—is particularly suited to help implement the nation's educational goals by making education available to thousands of citizens, "who might otherwise contribute less than their full potential to our nation's productivity."

Potofsky's statement pointed out that the union has pioneered many social benefit programs through jointly administered trust funds.

He emphasized the need for day care centers so that women who head families can support their children.

"Among all families headed by women, three out of five include children under 18 years of age," Potofsky said, and nearly one of five includes children under 6 years old.

The union now operates a day care center in Baltimore but it is nominally a health care center under the health and welfare fund to avoid violating the law.

ACWA also has what it calls an "experimental program" in Chicago under which $600 a year is paid for technical school or college education for each child of a member of 13 years standing. About 130 students are making use of the program.

The need for day care centers is expected to increase as the number of working mothers grows. A fact sheet from the Labor Dept.'s Women's Bureau showed that about 10.6 million women with children under 18 years old were working in March 1967.

The legislation in Congress would make bargaining on the trust funds voluntary. A similar measure passed in the House last year, but there was no action in the Senate.

In earlier testimony before a House Labor subcommittee, ACWA General Counsel Jacob Sheinkman said that "establishment of the programs will be of almost immediate social benefit to all of the nation."

Restrictions intended to prevent use of trust funds for improper purposes should not apply to goals such as these, the ACWA declared.

Health Hazards in Mills Target of TWUA Drive

Philadelphia—The Textile Workers Union of America urged employers, Congress and the Nixon Administration to help protect workers in the industry against crippling lung diseases and loss of hearing caused by on-the-job noise.

The 22-member TWUA council, meeting here in observance of the union's founding 30 years ago, launched a campaign against byssinosis, a lung ailment caused by inhaling cotton dust in carding and spinning mills; asbestosis, a rare type of cancer resulting from asbestos dust; and significant hearing loss because of the constant exposure of workers to high noise levels.

The union called on textile employers to "take effective and immediate measures" to reduce dust and noise to an absolute minimum for textile workers.

It also invited employers to "join with us in sponsoring an industrial hygiene program" in which the resources of medical science and industrial engineering may be enlisted to find the "most effective means of eliminating all on-the-job health hazards."

The council called on Labor Sec. George P. Shultz to enforce Walsh-Healey Public Contracts Act regulations setting maximum noise standards. It asked the U.S. Public Health Service to study the incidence of byssinosis among cotton textile workers, and the prevalence of disabling respiratory diseases among retired cotton textile workers.

In addition, the council urged Congress to enact the Occupational Safety & Health bill, and called on Pres. Nixon to support the establishment of federal standards in those areas.

A council resolution said the "health and welfare of textile workers are being threatened by the failure of management to take adequate measures to protect employes from occupational hazards."

TWUA Pres. William Pollock and Sec.-Treas. Sol Stetin headed the council delegation which noted the union's founding in Philadelphia in May 1939.

TWU Vice President William Grogan Dies

Miami—William Grogan, who helped found the Transport Workers and was a union vice president more than 30 years, died here at 64 after a long illness. Funeral services were held in Epiphany Catholic church.

Grogan had lived here since the late 1940s, and served two terms as president of the former state CIO before merger. He joined TWU in 1934, when it was first organized in New York City.

'Shotgun' Policies Hit:

Tight Money Held Threat to Economy

New York—Labor's chief economist and the chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers found some things to agree on during a two-hour debate at the Collective Bargaining Forum. But not much.

They agreed that inflation is a problem and that government economic policies have an impact on collective bargaining and on jobs.

But to AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nathaniel Goldfinger, the Administration is using "shotgun" policies rather than carefully-aimed rifle shots to halt the price rise.

He warned that the result is likely to be that sectors of the economy which are not contributing to inflationary pressures will needlessly get hurt, and gains made in jobs for Negroes and the least skilled may be wiped out.

Paul W. McCracken, an architect of the Administration's economic policies, took a different view.

Defending the tight money, budget-cutting policies, he said that "for the first time in several years our basic fiscal and monetary policies are in phase and on a reasonably non-inflationary path."

It will be some months yet before these policies have a measurable impact on the economy, but the adjustment, he predicted, will come about with a minimum of hardship although not entirely painlessly.

Goldfinger said part of the nation's economic problems stem from the fact that "the gains of the economic advance of the 1960s have not been shared fully."

During the past eight years, he said, after-tax profits of corporations rose almost twice as fast as the increase in the take-home pay of the average worker.

While welcoming portions of the Administration's tax program, particularly repeal of the "inflation-feeding" investment tax credit, Goldfinger urged the AFL-CIO's much more comprehensive program of full tax reform.

On the Administration's economic and fiscal policies Goldfinger saw "a serious risk" of recession. High interest rates are already stifling residential construction, he noted, and have priced many moderate-income families out of the home market. The Administration is following a "very dangerous" policy in slamming the brakes on too hard.

At a later session, Labor Sec. George P. Shultz stressed that the Administration doesn't want its anti-inflation drive to be accompanied by a "significant rise in unemployment."

Shultz cautioned labor and management negotiators against basing their collective bargaining policies on the assumption that inflation will continue at a high rate.

He said negotiators on both sides of the table should take "very seriously" the Administration's determination to curb the price rise.

Public Employe Strikes Divide Top Arbitrators

New York—Two of the nation's best-known arbitrators took opposite positions on the issue of public employe strikes.

Theodore W. Kheel, who played a major role in setting up the Institute of Collective Bargaining and who has been an indispensable trouble-shooter for mayors of New York, had this to say:

"Collective bargaining cannot exist if employes may not withdraw their services. . . . Collective bargaining is the best way of composing differences between workers and their employers in a democratic society. So, if we believe public employes should have bargaining rights, we must accept the possibility of a strike and consider how best to guard against it."

Kheel suggested that cities and states adopt the emergency disputes provision of the Taft-Hartley Act if the community's health or safety is involved. But he reiterated, "When all strikes are barred, collective bargaining or joint determination is out."

David L. Cole, who helped frame New York State's labor relations law which includes penalties against unions and union members for striking, disagreed.

"Why should we deliberately revert to the primitive days of labor relations" when there are alternatives to strikes?, he asked. He said allowing unions to shut down essential public services in effect allows them "unilateral determination of wages and working conditions."

At another panel, Prof. George W. Taylor, chief author of the New York labor law, said states and cities don't have the money to meet all the needs and demands for services. Allowing public employes to strike, he suggested, would be imposing their claims in isolation from the overall priorities of government.

Jerry Wurf, president of the State, County & Municipal Employes, said he has come to the "disquieting conclusion that the very same public official . . . arbitrator . . . academician . . . who enthusiastically supports full and unhindered collective bargaining in private industry, is perfectly willing to accept the most biased, slanted, one-sided system when it involves public workers."

Too often, he charged, "government has been allowed to cling to the right to be exempt from reasonableness and responsibility in its own labor-management relations."

At a panel dealing with the federal service, Thomas R. Donahue, executive secretary of the Service Employes, spoke of the growth of unionism in that sector.

He said the 1962 presidential order on union recognition "was recognized at the outset as a beginning step, a platform for further development."

Whether improvements come about through legislation or a new executive order, he predicted "a continuing development of the unions representing federal employes, not just in terms of size, but in terms of staff services, professionalism and overall effectiveness."

Fryer Leaves CLC For Provincial Union

Vancouver, B.C.—John Fryer, research director of the Canadian Labor Congress since 1967, will join the British Columbia Government Employes' Association July 1 as general secretary.

Fryer served on the staff of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research and later as research director of the former Packinghouse Workers union. He joined the CLC as assistant research director in 1965.

New Bargaining Front:

Meany Cites Battles On 'Raw Frontiers'

New York—American labor's biggest and hardest battle in generations is being fought along "the raw frontiers of collective bargaining," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said here.

It involves farm workers in California, hospital workers in South Carolina, and the "far too many" groups of working poor who need the help of the trade union movement to achieve a share of America's prosperity.

Meany talked of the "primitive and fierce" employer resistance to these organizing drives at a Collective Bargaining Forum attended by some 800 union and management negotiators, top government officials and university experts.

They represented, Meany observed, the "civilized sectors" of labor-management relations, where the bargaining table has become "an instrument of progress" and "a means for the equitable sharing of the proceeds of a common endeavor."

It's a different world, he said, "where trade unions must fight for the merest right to live." But, he said, "the AFL-CIO is convinced that the nation's destiny will be shaped in large measure by the success or failure of the struggle to bring the benefits of collective bargaining to workers at the bottom of the economic ladder."

"That is why we have devoted so much of our manpower and resources to the effort to bring collective bargaining rights to the field workers on the factory farms of California and Texas," Meany said. "That is why we have strongly supported the campaigns of our affiliates to secure recognition and bargaining rights for garbage workers in Memphis and hospital workers in Charleston."

These campaigns, he said, "have encountered the most bitter resistance and opposition tactics as raw and ruthless as were met in the dark ages of trade union organization in this country."

There's no profit for unions in terms of significant membership gains in these areas of organizing, Meany acknowledged. "Each new member, each new local and each new contract comes at a heavy cost in time, trouble and treasure."

But, he stressed, "that is the area of greatest need, where new ground must be broken if bargaining is to be extended down the ladder, and that is why we are there."

Where workers and management sit down at the bargaining table, Meany said, "there is no such thing as a non-negotiable demand." The goal is "an agreement that both parties can live with for a definite period of time."

The American people will not accept any unilateral or compulsory alternative to this procedure, he stressed. "They will insist upon effective participation—by one means or another—in the decisions that affect their lives."

Sure there are conflicts at the bargaining table, he noted. But "bargaining does not create the conflicts. It brings them to the top of the table where they may be examined, debated and resolved. In its absence, those conflicts must eventually assume some other, less manageable form."

Meany praised the forum's sponsor, the Institute of Collective Bargaining & Group Relations, for helping to develop a better public understanding of the bargaining process and helping its practitioners achieve a higher level of skill.

"As you talk about the more sophisticated concerns that arise from contract negotiations," he reminded the forum participants, "remember that the raw frontiers of collective bargaining still exist and they extend over wide areas of employment in the United States."

Anti-Unionism Hit in Labor Law 'Reform'

New York—The same person who conceived the term "right-to-work" must have thought up the "labor law reform" label used by the Chamber of Commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers, an AFL-CIO attorney suggested at the Collective Bargaining Forum.

Thomas E. Harris, the federation's associate general counsel, termed the labor law changes advanced by the two business federations "extreme" and said the methods used to promote them are "contemptible."

The so-called reform program, he charged, is designed to make federal labor law "more anti-worker and anti-union . . . more favorable to anti-union employers." Virtually every NLRB interpretation or court decision in which unions have prevailed would be overturned, but none of the decisions which unions have lost would be altered.

Harris took sharp issue with a study issued by a group of management lawyers which forms the basis for the "reform" proposals.

But the study "is pretty high class stuff," Harris said, compared with the "bare-faced lies" in the propaganda material put out by the Hill & Knowlton public relations firm which was hired to promote the legislation.

Harris noted that some of the employer participants in the Collective Bargaining Forum were associated with the Chamber and NAM campaign to gut the nation's labor policy.

"I put it to the employer representatives here," Harris said, "that they should stop carrying water on both shoulders. If, as their presence here seems to suggest, they really believe in collective bargaining, it is high time that they stop supporting the extremist, crackpot activities of the NAM and the Chamber of Commerce."

PARTICIPANTS in forum sponsored by the Institute of Collective Bargaining & Group Relations represent the "civilized sectors" of labor-management relations, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said. But he told them that employer resistance to unions is "primitive and fierce" along the "raw frontiers of collective bargaining" where farm and hospital workers are trying to organize.

Fundamental Role of Bargaining Reaffirmed at Pioneering Forum

tween workers and their employers, and that the most effective means of preventing strikes is by improving the techniques of bargaining and the skill of the practitioners."

Arthur J. Goldberg, who helped negotiate steel contracts, the AFL-CIO merger and the nuclear nonproliferation treaty, skipped the platitudes and plunged into two controversial areas in his keynote speech.

While most conference speakers decried government intervention in the bargaining process, Goldberg asserted that no administration can remain disinterested in the results of bargaining. And "any administration worth its salt," he said, must move unhesitatingly to deal with disputes affecting the national health and safety.

Goldberg also revealed he had urged that wage-price-profit controls be imposed three years ago "when the decision was made to step up America's involvement in Viet Nam." He argued that the failure to do so, not the results of collective bargaining, was a prime cause of inflation.

To P. L. Siemiller, who noted that he will soon retire as president of the Machinists after 40 years of bargaining "from railroad roundhouses to the White House," there never has been a strike "that actually endangered the public health, safety or welfare to an extent that justified strikebreaking legislation."

There have been strikes that "caused public inconvenience and perhaps much public irritation," he said. "But none could really be described as causing a true public emergency."

These were some of the other things that were said by conference speakers:

- I. W. Abel, president of the Steelworkers: "There is a clear and present danger that the citizens and politicians of this country may be prepared to destroy collective bargaining because of a fretful impatience with its exasperating but not fundamentally dangerous consequences. . . .

"If they restrict the right to strike, they will produce the very type of management irresponsibility and employe frustration that are so evident today in the state, county and municipal sector."

- Virgil B. Day, General Electric Co. vice president: "Industry has an obligation . . . to support the public interest and its own by showing greater concern about the impact of collective bargaining on inflation. . . . A little stiffer backbone at the bargaining table will be mandatory."

- Paul Jennings, president, Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers: In confronting the challenge of technological change "we cannot do it by the kind of crisis bargaining that is still the rule. . . . Men cannot sensibly plan and work out great new developments in the 60 or 90 days allotted each three years, when all issues of collective bargaining must be solved and they usually reach the deadline tired and sleepless, with bad digestion and frayed tempers."

- Joseph A. Beirne, president, Communications Workers: "Union members today are better educated, better informed. . . . They see that corporate profits have climbed much more than wages and they don't like to hear some corporate public relations man blame wages for inflation.

"If the membership doesn't think it is getting a fair share of the profits, it isn't going to accept an agreement. It is going to strike."

- Edmund J. Flynn, Kennecott Copper Corp. official: "The issue raised by coordinated bargaining is one of power at the collective bargaining table. . . . Management finds itself willing—indeed forced—to take strikes rather than capitulate to the union objectives of common termination dates, uniform economic settlements and the simultaneous conclusion of bargaining. Why? Reduced to the simplest terms, these objectives mean higher cost settlements."

- Msgr. George C. Higgins, U.S. Catholic Conference: "Labor and management share the responsibility of guaranteeing, insofar as it lies within their power to do so, equal employment opportunities for Negro workers and other disadvantaged minorities.

"There is something else that labor and management can and ought to do together. They can jointly sponsor a massive campaign in support of programs recommended by the Commission on Civil Disorders . . . in the fields of housing, education, health and welfare."

- Algie A. Hendrix, General Dynamics Corp. vice president: "Management alone must have the authority and responsibility for operating the business. We must have a prompt and forthright rejection of the concept that management must share with unions the right to make decisions where these have an impact on jobs."

- Howard Samuel, Clothing Workers vice president: "Is labor without criticism? Have we done all we could in every area of modern life to bring first class citizenship economically and politically to every American? Of course not.

"But with all labor's faults and errors and inadequacies, our major directions have been the right ones, and our major accomplishments have been enduring, and our major activities have been for the public welfare. Are there many other major segments in our society who can say the same?"

Teachers' Paper Salutes Randolph

New York — The United Teacher issued a special four-page supplement saluting AFL-CIO Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph on his 80th birthday anniversary.

The supplement, prepared for classroom use, was sold for 5 cents a copy on news stands in Manhattan and the Bronx "with surprisingly good results," Teachers Local 2 said. Orders for the supplement may be sent to 260 Park Avenue South, New York 10010. Proceeds will go to the institute Randolph founded.

Fair Play in Taxes

PRES. NIXON, on April 19, 1969, asked the Congress to extend the so-called temporary surtax beyond its June 30 termination date. His proposal would raise the effective surtax rate on 1969 wages and salaries of individuals to 10 percent—up from last year's 7.5 percent rate.

He proposes, however, that the surtax rate on corporations, despite their unprecedented, after-tax profits, be the same as last year's rate. High-income individuals would, of course, continue to avoid their share of the surtax since so much of their income is tax exempt.

American workers pay their regular taxes and the surtax, payday after payday, through the payroll withholding program.

They are willing to pay their fair share.

But they are tired of having to pay the share of others whose incomes are greater and whose taxes are lower.

We welcome Pres. Nixon's recommendation for repeal of the 7 percent tax credit for business investment, a special tax privilege, which is fueling the fires of the major source of inflationary demand in the economy. But this one proposal does not satisfy the long overdue and critically urgent need for tax justice.

Furthermore, the Apr. 22, 1969, tax reform proposals offered by the Administration, even if adopted immediately, would not succeed in moving the tax structure very far toward tax justice. The President's proposals fail to directly attack the major loopholes which unconscionably reduce the tax burdens on the wealthy, such as capital gains, depletion allowances and state and local bond interest. And, equally important, though the President's tax proposals would effectively remove from the tax rolls those whose incomes are below government poverty standards, no relief is recommended for those of moderate and middle incomes, who bear the brunt of the tax burden.

We in the AFL-CIO will not support any extension of the surtax until it is combined with immediate, substantial and equitable reform of the federal income tax structure.

Full reform of the tax structure would provide revenue to eliminate the poor from the federal income tax rolls and provide much-needed tax relief to those with low- and moderate-incomes. And the urgently needed expansion of federal programs to meet America's urban crises would be fully funded.

THE AFL-CIO's PRESCRIPTION for complete tax justice in America has been stated many times. In sum, achievement of tax justice depends upon taking the following steps:

Income from capital must be taxed the same as income from work. State and local bond interest must not be tax exempt. The provisions in the law which allow imaginary costs to be deducted from the taxable income of wealthy real estate operators, hobby farmers, and oil, gas and other mineral operations must be eliminated.

The Congress must close these and other loopholes and gimmicks which have rigged the federal tax structure against those whose income comes from the work they do.

There is no rational reason for lengthy delays. The time to bring the American standard of fair play into the tax structure is now.

The American people want tax justice and we will continue to fight for that goal.

A Word Edgewise:

Democratic Party Reformers Overlooking Pertinent Issues

By John P. Roche

VARIOUS LEADERS — some elected, some self-appointed — are running around reorganizing the Democratic Party, apparently under the illusion that we lost the 1968 election because there was insufficient participation by the "forces of change."

Nobody has bothered to point out that the winners had far less "participatory democracy," that in fact 57 percent of the American electorate voted against the "forces of change." The latest Gallup Poll, showing Nixon at 62 percent, Wallace at 10, and Ted Kennedy at an appalling 33, suggests that the dispute on Democratic organization is simply irrelevant. It resembles nothing so much as an argument over what hymn to sing on the sinking Titanic.

For the benefit of those who are concerned with the real world, let us begin on square 1: there is only one way to win the presidency of the United States—by getting more votes than any other candidate. No matter how virtuous an individual may feel (and the followers of Eugene McCarthy and Robert Kennedy have often acted as though they had a corner on political virtue), he has only one vote.

In well-organized dictatorships, the self-anointed children of light have the power to suppress the ignorant masses. They don't, thank God, have it here.

Whether he is happy about it or not, a political leader in the United States has to face the hard fact that the views of the American people establish the limits within which he must act. He can push these limits and, if he is trusted, the people will go a long way with him. But before he raises the banner of change, he has to establish himself by demonstrating that he thoroughly understands the basis of existing attitudes. He has to earn the right to be an innovator.

Right now the American people have a number of very deep grievances against the Democrats. The reaction of most Democratic spokesmen—which is to pretend that these problems do not exist—makes the situation worse.

All Pres. Nixon has to do is maintain his present policy of masterful inaction combined with effective rhetoric, and the refugees from the Democratic dream world could keep him in office until 1977.

Nothing generates distrust, and a rush to another line on the ballot, the way weasling does. On Viet Nam the leaders of the Democratic Party, since Lyndon Johnson abdicated, have put on a spectacular demonstration of this art. When it has been pointed out that the Tonkin Gulf Resolution went through the Senate with only two opposing votes, those who voted for it wax indignant and say "Johnson tricked us."

THIS CONFESSION of incompetence may bring big cheers from the young and militant, but the response of the average American is that if grown politicians can be duped that easily, they shouldn't run a dog pound, much less the country.

Reading the New York Times one might get the impression that we have turned into a nation of pacifists over the last three years. To believe this is to make a disastrous miscalculation; Americans are enraged about Viet Nam because they think that they have been double-crossed by their leaders. Thirty-four thousand Americans are dead and the party that launched the intervention refuses either to defend the decision (and I insist it is quite defensible) or to admit a massive collective error in underestimating the enemy.

The latter course is politically risky, but in the long run far less hazardous than conveying to the sovereign voters the image of the welsher. Right or wrong, Pres. Johnson never had that albatross hung around his neck.

Similarly on domestic disorder. The leaders of the Democratic Party go wandering around the country explaining why we have troubles. The population at large, however, is not working for a degree in sociology. It wants an answer to the perfectly legitimate question: what are you going to do about it? To ignore this question and its legitimacy is to invite the voter to go somewhere else for his answers.

I wish the top Democrats would worry a little less about "building bridges to Red China" or to the Soviet bloc, and start constructing a few to link them with the real concerns of the American people.

A. Philip Randolph's Cause:

'Tried to Build an Alliance'

At the New York dinner marking his 80th birthday A. Philip Randolph saw the tributes and speeches marking the moment as one of rededication. Here is the text of his response.

OUR GATHERING here tonight is an honoring, and for that I am deeply grateful and humbled. But in a more profound sense it is a rededication to a cause to which I have contributed my energies, and to principles to which I have dedicated my life.

The cause has been the liberation of the Negro in America. I have seen fit in this endeavor to try to establish an alliance between the Negro and the American trade union movement. I have been guided by the belief that Negroes are a working people, and that because of their history on American soil—a history of suffering and tragedy, but also of struggle, endurance, dignity and, ultimately, a history of human triumph—that because of this history they have been a dispossessed people who have often had to migrate thousands of miles in search of the means of subsistence.

The labor movement has been the home of the working man, and traditionally it has been the only haven for the dispossessed. And, therefore, I have tried to build an alliance between the Negro and the American labor movement.

I have not been alone in my efforts. In 1925, almost half a century ago, I and my colleagues founded the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters. In our struggle to build the union we faced destitution and continual harassment, but we did build it, and our struggle conferred upon us collectively a certain dignity.

With this victory, my brothers and I in the union not only improved the conditions under which we lived and worked, but we were enabled to reach beyond ourselves to our brothers and sisters on the plantations and in the ghettos. We were able to reach out and build a movement of the Negro masses struggling to realize, upon this American soil, the freedom and the justice which they had so long been denied.

The Negro masses awakened in 1941. They challenged the President of the United States to integrate the defense industries and all other places of public employment. And they were victorious. The Negro masses were in motion. They were removing the mark of oppression from their brows and the burden of economic misery from their bodies. This struggle has continued down to the present day.

Like a mountain stream that grows in size and momentum as it rushes downward, the struggle of the Negro masses for social and economic equality has become irrepressible. From Memphis, Tenn., to Charleston, S.C., they cannot now be satisfied with anything less than total liberation.

OUR CEREMONY of rededication tonight is to the cause of freedom, but it is also to the principles governing the means by which freedom must be achieved. In my life I have tried to abide by the principles of democracy, nonviolence and integration, but there are some today, particularly among our black youth, who would question the validity of these principles in our on-going struggle. I urge them to reconsider their position and to engage with me in a reaffirmation of these fundamental principles.

We must reject confrontationism, and together reaffirm the necessity for democratic means of political protest.

We must reject violence, and together reaffirm the power and the wisdom of nonviolence.

And we must reject racial separatism and together, with the conviction that one day our nation can cease to be divided within itself, reaffirm our abiding faith in integration. We cannot reject these principles without also denying ourselves the possibility of freedom.

Salvation for the Negro masses must come from within. Freedom is never granted; it is won. Justice is never given; it is exacted.

But in our struggle we must draw for strength upon something that far transcends the boundaries of race. We must draw upon the capacity of human beings to act with humanity towards one another. We must draw upon the human potential for kindness and decency.

And we must have faith that this society, divided by race and by class, and subject to profound social pressures, can one day become a nation of equals, and banish white racism and black racism and anti-semitism to the limbo of oblivion from which they shall never emerge.

Bayard Rustin Warns:

Violence Imperils Black Goals

The following is excerpted from a statement by Bayard Rustin, executive director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute which appeared in Justice, the publication of the Ladies' Garment Workers.

BLACK PEOPLE have known violence in America. They have known the Ku Klux Klan and the White Citizens Councils. They have seen the white mobs in Mississippi and in Cicero, Ill. They have understood that violence is synonymous with oppression and destruction.

And, therefore, the use of guns on the Cornell University campus by a group of black students should come as a great shock—and a great sorrow—to all black Americans struggling for freedom and social justice.

Nothing creative can emerge from their mindless use of force. Rifles will not enhance their education; nor will bullets enlighten their minds.

The black students at Cornell only displayed their arms. They used them to intimidate the administration. But built into the situation is the logic of escalation. Violence threatened with bravado will become violence used with viciousness, and the main victims will not be the administration but the black students—and the university.

I, therefore, find those guilt-ridden and nihilistic white students who encouraged them in this madness to be equally as culpable. So too is the indecisive and flaccid administration which has abdicated its authority.

MOREOVER, by their irresponsible actions, these black students have strengthened the reactionary forces in the society which will obstruct any progress for black Americans. The fear in the white community which produced George Wallace has also been the source of resistance to programs to rebuild our cities, educate our youth, and employ all of our adults.

It is thus not only the university which is being threatened by these students, but all of our democratic institutions. And if democracy is destroyed and violence prevails, those who will suffer most will be black Americans.

As Living Costs Rise:

Tax, Wage-Hour Action Sought

THE MOUNTING NEED for both tax relief for middle-income workers and a boost of the national minimum wage are shown by the latest federal report on urban family living costs, an AFL-CIO economist declared.

"Low-wage workers account for about half" of the nation's 6 million families below the poverty line, said Rudolph Oswald, of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research. He stressed that while the current $1.60 federal hourly minimum wage provides only $3,200 for a full year's work, the Labor Dept.'s "very austere" family budget runs to nearly $6,000, based on 1967 figures.

Oswald said that the AFL-CIO remains convinced that improving the minimum wage is "the most effective means for the largest number of workers to approach even this austere $6,000 family budget" defined in the government report.

Union members, he said on Labor News Conference, are becoming increasingly concerned over the "heavy tax burden" they bear, as price and tax rises wipe out collective bargaining gains.

He stressed that the AFL-CIO's tax reform proposals would bring relief for middle-income earners and put a "fair share of the tax burden" on the very-high-income recipients, many of whom are paying little or no taxes now.

By Press Associates, Inc.

THE EMPHASIS of the Nixon Administration in the fields of jobs and training as part of the over-all "war on poverty" has been on the role of business and private enterprise.

Press releases from the Dept. of Labor cite speeches and articles by businessmen on such topics as "Business and the Urban Crisis" and "Developing an Urban Strategy," both of which appear in the May issue of "Manpower," the official monthly publication of the Manpower Administration.

There can, of course, be no doubt that increased business participation in the Administration's version of how jobs and training can be extended is a healthy step forward.

Nevertheless there is a certain amount of danger that in this new drive for turning the "war on poverty" job over to business, the role that organized labor has played, and is continuing to play, may be overlooked.

The AFL-CIO has its own Dept. of Urban Affairs which has played a highly active role in the "war on poverty" ever since the Johnson Administration launched the anti-poverty effort some five years ago.

A detailed study of what the federation itself and its affiliated unions, state and local bodies, have accomplished in the field, is now available. It was presented to the House Committee on Education & Labor by Julius F. Rothman, associate director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Urban Affairs. Highlights follow:

● Major emphasis has been given to jobs and training. In many communities, central labor councils were the motivating force for setting up community action agencies. In others, unions worked with community groups, notably minority groups, in creating community action. There are now many Community Action Agencies headed by union leaders.

● Special efforts were made to involve rank-and-file union members in the war on poverty. Three union leadership training programs were established. The first was in the 11 Appalachian states where 118 union members were selected for training in wide areas of anti-poverty work and leadership. The second phase of this program trained more than 1,200 AFL-CIO members to carry on such work.

A second training program was set up in New England and is now in its second year.

A THIRD TRAINING program is now under way in the southwest states and is training 100 unionists for leadership work.

● Neighborhood Youth Corps programs have been sponsored by organized labor throughout the country, including such areas as Watts and Alameda County in California, upstate New York and West Virginia.

● The Job Corps also has had strong labor support. The Operating Engineers pioneered in the use of Jobs Corps centers as training grounds where boys could be trained to enter the trade. The Carpenters conducted ambitious programs in seven centers. The Painters conducted training programs in 38 centers. Other unions also have participated in the training of Job Corps workers.

It is for that reason that the recent decision of the Nixon Administration to close down many of those centers has come as a heavy blow to the unions involved.

● Labor unions also have become deeply involved at the community level in a wide variety of other programs contributing to job training and job placement under the Office of Economic Opportunity—in sponsoring Head Start programs, in developing Neighborhood Service Center programs, consumer programs, helping in the development of credit unions and co-ops of various kinds, in initiating legal services and health center programs.

Rothman's presentation, in itself, represented part of the AFL-CIO plea to Congress not to cut the Office of Economic Opportunity.

"For millions who are still in poverty," he said, "the bright promise of our anti-poverty program must not be extinguished. Those citizens who hope for a better life must be encouraged to continue their effort. And we in the AFL-CIO are committed to do all we can."

A NEW LABOR DEPT. report shows that an urban worker's family of four needs $6,000 a year to maintain even "very austere" living standards, AFL-CIO Economist Rudolph Oswald, center, told reporters Sam Sharkey, left, of the Newhouse Newspapers and Harry Conn of Press Associates, Inc., on Labor News Conference. The interview is aired Tuesdays on Mutual Radio.

How to Buy:

Consumers' Uprising Brewing Over Soaring Prices, Tax Pinch

By Sidney Margolius

WORKING FAMILIES are becoming bitter and disturbed about the inflationary squeeze that has hit a new high this spring. Letters to this column show noticeable anger over prices and taxes.

What bothers people most? Food prices. Letter after letter cites the difficulties of feeding a family adequately on modest budgets at today's costs. Much of the bitterness is directed at supermarkets for obvious juggling of prices in a pretense that good buys are still available.

Soaring prices on homes and the new high mortgage rates of 7-8 percent are other recurring complaints. So are taxes, as families find themselves squeezed between rising prices and the combination of federal income surtax and rising local sales and property taxes. A movement even is under way to send tea bags to congressmen in a modern version of the Boston Tea Party which protested taxes in colonial days.

Here are a few examples of the protests to this column:

Pork and Eggs: "My hardworking husband makes an honest $3.30 an hour and we are a family of four, but let me tell you what it really is like to live on $6,500 a year," one angry wife writes. "Papa hasn't had a new suit in seven years, and I haven't had a new coat in 16 years. Meat is a luxury. Pork is still reasonable. How much pork can you eat, and we are sick of eggs?"

Unfortunately, the worst is still ahead. This is going to be a summer of terribly high food prices. Usually food prices go down a little in March and go up in the summer. But this year food prices jumped in March. This is a clear warning of extraordinary price jumps in store.

Don't knock pork and eggs. This summer you're going to wish you could afford pork. Eggs will be higher, too, but still one of the best protein buys, and useful for stretching expensive meat.

But the real solution will have to come, not from combining eggs and meat, but from Congress.

Rep. Leonor Sullivan (D-Mo.), one of the most determined consumer spokesmen, has warned that if inflation continues unchecked Congress will not tolerate further inaction by the Administration. Rep. Henry Reuss (D-Wis.) especially has criticized the Agriculture Dept. policy of subsidizing corporate farms not to grow crops, as contributing to the rise in food prices.

Ads Raise Costs: Ronald Rapp, a retired labor representative, writes that he now has found there is more to shopping than putting cans and boxes into a cart. Now that he often helps his wife shop, he has found "many discrepancies in prices" in the supermarkets.

He has found stores' own brands cheaper and usually packed by the same companies that process the advertised brands.

"The big packers spend fortunes for ads in magazines, newspapers, radio and television which adds to the cost of every can or box," he points out.

Tax Protests: There are many protests over high taxes and the loopholes which permit many wealthy people to pay low or even no taxes. Fred Schroer is especially bitter about the high levy on single persons—"those of us on our own and living away from home." On earnings of $8,300 he paid $1,500 in taxes last year.

It is true that rates are higher for single taxpayers. This young man fortunately has an income a little above average. But many single people find that taxes now are their largest expense item. While married couples do get a lower rate by filing a joint return, they also feel the present tax bite keenly.

ANOTHER RECOMMENDATION that would help single and moderate-income taxpayers especially, is the AFL-CIO proposal to increase the minimum standard deduction to $700 for a single person. If the exemption remains at $600, this would give the single worker the first $1,300 tax free, instead of $900 as now.

The proposal would also help families with children. The loss of income to the government from increasing the minimum deduction would be made up by closing some of the most glaring loopholes for wealthy taxpayers.

So if you send a tea bag to your congressman, also tell him your proposals for tax reform. Incidentally, business-writer Elmer Roessner, an economical backer of tax reform, suggests drying out a used tea bag and sending that.

10 Months in Ceylon:

HOPE Mercy Tour 'Most Successful'

By Harry Goldberg

THE HOSPITAL SHIP HOPE, whose cause the AFL-CIO has supported virtually from the beginning, has just returned from its most recent trip to Ceylon. From any point of view it was one of its most successful and serviceable trips.

For 10 months, HOPE had conducted in Ceylon its most comprehensive medical teaching and treatment program to date. The staff treated more than 1,700 patients aboard ship and, with Ceylonese counterparts, conducted some 2,280 operations. More than 3,000 patients were treated in the ship's dental department, and some 70,000 children received immunization against diphtheria, whooping cough and tetanus.

Educational exchange programs were conducted with more than 1,150 Ceylonese medical and paramedical counterparts on the ship and in hospitals, schools and clinics throughout the island nation.

Other accomplishments, perhaps less dramatic but equally important, were recorded at virtually every level of health and health education in Ceylon. HOPE's areas of achievement range from nursing education to hospital sanitation, from dentistry to physical therapy.

The day before HOPE sailed from Ceylon, 20,000 people came to the ship to say goodbye. They came from all parts of the country, all walks of life. Some had been patients, or friends of patients. Some were medical students, nurses and technologists who had worked with the HOPE staff. Most had only heard of HOPE, and had come to see for themselves the great white ship from America.

NOT ALL PEOPLE in Ceylon were happy about Hope's success. The Ceylon communists launched a sustained attack on the project. The HOPE was actually an arm of the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency, they said; it was a spy ship only thinly disguised as a hospital.

Communist newspapers "revealed" that while patients were being treated on HOPE's first deck, the lower decks were crammed with electronic spying gear "like the Pueblo." The doctors, they said, were actually CIA agents.

But for vicious mendacity, the medal must go to Radio Moscow, which joined its Ceylonese puppets in the diatribes. The most delectable portions from its recent broadcast castigating HOPE in Ceylon follow:

"The ship HOPE has actually brought no hope for cure to Ceylon and the vicinity, but only mortal danger. The floating carrier of death is the name the ship is given by the people of the countries where she has already been. Wherever the ship HOPE appears there are sudden outbreaks of epidemics.

"People suffer and die from severe diseases. For instance, in 1963 when the HOPE was close to the shores of Indonesia, there were outbreaks of cholera and smallpox in the cities of Sourabaya, Malang and Solo.

"The ship is actually a floating branch of the world-notorious American center for chemical and bacteriological warfare in Fort Detrick, Maryland, U.S.A."

No further comment is necessary to dramatize the utter lack of decency of these purveyors of Communist morality, beyond emphasizing the fact that their remarks are made about a project whose selfless idealism is universally recognized and acknowledged.

This fact might well be pondered by those who are uncritically prone to accept claims that the Russians are moving away from their old, rigid dogmatisms toward more decent and civilized methods of international discourse.

Soup to Nonsense:

Stripped-Down Entertainment Turns Sensitive Faces Red

By Jane Goodsell

NAKEDNESS has suddenly become a crusade. No, not nudity, Virginia, nakedness. People are taking off their clothes as a protest against hypocrisy, as a means of promoting better human relations, as a way of improving the world.

In the musical "Hair," the entire cast stands on stage naked—albeit in dim light and for only a split second or two—but nonetheless, clothesless. The Living Theatre group sends its actors naked into the aisles where they exhort the audience to strip, too, as a way of protesting war, smog, passport regulations and poverty, all of which are vociferously—if somewhat mystifyingly—equated with the three-button suit.

A number of modern dance groups now leap and gyrate sans costumes. Psychiatrists are holding group therapy sessions with their patients sitting around naked. The adherents of these sessions claim that people, far from being embarrassed, are more relaxed and respond with greater kindness and sensitivity to each other.

It is easy to scoff and crack jokes ("but where would you keep your hankie and your cigarettes?"). It is tempting to take the esthetic approach that most people simply look better with their clothes on.

It is, in fact, almost impossible to take the whole business seriously, which its advocates most certainly do. Perhaps it is their earnestness more than anything else that puts us off. We have become accustomed to idealized nudity, in paintings and sculpture; to artful nudity in Vogue and Hollywood movies; and to naughty nudity, in the striptease and Playboy magazine.

WHAT WE CAN'T TAKE is plain and simple nakedness which strikes us—most of us, anyway—as just plain embarrassing.

And maybe, just maybe, that's the best argument of all in favor of it. If it bothers us all that much to see ourselves as we really are, it's probably good for us.

Speaking as a romantic (which I am) I prefer soft-focus, artistic nudity to warts-and-all nakedness. But speaking as a puritan (and I'm that, too) I believe that hard-to-take medicine must be beneficial.

I'm not convinced enough to strip down to my wedding ring in a theater. But when the movie "I Am Curious (Yellow)" gets to my town, I intend to go to see it. I'm going to see it because I know I won't like it. And therefore I'm sure it'll be good for me.

Ineffective as Inflation Curb:

Interest Rate Boosts Termed Growing Burden to Economy

Twenty years of increasing interest rates shows that they do not halt inflation but instead add "a growing burden to the nation's economy," according to an article in the May issue of the Federationist, the AFL-CIO's magazine.

Those who are "hurt first, worst and for a long time" by the tight money cycle are workers, home buyers and consumers, Elizabeth Jager, an AFL-CIO economist points out.

Those who cause the inflation—banks and well-to-do corporations, she emphasizes, are "hurt last, least and often only temporarily."

The money managers boost interest rates on the theory that they "will make it too expensive to borrow," expansion will be slowed, buying will fall off and the economy will cool off, the article notes.

"Then, so the theory goes, interest rates will fall and the economy can move forward on an even keel."

But, Mrs. Jager writes, this approach hasn't worked:

Ever since the early 1950s, interest rates have been raised to increase the cost of borrowing. There have been recessions in 1954, 1958, 1960-61 and a slowdown in 1967. The long-term price of money continues upward. Prices have not come down.

"In brief," she states, "the policy of raising interest rates represents a short-run, misplaced effort which produces long run distortions . . . and worse problems for the economy."

What actually happens when interest rates are raised, the article reveals, is that businessmen continue to borrow to build new factories, stores borrow to buy stock and the higher costs for money are passed on to consumers.

If the money squeeze becomes too tight, housing is hurt, some builders are forced out of business, smaller businesses find they cannot afford the high price of money and shut down, and jobs are lost.

When unemployment increases, Mrs. Jager warns, the jobs that are lost first are those of "the poor, the unskilled, the non-white and those least likely to be employed."

Turning to the present policy of increasing interest rates, the article stresses that it has been unsuccessful in slowing down corporate investment for several reasons:

- Rich firms can get loans at the lowest interest rate—the prime rate—while others "get the leavings, if any, at higher cost."
- Tax policies make credit cheaper for corporations than consumers because the corporations deduct interest costs as an expense of doing business.
- The 7 percent investment tax credit allowed to businesses and double depreciation for new construction spur investment and inflation, while reducing the cost of borrowing.
- Businessmen can pass on higher interest charges in the form of higher prices, and they do just that. Profits after taxes zoomed 91 percent between 1960 and 1968.
- When they have to borrow, the corporations' profit-tax depreciation structure allows them to pay back more rapidly, thus making the impact temporary.

In addition to being sharply critical of the Federal Reserve Board's policy of raising interest rates on its loans to commercial banks, the article attacks the lending policies of the big banks themselves.

They have steadily raised the prime rate—interest charged to leading customers, the largest corporations—until it is now 7.5 percent, more than three times what it was in the early 1950s, Mrs. Jager points out.

As the banks continuously jack up the prime rate—described as "their own minimum wage" set without government involvement—they reap higher and higher profits and drive up other interest rates, she concludes.

BLS Sees Job Openings At 3.5 Million per Year

Millions of job openings will arise annually through the mid-1970s as employment opportunities grow and older workers retire, the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics predicts.

The bureau forecasts about 3.5 million employment opportunities will open each year. Nearly 2.5 million will be in 240 occupations that account for more than one-half of all workers in the economy.

The largest annual need, the BLS said, is for 200,000 elementary and secondary school teachers. Other major training needs are for 175,000 secretaries and stenographers, 150,000 retail sales clerks and 129,000 truck drivers.

In releasing data on annual needs for the 240 leading occupations, the bureau also predicted openings in fields that are declining or are considered obsolete. It said there will be 600 openings for blacksmiths each year despite all the "horseless carriages" on the highways. And although the telephone industry is heavily automated, there will still be a need for 28,000 telephone operators each year, it added.

Technological advances also will cause an annual demand for 13,600 electronic computer programmers, 11,800 systems analysts, 3,500 air conditioning, refrigeration and heating mechanics, and 2,400 physical therapists.

The needs range down to 400 agricultural engineers each year, 400 installers of central office telephone equipment, 400 electroplaters, 300 dispensing opticians and 200 anthropologists.

These findings are based on a four-volume study "Tomorrow's Manpower Needs," released recently by the BLS.

Information derived from the study is essential in planning education and training programs to meet future needs and for guidance of young people in choosing careers, said BLS Commissioner Geoffrey H. Moore.

Negro Leader Charles Evers Elected Mayor

Fayette, Miss. — Charles Evers won election as mayor of this biracial community and immediately stressed that "law and order" will prevail.

Violence will not be tolerated, the Negro leader said. One of the first laws of his administration will be to make it illegal for citizens to carry guns or knives longer than two inches.

Evers and five Negro councilmen will assume office in this poverty-stricken Black Belt town July 7. He is the head of Mississippi's first all-black government of a biracial community since Reconstruction days.

Evers, the brother of slain civil rights leader Medgar Evers, unseated R. J. Allen, 73, who had been mayor for the past 18 years. Final returns gave Evers 386 votes to 255 for Allen.

In other Democratic primaries around the state, at least six Negroes won council or aldermanic seats, but Evers was the only Negro mayoralty candidate to win. A number of other Negroes qualified as independents and will run in the June 3 general elections.

Continued Development Of Appalachia Urged

Continuation of the Appalachian regional development program is essential to the nation's goal of eliminating poverty and providing full employment, the AFL-CIO told a Senate Public Works subcommittee.

Miles C. Stanley, testifying for the federation, emphasized that the nation's economic progress requires making up for "decades of neglect" in Appalachia. He said the economy of the 13-state region in turn depends upon the economic gains of the nation.

Stanley, chairman of the AFL-CIO Appalachian Council and president of the West Virginia AFL-CIO, cited facts and figures to support extension of the program as he had previously done before the House Public Works Committee.

He told the Senate subcommittee that labor endorses a report of the Appalachian regional commission which shows great strides have been made under the program in helping the area but that much remains to be done.

Stanley pointed out that the program has made "significant" improvements in planning and building in the areas of transportation, education, health, land reclamation and other areas.

Increase in the rate of economic growth in the region, a decrease in unemployment and a reduction in out-migration, he added, "all argue well for the commission's continuation and even the expansion of its activity into other areas."

Housing is another area of major concern in which the program has made "a substantial contribution," Stanley said. But, he added, "adequate housing in Appalachia continues to be one of the major unmet needs."

Stanley also said the program is having a healthy side effect. Faced with the need for revenue to match federal grants for development programs, state and local governments are considering "meaningful tax reform" of "regressive" tax structures.

Jacob Friedrick Cited By University Regents

Milwaukee, Wis.—Jacob F. Friedrick, retired president of the Milwaukee AFL-CIO, has been commended for "splendid contributions" to education as a member of the University of Wisconsin's board of regents.

A board resolution praised the veteran labor leader for "vigorous advocacy" of low-cost educational opportunity for all youths and dedication to maintaining quality education. Friedrick is completing nine years of service on the board.

Arizona Delegates Push Grape Strikers' Cause

Prescott, Ariz.—Some 200 delegates and guests wound up the fourth biennial convention of the Arizona AFL-CIO here by marching three blocks to a supermarket and putting-up a picket line in behalf of the California grape strikers.

Before adjourning, the delegates had passed a resolution strongly supporting the nationwide boycott of California table grapes instituted by the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee. The convention also condemned the Defense Dept. for increasing its shipments of the fruit to troops in Viet Nam.

In addition, the delegates heard a report on the union's efforts to win bargaining rights for the underpaid, exploited vineyard workers from Manul Chavez, brother of UFWOC Dir. Cesar Chavez. An organizing campaign is now under way in this state, he said, due partly to the use of Arizona grape labels by California growers who saw markets vanishing because of the boycott.

While the delegates—who raised nearly $500 in contributions for the strikers—were picketing Prescott's Safeway store, sympathetic UFWOC supporters were picketing the chain's outlets in Phoenix and Tucson. Safeway is the largest single buyer of the grapes, Chavez said.

Retiring Pres. William D. Shafer, in his report, called for a "good look" by the state AFL-CIO leadership at a political action program geared to getting candidates and raising issues attractive to the membership, and then working more effectively to get out the vote.

Greater use of women in next year's campaign was urged by Mrs. Marcella Beatty, executive director of national AFL-CIO Auxiliaries.

"There'll be a lot of action," she predicted, "and we want a piece of that action."

Mrs. Margaret Thornburgh, western director of COPE's Women's Activities Division, called political action "the biggest job of a state labor group." Mrs. Joan Trenholme, state WAD director, predicted that "unless we do a better job in 1970, we'll end up as we did in 1968," when "we failed." The state last year elected Republicans as U.S. senator and governor and as two of Arizona's three congressmen, and returned GOP majorities in both houses of the legislature.

Other speakers included Gov. Jack Williams; Phoenix Mayor Milton Graham; Stanton E. Smith, AFL-CIO coordinator of state and local central bodies, who discussed poverty, profits and taxes and appealed for aid for the Charleston, S.C., hospital strikers; AFL-CIO Regional Dir. Dan Flanagan; Ann Draper, West Coast union label director for the Clothing Workers; Sec.-Treas. Robert Connolly of the Phoenix Printing Trades Council; State Savings Bonds Dir. W. L. McMullen; Deputy Regional Dir. William Brown of the U.S. Labor Dept. Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training.

Horace Bounds, business manager of Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers Local 570, Tucson, and president of the Southern Arizona Building & Construction Trades Council, was elected president to succeed Shafer, who is chief steward for the Communications Workers in the Flagstaff area. Fred Brown, Laborers Local 479, Tucson, replaced Austin C. Allen, Meat Cutters Local 448, Phoenix, as vice president. Re-elected was Sec.-Treas. Darwin Aycock of Stereotypers & Electrotypers Local 151, Phoenix.

The state AFL-CIO constitution was amended to provide for annual conventions rather than biennial, with Yuma picked for next year's meeting.

Other resolutions called for defeat of the six bills pending in Congress legalizing anti-trust violations by the newspaper industry; condemned Pres. Nixon's plan to cut the Job Corps budget and close 59 training centers; directed the state executive board to establish a speaker corps to tell labor's story; renewed support for the program of the Office of Economic Opportunity, and backed several locals involved in strikes.

Seafarers Hit Plan to Close U.S. Hospital

The Seafarers are protesting the proposed July 1 closing of inpatient facilities at the Public Health Service Hospital in Detroit.

SIU Pres. Paul Hall warned that the closing of the hospital would "deprive merchant seamen and others in the community of critically needed health and medical services which the federal government has historically provided."

In a letter to Sec. of Health, Education & Welfare Robert H. Finch, Hall noted that the facility is the only remaining public health service institution in the Great Lakes region.

The closing of the hospital, Hall added, "in no way eliminates the need for medical services which it now provides" and transfers the task of providing these services to other facilities in the area.

Postal Union Presses Drive For Benefits

The men and women who carry the mail are mad.

They don't think a scheduled 4.1 percent pay raise is nearly enough. They think it's time the federal government picked up the cost of health insurance, instead of only 25 percent of the premium.

And they want a labor relations law that will provide binding arbitration of grievances and an independent panel to adjudicate union-management disputes in the federal service.

More than 3,000 of them—members of the Letter Carriers—came to Washington, D.C., to meet with congressmen and senators from their home states.

Letter Carriers Pres. James H. Rademacher told the opening session of the three-day Political Action Conference that "it's now or never" for the government to determine whether it wants a good postal service.

During the last fiscal year, he said, more than 150,000 persons moved in and out of the Post Office Dept. Only one-third of the 700,000 postal workers, Rademacher reported, have as much as three years service.

The rally is one of a series being sponsored by postal and government employe unions to press major legislative goals.

Test of Support:

Senate Vote Backs Nixon on Job Corps

A Republican-Southern Democratic coalition mustered a 52-40 vote to defeat a Senate resolution asking Pres. Nixon to keep all Job Corps centers open pending a comprehensive study by Congress.

GOP leaders made it a party issue, a test of support for Pres. Nixon in a political skirmish, and delivered the votes of all 40 Republican senators present. Forty Democrats, including several southerners, voted for the resolution. But 12 joined the GOP in rejecting it.

The resolution would not have had the force of law. But added to the outpouring of protests against announced plans to kill off 59 Job Corps centers, it would have put heavy pressure on the Administration to back down.

A so-called "compromise" resolution, by Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.), was rejected on a straight 53-46 party-line vote. It would have emphasized Administration promises that Job Corps trainees in closed camps would be given "equivalent" training opportunities elsewhere.

Sen. Alan Cranston (D-Calif.), sponsor of the resolution protesting the closings, said he felt the protest action has accomplished at least some of its objectives. He cited indications that some centers may be reprieved and said he thinks "a far greater effort" will now be made to help the trainees.

In other congressional developments:

- The House Labor Committee approved a construction safety bill which would require the Secretary of Labor to draft safety and job health standards that contractors on federal projects would have to meet.

Violations could result in cancellation of contracts and repeated violators would be barred from government contracts for a three-year period.

The legislation has to be cleared by the House Rules Committee before it is sent to the floor.

- Pres. Nixon asked Congress to authorize a draft law change which would substitute a lottery system of selecting men for service and make 19-year-olds the most likely to be called up. It is somewhat similar to a proposal Pres. Johnson made two years ago, which Congress failed to approve.
- The House passed a bill to gradually speed up collection of unemployment insurance taxes from employers—moving towards quarterly instead of once-a-year collections. The bill doesn't affect benefits or the amount of employer payments, but it will ease the government's budget problems.
- The Senate approved a $20 million authorization to help the non-commercial Public Broadcasting Corp. for another year. It also extended for five years the program of federal grants to help build educational television and radio stations.
- A House Commerce subcommittee turned down a Nixon Administration proposal and voted to continue the long-established Hill-Burton Act hospital construction and modernization program.

The Administration sought to replace federal construction grants with loan guarantees and use part of the dollar savings for grants to states for out-of-hospital medical services.

The subcommittee voted to continue direct construction grants and also to add a loan guarantee and interest subsidy plan to permit a greater volume of hospital construction and modernization.

Balky Insurance Firm Ordered to Negotiate

Chicago—State Farm Mutual Automobile Insurance Co. lost a two-year battle to stay away from the bargaining table when the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ordered it to negotiate with the Insurance Workers.

Six of the eight appeals judges, sitting en banc, overturned a contrary 1968 decision by a panel of three 7th Circuit judges. By a 6-2 margin the full court ruled that the National Labor Relations Board did not abuse its discretion when it certified the union as the winner of a 1967 election and ordered the Bloomington, Ill., company to bargain with it.

The point at issue was whether or not the NLRB was justified in ordering the election among agents in two claims districts in New York state.

The union had asked for a smaller unit and management for a larger one—either all of New York state, or the company's entire Northeast region. The court enforced the NLRB's order.

"None of the grounds urged by the company for setting aside the board's order is valid," the court majority said. It spelled out its reasoning:

"The board has a wide discretion in designating appropriate units. It is not required . . . to choose the most appropriate unit, but only to choose an appropriate unit within the range of several appropriate units in a given factual situation."

Under the circumstances, the judges concluded, "the reasonableness of the board's determination is clear." They cited among other reasons the fact that the NLRB decision is "consistent with other board decisions that the courts have previously approved."

IWIU Pres. William A. Gillen said the decision reaffirms previous rulings by the Supreme Court and lower courts in the insurance industry's long legal fight over the size of bargaining units.

Potters Elect Lester H. Null As President

East Liverpool, O.—Lester H. Null, Sr., third vice president of the Potters since 1965, was elected president in a membership referendum for a four-year term beginning Aug. 1.

Null is a former president of Potters' Local 220 at the American Radiator & Standard Sanitary plant in New Orleans. He succeeds veteran Pres. Edwin L. Wheatley, who did not run for re-election and will retire soon after the union's annual convention July 7-11 in Anaheim, Calif.

Both Null and Sec.-Treas. George Barbaree won in contested races. Seven incumbent vice presidents were returned to office and two were defeated. New officers are Vice Presidents Jacob F. Schwab of New Orleans, succeeding Null; Joseph Galvin, Jr. of Pomona, N.J., and Thomas A. Shuman of Tiffin, O.

Null began his rise to national office when Wheatley named him an international representative in 1958. He serviced many local unions in the South, and often was assigned to assist elsewhere as a "troubleshooter" in organizing and bargaining.

Null was born in Hahn, Mo., May 21, 1924.

Through Tripartite Structure:

Meany Hails Achievements Of ILO Over 50-Year Span

By Duane Emme

Philadelphia—The Intl. Labor Organization's "positive accomplishments have far outweighed its failings" in advancing the welfare and freedom of workers, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared here.

At the same time, Meany warned that there must be "no tampering" with the tripartite structure of the United Nations specialized agency if it is to continue to be successful.

Meany spoke at a three-day conference convened by Temple University to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the ILO and the 25th anniversary of an historic ILO conference held here.

Out of that 1944 meeting, also on Temple's campus, came the Declaration of Philadelphia, a document that reaffirmed ILO's goals and became its policy guide in the pursuit of human rights and social progress after World War II.

At the commemorative conference, nearly 100 leaders in labor, management, education and government from many parts of the world examined ILO's past and the challenges in its future.

Major speakers agreed that the ILO has significantly improved workers' conditions and living standards. Two of them—Labor Sec. George P. Shultz and Edwin P. Neilan, U.S. employer delegate to the ILO—echoed Meany's warning against interfering with the agency's government-labor-employer structure.

This solid stand of U.S. government, labor and management reflected concern over reports that Soviet-bloc nations might try at the ILO conference in June to convert the organization into one made up solely of government representatives.

The tripartite structure of ILO, Meany said, is its "fundamental strength." In free nations, he noted, worker representatives "know the needs of workers" and they cooperate with employers and governments in advancing these needs.

"It was the genius of the founding fathers of ILO," Meany added, "to recognize that only by securing the participation of the representatives of workers, employers and governments that the welfare of workers could be effectively improved."

Meany said it was difficult to understand why the U.S. has ratified "only a handful" of ILO-adopted conventions when "our standards are equal to or better" than most of those involved. He urged Pres. Nixon and Congress to secure ratification of these conventions.

On the other hand, Meany emphasized that Communist nations ratify conventions and then "brazenly" deny the rights and working conditions that are called for. He urged ILO to live up to its responsibilities to police its conventions.

On balance, Meany found that ILO's achievements have more than offset its shortcomings and "if Sam Gompers could see the ILO today he would be proud of what he helped to create." Gompers was chairman of a commission at the 1919 Paris Peace Conference out of which came the ILO.

Shultz praised American labor's "steadfast" interest and participation in the "world's leading tripartite organization." It is "highly important," he said, that the organization be maintained in its present form.

"For half a century the ILO has sought to contribute to international peace," Shultz declared, and "it has pointed the family of nations toward the highest possible goal—human justice."

In line with ILO's appeals to nations to develop manpower programs and reduce unemployment, Shultz discussed current efforts in the United States to provide job-training for workers and reduce inflation without increasing unemployment.

The need to prevent any rise in unemployment in the United States "is especially critical," Shultz stated, because the increase would come in poverty areas where the jobless rate is even more "alarmingly high."

Neilan, chairman of the Bank of Delaware's board and past president of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, said he was proud to be part of ILO's "never-ending search for social justice for working people throughout the world."

Other major conference speakers included, C. Wilfred Jenks, principal deputy director-general of the ILO, who helped shape the Philadelphia Declaration, and Assistant Sec. of Labor George L-P Weaver, chairman of ILO's governing body.

AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman observed during a panel discussion on social security that the United States lags behind other developed ILO nations in providing security for older persons and health facilities for all citizens. He stressed the need of a national health insurance system as advocated by the AFL-CIO.

Robert M. McGlotten, presently serving as labor director of the National Alliance of Businessmen on assignment from the AFL-CIO, spoke on manpower activities in the United States as part of a panel on employment programs.

Pearl S. Buck, Nobel prize winner in literature, was the main speaker at a conference banquet. She related her more than 40 years of life in Asia to the problems of the continent and its need for a strong labor movement.

CONGRATULATIONS are extended by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to Rudolph Faupl, Machinists representative, who has been reappointed by Pres. Nixon as the U.S. worker delegate to the Intl. Labor Organization. First appointed to the post by the late Pres. Eisenhower in 1958, Faupl has been reappointed by every President since.

Bill Urged to Strengthen Older Americans Act

A bill to extend and improve the nation's Older Americans Act would be a "major step forward" in meeting the "myriad problems" of the elderly, the AFL-CIO told the House Select Subcommittee on Education.

Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller of the federation's Dept. of Legislation assured Chairman John Brademas (D-Ind.) and Rep. Ogden R. Reid (R-N.Y.) of AFL-CIO support for a bill they introduced and urged the subcommittee to give it favorable consideration.

The Brademas-Reid resolution would absorb the "foster grandparent" program and establish a National Older Americans Volunteer Program. "We support these provisions," Biemiller said. Later the resolution was reported out to the full Education & Labor Committee.

The foster grandparent program has been administered by the Administration on Aging under a contract with the Office of Economic Opportunity. A witness told the subcommittee that it has proved its value and should be maintained and expanded.

Mrs. Dorothy Ezelle of Louisville, advisory board chairman for Kentucky, said the foster grandparent program has been notably helpful to low-income persons over 60 who work with children in two Kentucky homes for the retarded.

Mrs. Ezelle, the wife of Sec.-Treas. Sam Ezelle of the Kentucky AFL-CIO, is a candidate for state representative in her district as an outgrowth of her interest in the handicapped. Formerly active in the Communications Workers, she has served as executive secretary of the Kentucky Association for Retarded Children and now serves on the Governor's Commission for Employment of the Handicapped.

"I am proud to pay my expenses to Washington," she told the sub committee members, in urging that the foster grandparent program be "approved with enthusiasm," and that the budget be expanded.

The program is that unique kind which "benefits everyone—the aged, the handicapped, society, all of us"—she said.

Mrs. Ezelle reported that Kentucky now has 62 foster grandparents, with 11 more ready to volunteer. All are older persons who could not take full-time jobs without losing their main source of income—social security benefits—she said.

The workers are paid the federal minimum wage for working with retarded children four hours a day. This reimburses them for transportation and other out-of-pocket costs, the witness testified.

She listed these advantages:

The foster grandparent becomes a familiar friend to the child.

The adults acquire a new zest for life.

Children become more responsive to training efforts; they take more interest, cooperate better, show they appreciate attention and affection.

Chemical Firms' Growth Seen Boon to Workers

Geneva—Workers should be the principal beneficiaries of the rapid expansion of chemical industries throughout the world, a special Intl. Labor Organization committee found.

The committee on chemical industries also stressed at the conclusion of the two-week session that it is the "legitimate interest" of unions to make sure that workers "obtain their share of the benefits of technological change."

Marshall Shafer, secretary-treasurer of the AFL-CIO Chemical Workers, was worker vice chairman of the conference of labor, management and government delegates from 24 countries.

In his final statement as spokesman for the worker group Shafer told the committee that the workers had not obtained all that they wanted, but that the results "defend the interests we were defending" and the committee had once again proved the "value of these sessions."

Vice Pres. Elwood D. Swisher, of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, was the other member of the AFL-CIO team at the committee's seventh session.

Swisher cited the committee's emphasis throughout its conclusions on management's obligation to consult the workers through their spokesmen before decisions affecting their jobs are taken.

The committee agreed that such consultations in an industry where rapid technological changes are the rule should be held at the "earliest possible stage."

Much attention was also given to the problem of the mental strain imposed on workers by the concentration demanded of them in new manufacturing processes. "Continuous shift schedules," it was emphasized, "should include the longest possible leisure periods."

The committee also went into the need for "adequate, timely and, as far as possible, free facilities for retraining" of workers who might have to change jobs because of technological innovations or health factors.

Similarly, older and handicapped workers who are unable to adapt to changes should be protected through "adequate" pensions and other social security provisions.

Lindbergh Inducted By Air Line Pilots

Charles A. Lindbergh, who flew the Spirit of St. Louis from New York to Paris alone in 1927, became an honorary member of the Air Line Pilots at a testimonial dinner in Washington.

Pres. Charles R. Ruby presented Lindbergh with a union membership pin and a plaque symbolic of Lindbergh's aviation achievements. Guests at the ceremony included many noted aviation pioneers.

Rubber Union Urges Probe Of Gov. Rhodes

Akron—A Rubber Workers district council has called for a full-scale investigation of Ohio's Gov. James A. Rhodes following published charges linking him to underworld figures and accusing him of financial irregularities.

A resolution adopted by 211 delegates to a meeting of the URW District 1 council noted an exposé by Life magazine which alleged that the Republican governor "has been dipping into slush funds for years."

The article also suggested an unsavory relationship between Gov. Rhodes and Yonnie Licavoli, a convicted murderer who, Life charged, has been a kingpin in Mafia operations even while serving in the Ohio State Penitentiary.

"The good name of more than 10.5 million citizens of Ohio has been tarnished by this exposé," the resolution said.

The delegates asked that a blue ribbon commission be set up to hold open hearings on the charges against Rhodes so the "citizens of Ohio may conclusively know the true character" of the governor.

Conference Draws 3,000:

Building Trades Delegates Press Legislative Program

to ensure prevailing wages on buildings built to be leased to the Post Office Dept. and other federal agencies.

They also talked about tax justice and social security improvements, about the need for a higher minimum wage and for strengthened equal employment opportunity. They called for congressional action on housing funds, consumer protection and education, among others.

A "very goodly portion" of the BCTD's legislative program will be "enthusiastically" supported by the House Democratic leadership, Majority Leader Carl Albert (D-Okla.) told the conference.

He said he finds it "just impossible" to understand opposition to the labor-backed job safety bills. On the site picketing bill, Albert reiterated his strong personal support, but said threats of a Senate filibuster such as that which killed repeal of Taft-Hartley Sec. 14(b) have made House members reluctant to stick their necks out unless they are sure it will pass the Senate.

If it is taken up first in the Senate, he said, it will be actively supported by House Democratic leaders for final passage.

House Minority Leader Gerald R. Ford (R-Mich.) told the delegates that if they were willing to "compromise" then "I think we can achieve some of these goals that are on your legislative program."

He said he personally supports the "sound principles" of the position taken by the Secretary of Labor who coupled easing the secondary boycott restrictions on construction site picketing with toughening of other restrictive provisions.

Louis Sherman, general counsel of the department, reminded the conference that the labor-backed site picketing bill is essentially the same as legislation introduced in 1959 by the Eisenhower Administration. The inequities it is designed to correct, he said, have been acknowledged by five presidential administrations.

Both the Democratic and Republican assistant leaders in the Senate gave strong personal endorsements to site picketing legislation.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) was greeted with a prolonged ovation.

"I will fight to get the construction safety bill passed this year, and I am with you 100 percent on the issue of site picketing," he said. As for labor's overall program, Kennedy said he intends to keep his COPE record of all "right" votes intact.

His Republican counterpart, Sen. Hugh Scott of Pennsylvania, termed the labor-backed site picketing legislation a "good" bill and said he opposes "restrictive" amendments.

Labor Sec. George P. Shultz and Transportation Sec. John A. Volpe received the friendly attention of the delegates as they addressed the conference on its opening day.

Housing & Urban Development Sec. George W. Romney was welcomed with similar warm applause when he was introduced. But before he concluded, there were boos from the audience and applause where he didn't want it.

Just a few minutes earlier, Romney had left another meeting with the farewell: "I'm going now to a conference of the building trades and really lay it on the line to them."

He told the delegates that building trades pay raises are feeding inflation, that apprenticeship standards are too high, that the Davis-Bacon Act requiring prevailing wages on federally-assisted housing is too costly. He warned "that there are people already talking about compulsory arbitration in the building trades."

"Construction wage rates are rising faster than any other," Romney chided. And the delegates applauded.

"There is every indication that future settlements may be higher," he complained. More applause.

Later, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller told the delegates that Romney's recitation of wage gains won by building trades unions was "a great tribute" to their efforts. "I was very much impressed by it," he said. "Keep up the good work."

Earlier, Shultz said the Administration is supporting "fully and unambiguously" the construction safety bill. He said he hopes that "before long" there will be a presidential mesage dealing with "a comprehensive health and safety bill."

Shultz noted the steady increase in minority group employment in the building crafts and urged that the progress be continued.

He acknowledged that "empty exhortations to unions and management" to avoid inflationary actions "just haven't been practical." But he urged negotiators not to base their actions on an assumption that living costs will continue to rise at their present level.

Volpe told the delegates he was impressed with the special training programs run by the Operating Engineers and the work done by other unions in opening up job opportunities to minority groups.

Programs such as these, he said, are tapping "a tremendous reservoir of unused ability."

Delegates heard from Chairman Carl D. Perkins (D-Ky.) of the House Labor Committee and from Chairman Ralph W. Yarborough (D-Tex.) of the Senate Labor Committee.

Other congressional speakers included Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N.J.), Rep. William H. Ayres (R-Ohio), Rep. William B. Widnall (R-N.J.), Sen. Harrison A. Williams (D-N.J.) and Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.). All are high-seniority members of congressional committees dealing with legislation affecting the building trades.

BCTD Pres. C. J. Haggerty urged the delegates to follow up on their legislative contacts when they returned home. He said their efforts represent "the single most important factor" in determining whether labor's program is enacted.

2,500 Keep Up Strike Against Distillery Firm

Englewood, N.J.—Nearly 2,500 members of the Distillery Workers will stay on strike against three plants of the National Distilling Products Co. until an acceptable agreement is reached, union Pres. Mort Brandenburg announced.

The strike began May 1, Brandenburg said, when a "woefully inadequate" offer by the big distilling firm left the union no alternative except to walk out.

Picket lines are being respected by other unions at company locations in Louisville and Frankfort, Ky., and Cincinnati, O. The Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service brought the disputants together for a single meeting, but no progress was made, according to the union spokesman.

Major issues in the strike are wages, including a cost-of-living clause, and health-welfare benefits.

Brandenburg, who heads the union negotiating team, said it expects to set this year's contract pattern at either Seagram or Schenley instead of National.

On-Site Picketing Bill Backed As It Stands

A House Labor subcommittee has been urged to confine pending legislation covering on-site picketing to that subject alone and avoid irrelevant issues that may cause confusion.

A bill introduced by Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N.J.) would give a union the right to picket a multi-employer construction site if it has a dispute with one of the contractors there.

In a letter to Thompson, chairman of the Special Subcommittee on Labor, the AFL-CIO called on Congress to take prompt action on the legislation.

Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller of the federation's Dept. of Legislation told Thompson that the AFL-CIO fully supports efforts of the building and construction trades unions in their drive for passage of the bill.

Biemiller said the strict application of the secondary boycott prohibition now contained in the National Labor Relations Act is widely regarded as "unfair, unsound and unjustified when applied to building and construction trades workers."

Long-Standing Injustice

Thompson's bill to amend that section of the NLRA is designed to correct the long-standing injustice that discriminates unfairly against the building trades workers, Biemiller noted.

He said that the labor movement is pleased at Labor Sec. George P. Shultz's expression of support for the situs picketing principle, but is disturbed by some aspects of his testimony before the subcommittee.

"It is unfortunate," Biemiller noted, "that the Administration's stand has been somewhat muddied by reason of suggestions" made by Shultz.

Not Relevant

"Some of these suggestions are neither germane nor relevant to the purpose of the legislation, such as the proposal to allow enforcement of collective bargaining agreements by injunctions as well as damage suits," Biemiller added.

Shultz, in expressing support for situs picketing, called for certain "safeguards" in the proposed legislation.

In earlier testimony, Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. noted that Thompson's bill contains all the safeguards or limitations the Eisenhower Administration thought were necessary and a few developed in years since.

Apprenticeship Outreach Goal 83% Complete

Apprenticeship Outreach programs—with still about five months to run—have attained 83 percent of the intended goal in placing minority group youngsters in the skilled trades.

Labor Sec. George P. Shultz reported that a total of 2,758 minority apprentices have been aided by Apprenticeship Outreach since the Labor Dept. began funding the program 27 months ago.

Besides the 2,758 indentured apprentices, 2,077 more have passed apprenticeship examinations in the 18 building and construction trades and are waiting for referral to apprenticeship committees. Another 516 have been referred to the apprenticeship committees.

The 10 sponsors of the Apprenticeship Outreach program, including the local building and construction trades councils of the AFL-CIO, have a combined goal of placing 3,360 youths in apprenticeship.

Meany Scores Farm Labor Board Plan

Full Union Rights Urged For Pickers

By David L. Perlman

An Administration proposal to give "second class" bargaining rights to farm workers is "completely unacceptable," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told Congress.

Meany urged the Senate's Labor subcommittee to approve legislation that would give workers on large farms the same right to union recognition and collective bargaining that other Americans have had for more than 30 years.

He said the AFL-CIO welcomes the endorsement by Labor Sec. George P. Shultz of the principle that farm workers should have union rights under law.

But he stressed that the plan Shultz outlined earlier this month takes back with one hand what is given with the other.

Its "special rules and procedures," Meany charged, would "make it more difficult for farm workers to form unions and to secure recognition than for other workers."

These rules would be administered by a special Farm Labor Relations Board "stacked" in favor of the big agricultural employers, Meany noted.

And farm employers, by invoking what would amount to compulsory arbitration, could prevent a strike during the harvest season—"the only time that migratory workers are employed, and the only time that any farm workers can strike effectively."

To top it off, Meany said, the list of available arbitrators would be drawn up by the Secretary of Agriculture.

"As far as the farm workers are concerned," he told the Senate panel, "that is indeed putting the fox in charge of the henhouse. The Dept. of Agriculture has long been noted for its tender loving care of the nation's big farmers—and for its callous indifference to the welfare of farm workers."

The excuse given for exempting the big factory farms from the National Labor Relations Act is that farm products are "perishable at harvest time," Meany noted.

But food is also perishable when it is trucked to market and sold in the stores, he pointed out. Yet no one argues that truck drivers or store clerks be barred from striking.

"No," Meany told the senators. "Perishability of grapes or to-

Congress Pressed to Vote Funds for Vital Programs

FARM WORKERS are entitled to the same collective bargaining rights as all other American workers, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany emphasized in testimony before the Senate Labor subcommittee. With Meany at the witness table are AFL-CIO Organizing Dir. William L. Kircher, Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, and Thomas E. Harris, associate general counsel.

Labor Cites Unfulfilled Promises

The AFL-CIO asked Congress to match its promises to the American people with performance—by voting the money needed to carry out the programs it has written into law.

Unless it does so, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller testified, the nation's education, health, housing and other high-priority domestic programs will be drastically short-changed.

He told a House Appropriations subcommittee that "the American people have a right to assume Congress means what it says" when it passes legislation authorizing large-scale programs to meet large-scale needs.

The need hasn't diminished, Biemiller noted, but the budget request to Congress asks only half the amount authorized for the basic aid to education program. Unless Congress raises the figure, some 3.5 million poor children won't get the catch-up education they need.

Congress is being asked—in the Administration's budget request for the fiscal year starting July 1—to appropriate only one-third of the amount it authorized to improve vocational education.

And it is also being asked to put a lower priority on uncovering wage-hour violations and enforcing safety rules than on a "fishing expedition" into welfare and pension plan reports.

Item by item, in a 54-page supplemental statement as well as oral testimony before two subcommittees, the AFL-CIO spelled out

Meany Heads Trustees:

Hoehler to Direct New Studies Center

The board of trustees of the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center, at its initial meeting in Washington, named Fred K. Hoehler, Jr., to direct the center which will go into operation next Labor Day.

The board also elected AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany as chairman.

Elected secretary of the board was Walter G. Davis, education director of the federation. AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler will serve as secretary-treasurer of the center until his retirement from the AFL-CIO on June 30 and will then be replaced on the center board by Lane Kirkland, who has been elected to fill the unexpired AFL-CIO term.

The center will initially be located at 1500 Massachusetts Ave., N.W., in Washington, D.C., where 6,133 square feet of space has been leased for two years for classroom, conference and office facilities.

Hoehler, who is 50, is professor of labor and industrial relations at Michigan State University, where he is also associate director of the School of Labor & Industrial Relations.

He has had a long career in labor education. An Air Force veteran, he was assistant professor of public administration, University of Puerto Rico, 1947-49; assistant professor of political science, and acting head, Labor Education Service, Pennsylvania State University, 1949-54; assistant director, Dept. of Social Security, AFL and AFL-CIO, 1954-56, and education director, Steelworkers, 1965-67. Hoehler first joined Michigan State in 1956.

Other board members are:

Pres. Peter T. Schoemann of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters, chairman of the AFL-CIO Committee on Education; former Sec. of Labor Willard Wirtz; Theodore Kheel,

Real Earnings Drop Sharply, Prices Jump

The buying power of rank-and-file workers' pay checks in April dropped to its lowest level in a year as a sharp rise in prices more than offset small gains in takehome pay, the Labor Dept. reported.

A six-tenths of 1 percent increase in living costs sent the Consumer Price Index to 126.4 percent of the 1957-59 base period. The level was 5.4 percent higher than April 1968, the largest over-the-year increase since 1951.

Over the past three months, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported, consumer prices have gone up at an

Community Services Focus on Social Change

Labor's bonds with the communities where its members live and work were reaffirmed by more than 500 participants in the 14th annual AFL-CIO National Conference on Community Services.

At workshops and sessions that stretched from 7:30 a.m. breakfast meetings to evening programs running until 10 p.m., the theme was the challenge of social change.

Whatever the stresses, speakers urged, cooperation rather than confrontation within the community is the route to take.

Labor's historic position, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told the delegates, is that "all must benefit for any to benefit." The labor movement, he said, must be flexible enough to meet changing conditions.

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne reminded the conference that trade unions have been and are a part of social change in America. Beirne, who is stepping down as chairman of the AFL-CIO Community Services Committee because of his new responsibilities in international labor affairs, said the community services program—"quietly and without fanfare"—has overcome bigotry, brought together diverse elements in cities to cooperate in needed programs and provided person-to-person help.

Participants in the conference included 180 full-time AFL-CIO community service staffers from 132

Surtax Support Barred Without Major Reform

Injustice will be piled on injustice if the income tax surcharge is extended without a major reform of the federal tax laws, the AFL-CIO told Congress.

In a statement to the House Ways & Means Committee, the federation spelled out the reasons why labor cannot support a 10 percent tax surcharge until it is linked to tax reforms going beyond the Nixon Administration's proposals.

Unless major loopholes are closed, the federation noted, wealthy individuals and big corporations will continue to escape both the regular tax and the surcharge on a large portion of their income.

Yet the tax burden on wage-earners will go up, because the 10 percent surcharge would be in effect for a full year. Last year, the 10 percent rate applied for only nine months, amounting to a 7.5 percent boost in the tax bill for the year. Thus the proposed extension would amount to an additional increase for the ordinary worker.

That isn't fair, the AFL-CIO told

FLAGS FLYING, 400 farm workers march to the Mexican border with their ranks bolstered by the presence of U.S. senators and congressmen, clergymen, labor union members and other supporters. Besides Senators Ralph Yarborough (D-Tex.) and Walter F. Mondale (D-Minn.), shown front and center, the marchers included AFL-CIO Dir. of Organization William L. Kircher, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), and Representatives James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.) and John V. Tunney (D-Calif.). At the border, Mexican and U.S. labor representatives vowed to help end the hiring of "green card" visa holders to break strikes of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee.

Grape Workers' March to Border Stirs Pledge of Mutual Support

Calexico, Calif.—American and Mexican union members clasped hands across the border here in a pledge of mutual support that climaxed a nine-day march to dramatize the plight of striking farm workers.

Cesar Chavez, head of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, and AFL-CIO Dir. of Organization William L. Kircher were among seven unionists who stood on the American side of the border fence under a broiling sun. Their Mexican counterparts stood on the Mexicali side and shook hands on a promise of international cooperation in lifting the farm workers on both sides of the border out of poverty and despair.

The pledge of assistance, and the march in 110-degree heat, both were intended as a warning to American growers that Mexican workers can no longer be used to break strikes of U.S. field hands.

Soon after the march ended, some of the participants flew back to Washington for hearings by a Senate subcommittee into the use by growers of migrant Mexican laborers to break strikes.

Among them were Senators Walter F. Mondale (D-Minn.), Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), Ralph Yarborough (D-Tex.) and Representatives James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.) and John V. Tunney (D-Calif.).

O'Hara told the Subcommittee on Migratory Labor, which Mondale heads, that he stood at the Calexico-Mexicali border at 2:30 a.m. one morning and watched Mexican farm workers pour across in a steady stream, green visa cards in hand, to wait on the U.S. side for hiring bosses to take them to fields in the Coachella Valley where the UFWOC is on strike for recognition.

"The entry of green card workers is increasing at a fantastic rate," O'Hara said. "It is easy to cross because the requirements are not as tight as they should be."

The Michigan congressman urged several legal changes to prevent the loss of U.S. jobs. One of them, in a bill he proposed, would make illegal entry an unfair practice under the labor law.

UFWOC Organizer Peter Velasco, who also took part in the march to the border, told the subcommittee "they are using the greencarders to break our strike. They don't even tell them they're to be used as strikebreakers."

At Calexico, he said, he watched contractors load buses with alien farm workers and then saw the buses return 16 hours later with workers who had stooped in the fields and stood in the buses over the whole period for eight hours' pay—about $12.

"It's difficult to form a union under those conditions," said Velasco. Strong legislation is needed, he emphasized, to encourage farm workers to form legally sanctioned unions, to protect the unions in their infancy, to prohibit the importation of out-of-state workers to help employers smash unions.

"We need a power equal to the power of the growers," he asserted.

Eyewitness Report

After the first day's session, Mondale read into the record a report of UFWOC staff member David Averbuck on border crossing.

Averbuck wrote that about Apr. 22, 1969, he told the head of the U.S. Border Patrol office at El Centro, Calif., that a farm labor contractor from Indio was "illegally recruiting workers in Mexicali to break" union efforts.

When a busload came to the station, the border patrol officer detained it for only four minutes—six seconds per passenger—and did not ask where it was going. Bus riders, Averbuck said, never are told where they are going. He added: "When we talked with the workers, none were aware . . . that a dispute existed."

When the farm workers struck Coachella growers last year, "greencarders" were bussed into the valley to break the strike, UFWOC witnesses testified.

Kircher called the march from Indio to Calexico, and the rally that followed the border handshake a "stirring manifestation of solidarity" among workers and the community groups in sympathy with their struggles.

The line of marching men and women moved at the rate of about 12 miles a day, from Indio through Coachella, past the Salton Sea, down State Route 111 through Brawley, El Centro, the Imperial Valley and into Calexico. Nights were spent at the homes of Mexican-American friends, or in sleeping bags on the side of the road.

The final rally was addressed by Mondale, Kennedy, Yarborough, O'Hara, Chavez, Kircher, and representatives of the Mexican Confederation of Labor.

Governor Backs Grape Boycott

Annapolis—Maryland Gov. Marvin Mandel wishes the grape strikers "success in your long fight for proper working and living conditions," he said in a message to Dir. Cesar Chavez of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee.

The letter constitutes an endorsement of the farm workers' strike and boycott of California table grapes, Mandel's press secretary said. UFWOC thanked Mandel for being the first state governor to voice his support publicly.

In Baltimore, several hundred boycott supporters picketed a hotel where the annual stockholders' meeting of Safeway Stores, Inc., was being held because Safeway still displays California grapes. And Mayor Thomas J. D'Alesandro reiterated his intention not to purchase any of the struck grapes for city institutions.

Unfair to Workers:

Farm Labor Board Plan Hit by Meany

matoes is not the issue. Perishability of people—their human dignity and economic well being—is the issue."

He warned that "continued denial of the right of farm workers to organize and bargain collectively . . . will surely lead to more farm labor strife, because farm workers have no other way to present their grievances and have their demands heard and acted upon."

It will also "perpetuate the poverty and degradation of men, women and, shamefully, the children, who harvest so much of the food and fiber produced in this nation."

And, he served notice, it also means "the continuance by all of American labor of the boycott against California table grapes."

That boycott will only end, he said, when employers "let their employes exercise their right as human beings to join a union and bargain collectively."

Meany spoke of the change that has taken place in American agriculture—its increasing dominance by a few large corporate farms marked by "wages well below poverty levels, primitive living conditions and medieval terms of employment and working conditions."

In the past, Meany noted, the AFL-CIO supported legislation to help farmers even if it meant higher food prices "because we have never looked for bargains at the expense of some other group."

Now, he told the subcommittee, "the picture has changed and we in labor are taking a fresh look. Instead of helping the average farmer, these programs have put the squeeze on him. The big operators are not only reaping the bulk of the crops, they are reaping a rich harvest of subsidies. And they have set a cheap labor standard."

The AFL-CIO, he said, still supports help for the family farmer. But huge payments to large and profitable agri-businesses "cannot be justified."

Meany took apart one by one the special provisions the Administration proposed for labor-management relations in agriculture.

He said a flat ban on union recognition except by an election ignores the experience under the National Labor Relations Act that "anti-union employers will commit massive, flagrant and repeated unfair labor practices that preclude the holding of a fair election."

Although not spelled out, the Administration seems to be asking some sort of special prohibition against consumer boycotts of farm products, Meany noted. He said the AFL-CIO believes any group "has a constitutional right under the First Amendment to urge consumers not to buy a particular product."

Apart from the fact that it would be stacked against workers, the proposal to duplicate the entire NLRB apparatus with a separate farm labor board and staff "is as fatuous from the point of rational government administration as any I have seen during my years in Washington."

The cost "would be astronomical in proportion to the volume of business it would have," Meany said, and the staff of such a board "would spend most of its time looking out the window."

A special 10-day notice of intent to strike, in addition to notices already required under law when a union has a contract, would be useful primarily to give growers time to recruit strikebreakers.

And if a grower chooses to avoid a strike during the harvest season by agreeing to accept the recommendation of an arbitrator, the effect would be compulsory arbitration since the union's right to strike after the harvest is in would be "valueless."

"I don't believe Congress has a right" to pass such a one-sided law, he declared. "I say that's class legislation in favor of the grower."

Jabbing his finger for emphasis, the AFL-CIO president told the Senate panel, "There's just no justice in denying farm workers the rights every other worker has. Just no justice."

AFL-CIO Spells Out Its Opposition To Surtax Until Tied to 'Tax Justice'

the committee as it moved into closed door hearings to write the tax legislation.

"Those who avoid their fair share of taxes through capital gains, depletion allowances, fast depreciation write-offs, tax-exempt state and local bond interest, and other tax-escape routes will pay no surtax on such exempt income."

The AFL-CIO told the committee that the "vast majority of Americans who pay their full tax share" expect and deserve tax justice.

"They know that the tax structure has drifted far afield from the American standard of fair play. . . . They also know that, when a privileged few are able to avoid the tax collector, others must reach deeper into their pockets."

The AFL-CIO statement charged that the present, loophole-ridden tax structure "is rigged against those whose livelihood comes from the work they do. It is rigged in favor of those who derive their income from the work their money does for them. As a result, the gap between workers' earnings and take-home pay is unnecessarily large while the tax burden on too many of great wealth and taxpaying ability is unconscionably small."

The statement noted that retrogressive state and local taxes have added to the disproportionate burden on the poor and middle-income groups. It pointed out that "rising prices also have greatest impact on those who must consume high proportions of their income and have little, if any, left to save and invest."

While the average person has been squeezed by the combination of higher prices and higher taxes, "those who invest in stocks, bonds, real estate, or receive other forms of unearned income, have suffered no losses in take-home pay." And corporate profit rates and dividend payouts have soared, while interest rates reached all-time highs.

The government needs continued high tax revenues, the statement acknowledged. "We cannot risk setting the stage for meat-axe federal budget cutting."

But, it stressed, "the injustices in the nation's revenue-raising methods cannot be ignored—or compounded through enactment of a tax increase based on a structure that is inequitable."

The federation statement included the text of the tax policy statement adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council a week earlier.

It spelled out the specific tax reforms that the AFL-CIO has urged.

Earlier this year, the federation had presented to the Ways & Means Committee labor's program for tax justice. It strongly urged its adoption.

Now, as a result of the Executive Council action, the AFL-CIO was speaking in blunter terms. It was saying that the trade union movement expected a comprehensive tax reform program to be enacted this year. And until this is done, the AFL-CIO won't give its support to a bill extending the 10 percent surcharge.

As the council put it in its statement, "The time to bring the American standard of fair play into the tax structure is now."

Under Walsh-Healey Act:

Stiffer Safety Rules Ordered by Shultz

Revised safety and health standards aimed at providing greater protection for 46 million workers under the Walsh-Healey Public Contracts Act have been ordered by Labor Sec. George P. Shultz.

The law sets basic labor standards for work done under federal contracts over $10,000 in value. The revision, effective May 30, updates standards in effect under the law since 1960.

The changes are aimed at reducing excessive noise, air contaminants, fires and accidents in the workplace. They were recommended by the National Safety Advisory Committee, made up of labor, management and public members.

Although the new standards are lower in some areas than those previously recommended by former Labor Sec. Willard Wirtz, the committee said the modifications are "not major enough" to risk further delay in applying new standards.

Shultz and the Administration have been the target of a massive campaign by the National Association of Manufacturers and other business groups to block tougher standards.

The revision brings into the Act an occupational noise standard to reduce the danger of loss of hearing from job noise. The standard sets a maximum sound-measure level of 90 decibels. Wirtz had proposed an immediate 92-decibel limit going to 85 decibels in 1971.

The 90-decibel level was unanimously recommended by five organizations concerned with the development of noise criteria: American Academy of Occupational Medicine, American Industrial Hygiene Association, American Conference of Government Industrial Hygienists and American Academy of Ophthamology & Otolaryngology.

The revision sets a limit for respirable coal dust in mines at 4.5 milligrams per cubic meter of air, the level recently recommended by the Administration in a coal mine safety bill now before Congress.

The new coal dust standard appears as part of a series of other standards designed to control air contaminants, including the adoption of certain Threshold Limit Values set forth by the American Conference of Government Industrial Hygienists.

Also included in the new standards are:

- Nationally recognized consensus safety standards, such as the National Fire Protection Association code and safety measures set by the U.S. of America Standards Institute.
- Regulations established by federal agencies, including ordnance standards of the Defense Dept. and hazardous materials standards of the Transportation Dept.

Shultz said he will shortly issue interpretative guidelines for consideration of variations from standards in cases where the feasibility of application might be questioned.

The committee emphasized two aspects of setting standards—one, that "the goal is the protection of the health and safety" of workers; two, that the standards should be viewed as the best available and "not immutable."

"Constant review of criteria and frequent reaffirmation of the basic philosophy of protecting the individual," it asserted, "are essential to any program to reduce the rate of injury."

The committee also asked Shultz to appoint individuals not directly concerned in the enforcement of the standards to continuously review their application and report to him at least annually.

Labor members on the 15-member committee are: George Taylor of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research; Alan Burch, safety director, Operating Engineers; Steelworkers Sec.-Treas. Walter J. Burke; Brewery Workers Sec.-Treas. Arthur P. Gildea; Vice Pres. Elwood Swisher, Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers.

DIRECTOR of the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center, scheduled to open on Labor Day, is Fred K. Hoehler, Jr., second from left, professor of labor and industrial relations at Michigan State University. Hoehler was chosen by the center's board of trustees which also elected AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany as its chairman and AFL-CIO Education Dir. Walter G. Davis, right, as secretary of the board. Lane Kirkland, left, becomes the center's secretary-treasurer when he succeeds William F. Schnitzler as AFL-CIO secretary-treasurer, July 1.

Real Earnings Decline As CPI Continues Rise

annual rate of 7.6 percent—steepest climb for a comparable period since mid-1956.

Gross average weekly earnings of production and non-supervisory workers rose 8 cents in April to $112.13, as a 1 cent rise in hourly earnings was counterbalanced by a one-tenth of an hour decrease in the workweek.

For the worker with three dependents, weekly take-home pay rose 6 cents from March to $98.11. For the worker with no dependents, the increase was the same to $89.14.

Real spendable earnings—take home pay adjusted to take account of price rises since 1957-59—fell six-tenths of 1 percent to $77.62 a week for a worker with three dependents, the lowest level since last April. For the worker with no dependents the over-the-month drop was 40 cents to $70.52

The decline in purchasing power between March and April ran through most major industry divisions. It was down about 1 percent in manufacturing and trade, and 1.7 percent lower in finance industries.

Higher prices for food and services—particularly household services such as mortgage interest charges on FHA loans, electric rates and home repairs—accounted for a large part of the April cost of living advance.

Interest Charges Soar

Arnold Chase, BLS assistant commissioner, reported that mortgage interest charges climbed 3.3 percent in April and are up 24 percent over the year as measured in the CPI.

He also reported that medical care costs "continued rising sharply," led by increases in dentists' fees. Medical care services have gone up nearly 8.5 percent over the year. Other services on the rise were movie admissions, auto insurance and local transit fares.

Food prices rose seven-tenths of 1 percent, mostly due to higher meat prices, especially beef. Restaurant prices also continued to climb. Apparel prices increased six-tenths of 1 percent. Also rising in April were prices for furniture, used cars, alcoholic beverages and cigarettes.

The Wholesale Price Index—usually a forerunner of price increases—rose by two-tenths of 1 percent in April to 111.9 percent of the 1957-59 average. The index was up 1.1 percent over the past three months, and 3.3 percent over the year.

Approximately 117,000 workers will receive cost-of-living pay boosts as a result of the rise in the April CPI. For 62,100 workers, mostly in aerospace, parts and machinery industries, the increases will range from 3 to 7 cents an hour. About 17,000 local transit workers in Chicago, Boston and Pittsburgh will receive 5 or 6-cent hourly increases.

Pan American Pact Boosts Pay for 18,000

New York — New agreements providing pay raises of up to 25.5 percent for 18,000 employes of Pan American World Airways were accepted by members of the Transport Workers Union in a secret ballot vote at locations around the world.

Three contracts covering ground service and flight service employes were due to expire Mar. 1 but the union extended them until agreement was reached a few hours before a strike deadline.

New 26-month pacts will raise mechanics' pay $1.05 an hour to a new top rate of $5.23. Other new rates are $5.58 an hour for inspectors; $4.86 for senior port stewards; $4.24 for fleet service employes and $3.76 for cleaners.

Top monthly pay of stewardesses goes up $107 to $861 for those who work 80 hours a month. Pursers won $136 raises to a new top of $1,073 per month.

Contracts also provide retroactive pay to July 1, 1968; five weeks' paid vacation after 20 years; Columbus Day as an 11th paid holiday; higher meal allowances, and improved health and welfare coverage and working condition gains.

Unusual contract features, the union said, are a new minimum pension benefit of $15 a month per year of participation, full pension vesting after 10 years regardless of age, and job security provisions in the event of future mergers.

The company agreed to assist the union in negotiating optional group coverage at the employe's cost for doctors' home and office visits, to be paid by checkoff.

Steelworkers Reach Agreement In Three Long, Bitter Walkouts

Pittsburgh—The Steelworkers have won contract settlements in three major disputes after long and bitter strikes.

Union members ratified new terms and took down their picket lines after a 70-day strike and a nationwide boycott, backed by the AFL-CIO, at the Coleman Co., Inc., in Somerset, Pa. The 400 workers have resumed assembly of Coleman lanterns and other outdoor equipment.

USWA Pres. I. W. Abel said the settlement ended the boycott that helped a new local union achieve its first contract at a plant patrolled by state military and Pinkerton guards, called in by a hostile management.

Also ended, he said, was a three-month walkout by 1,800 USWA members at the Torrance, Calif., plant of Harvey Aluminum, and a seven-month strike at the Lone Star Steel Co. mill near Corpus Christi, Tex., where 2,700 workers had to battle a backward management supported by the Texas Rangers.

The Coleman pact was won from a firm which had vowed it never would settle with a union.

Members of newly chartered USWA Local 7494 returned to work with these contract benefits:

Wage increases of 13 cents an hour the first year, 12 to 16 cents the second year, 11 to 17 cents the final year; a union security clause; insurance improvements paid for by management; seniority based on the basic steel pattern, and numerous other gains.

Coleman workers, who never had union conditions, will get eight paid holidays, including the first day of the buck deer season, union bulletin boards, private lockers, and copies of the agreement printed in a union shop.

Employes at the Coleman plant voted for the union last fall, began negotiations in December, and walked out Feb. 14. Management showed no interest in settlement until Abel came to town and launched a "don't buy" boycott with AFL-CIO support, union negotiator Andrew Koban said.

Immigration Dept. officials also acted after Abel's visit. They verified his charge that alien strikebreakers were at work and gave them a week to leave town. They left the next day.

Coleman has an almost new $2.5 million plant, built with subsidies from the community and the state.

Harvey Aluminum workers ratified a three-year agreement calling for more than 70 cents an hour in wage increases and other benefits.

The contract calls for an immediate raise of 25 cents an hour, and additional raises of 15 cents an hour in each of two following years; a major medical program as part of the health insurance plan; higher shift premiums, three days' bereavement pay; vacation bonus pay, and a reduction in the time required for job classification improvements.

USWA Local 6700 walked out Jan. 19 after rejecting a company "take it or leave it" offer which represented less than half the value of union settlements negotiated last year with other aluminum producers. Management got a court injunction limiting pickets to two at each gate of the sprawling plant, and brought in 500 strikebreakers, the union reported.

Settlement finally was reached with the assistance of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

At Lone Star Steel in East Texas, union members had been on strike since last Oct. 15. They said a new contract was won in spite of strikebreaking attempts by Texas Rangers. Terms of the new pact were not released by officers of USWA Local 4134.

Justice For Farm Workers

IN AMERICA, where the banner of equal opportunity is flown on high, there is no excuse for excluding some 1.2 million hired farm workers from the benefits of laws enacted to help all other workers.

How has this situation come about? I believe it has happened because America has let a bucolic mystique of the farmer develop, which fogs the nation's vision and influences the Congress and state legislatures to write legislation which exempts farmers from obligations carried by other employers.

For one thing, only about one-fourth of the total population lives in rural areas today. The growth of ever larger and mechanized efficient agriculture enterprises has cut the number of farm units in half since World War II. Then there were about 6 million farms. Today there are 3 million, and of these the 300,000 largest account for nearly two-thirds of total sales.

For another thing, farm employment—not rural employment, which includes rural dwellers not engaged in farming—totals about 4.8 million, and of these 3.6 million are engaged in family farming. Only about 1.2 million are hired farm employes. In the main, the latter are the farm workers we are talking about who are excluded from the mainstream of American life and are denied the benefits of the protective welfare legislation other American workers have long enjoyed.

Examine the agriculture industry closer, and we find that a mere 2.7 percent of the farms pay half of the farm wages. And only 6 percent of the farms account for 76 percent of the wage bill.

Let's dwell on these wages a moment. The latest figures I have are for the year 1967. Average farm wages that year were $8.60 a day if board and room were furnished and $8.90 a day without board and room. On the basis of average hourly wage, in October 1966, the wage for domestic workers was $1.18. In the South, which provides half the farm employment, the average hourly wage was 95 cents.

Before we start figuring their annual income, though, we ought to know that only about 650,000 of these hired farm workers were employed for more than 150 days.

And before we add on the fringe benefits of housing and room and board, consider that less than one-fourth are provided with housing—and that housing is usually very primitive. Less than 12 percent are given food grown on the farm and only about 7 percent are served one meal a day.

Put these facts together and that painting of a pastoral wholesome farm life just doesn't make sense. The farm mystique is a myth.

THE TRUE FARM PICTURE is characterized by large corporate farms—agrobusiness—wages well below poverty levels, primitive living conditions and medieval terms of employment and working conditions.

Again this year, we are asking that the second class status of the farm worker be ended. We believe they should be paid the same minimum wage other workers receive. We believe they should be covered by social security, unemployment compensation, workmen's compensation and have the benefits of these and similar programs all other workers have.

We believe farm workers should have access to medical and health care facilities, to public schools, and to job training and retraining programs. We also believe they should have decent clean housing.

We think that basic to it all is the right for farm workers to organize and bargain collectively.

'It's Not Enough!'

A Word Edgewise:

Rebels Out to Destroy System, Not to Cure Society's Problems

By John P. Roche

Those who are concerned about the deeper aspects of student unrest are urged to read two recent books. The first, an extraordinary historical and sociological analysis, is The Conflict of Generations by Prof. Lewis S. Feuer. Feuer, who got his first wound-stripe at City College more than 30 years ago and was in the forefront of the struggle against irrationalism at Berkeley, has taken the contemporary disorders, here and abroad, and put them in the perspective of the last two centuries.

Any summary will oversimplify this provocative and carefully argued work, but the gist of Feuer's argument is that student revolts are fundamentally irrational outbursts directed at humiliating an older generation.

Feuer's volume is extremely useful to those administrators, teachers, or even parents who have to cope with student rampages. One of the standard complaints about the New Left is their incoherence. "What do they want?" asks a besieged dean, and the answer came back "Purify the world!"

A new phrase has entered the administrative lexicon: "The non-negotiable demand." Those raised on trade union tactics erroneously assume that this is a bluff or a bargaining position, but the fact is that the SDS syndrome means it: they don't want to be corrupted by the sinful, adult world of compromise.

One college president who was hit with a dozen "non-negotiable" demands and wanted desperately to communicate with his militants reportedly called a meeting to discuss them.

"We can sell South African stock," he said, "and admit more blacks. We can eliminate dormitory curfew, boycott California table grapes, and set up a committee to change the grading system. But, seriously, how can we liberate Greece, save Biafra, and end the war in Viet Nam?" He was puzzled when the assembled students laughed; he would not have been if he had read Feuer's book.

The second work is a collection of essays by various academic and para-academic figures entitled Confrontation, edited by Daniel Bell and Irving Kristol.

The nine articles constitute the most dispassionate exploration of the events on campus that I have seen. At the moment the world is rapidly dividing into those who see the troubles as an outgrowth of a clever national, even international, conspiracy and those who cluck sympathetically and say "they are trying to tell us something." (The ratio, of course, is about 10,000 to 1.) The Bell & Kristol collection rejects both positions and settles for a number of careful case studies of what precisely has happened.

Those interested, for example, in the battle of the Columbia gymnasium will discover from Roger Starr's piece that the Harlem community was initially delighted at the prospect of this useful facility in Morningside Park and that it became a bone of contention only when SDS, flailing around for some non-negotiable issues, asserted it was an instrument of colonial oppression.

IN GENERAL, Confrontation provides documentation for Feuer's thesis—that while there are unquestionably genuine grievances on university campuses, the extremists are not concerned with remedying them. They want to destroy the system, not improve it. And Daniel Bell, in his contribution on Columbia's response, has provided an appalling chronicle of the incapacity of a university administration and faculty "confronted" by irrational disruption.

In recent months I have been impressed by one development that has not yet been touched upon. There has been a good deal of emphasis on how student disorders are solidifying the right wing in American politics, but I have noticed that—beyond this—there is a notable hardening of the non-militants in the college generation. Young men and women, liberal by inclination, are getting increasingly bitter at their colleagues who are hurting their education.

For reasons discussed by Feuer, they rarely side openly with the "old men;" that would be generational treason. At the same time they are inwardly enraged (and rage, as always, is intensified by impotence) and once free of the generational spell they may well become the most conservative generation of college graduates in 30 years.

4-Year Grape Strike:

Farm Workers' Long Struggle Involves All Trade Unionists

AFTER ALMOST FOUR long and trying years of striking and boycotting in order to build their AFL-CIO union, the stamina and courage of the officers and members of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee continues to amaze America and to inspire trade unionists throughout the nation.

Their reward thus far has been the winning of 11 contracts and the establishment therein of levels of dignity and security for field laborers never before attained in this land.

Yet that segment of the grape-growing industry that produces fresh table grapes in the vineyards of California and Arizona, continues to pursue its backward policies and to bitterly oppose the workers' organizational efforts.

Recently, many of these growers were discovered by the U.S. Dept. of Labor to have sponsored and financed an artificial "union" whose purpose was to discredit and destroy the UFWOC. Even more recently, they have, at great expense, engaged two nationally prominent public relations-advertising agencies to promote their image and destroy the UFWOC in the process.

The great cause of the farm workers, however, remains among the most just and meritorious in the history of American labor. These workers and this crusade have stirred the conscience and aroused the sympathy of decent-thinking people throughout the world. AFL-CIO takes pride in having pioneered in this effort and in having continued as a strong and constant supporter of the farm worker effort. Never has there been an issue so universally joined in by the family of AFL-CIO.

EVEN LABOR organizations outside AFL-CIO find the "common cause" character of this struggle so overwhelming that they are able to forego other differences in order to assist this, the youngest member of our family. AFL-CIO is appreciative of every effort in the national community, both within and outside the ranks of organized labor, for all acts, past, present, and future, which aid the AFL-CIO Farm Workers.

The need for total support is greater today than ever before. Even now, while some of their members walk picket lines in front of supermarkets in the international boycott effort, others are walking the highway from Coachella, Calif., to Calexico, on the Mexican border in a demonstration designed to enlist the sympathy and support of the "green card" commuters who have broken previous strikes.

AFL-CIO once again calls on every one of its affiliates, every officer and every member at every level, to accept this struggle as a struggle of all trade unionists. More than anything else, this means the recognition and total support of the boycott against table grapes.

Struggle in Charleston:

Labor Pledges Full Support To Striking Hospital Workers

THE AFL-CIO has fully supported and will continue to fully support the struggle of the hospital workers of Charleston, S.C., to win decent wages and working conditions and a sense of their own dignity and worth as first class citizens in their own community. These workers are seeking to accomplish these modest aims by organizing into Local 1199B of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union.

Because they had no other recourse to win union recognition and to bargain collectively, the hospital workers were compelled to strike. For nearly two months now they have marched on the picket lines where they have been joined by their fellow unionists, by civil rights leaders from other parts of the country and by a growing number of citizens of Charleston—white as well as black.

This evidence of cooperation among community forces, civil rights organizations and the labor movement holds out hope for success in the AFL-CIO's effort to organize the lowest paid and most exploited people in our society.

This Executive Council is determined to do everything in the power of the AFL-CIO to help win this most important struggle. We are confident that with the kind of unity that has been demonstrated in Charleston, the effort to achieve the basic economic and human rights of these working people must succeed.

To implement this pledge, we today establish with a $25,000 contribution the AFL-CIO Charleston Hospital Strike Fund and urge all affiliates to contribute generously to help the strikers in Charleston.

Seafood Health Hazard:

Industry Foes Seek to Dilute Strong Fish Inspection Law

DEATH AND SICKNESS from spoiled and infected fish point up the urgent need for effective "continuous inspection" to assure clean and fit products in the now largely unsupervised seafood industry, a union consumer affairs adviser declared.

"Thousands of cases of botulism" and other illnesses—11 of them fatal in the last five years—have been traced to "bad fish," said Arnold Mayer, legislative representative for the Meat Cutters.

With only a scattering of state fish inspection laws and "no mandatory federal inspection whatsoever," he said there is "no real guarantee of wholesomeness," which is probably one reason fish is eaten less than meat and poultry.

Yet, he stressed, fish is potentially more dangerous than most meats, which do have mandatory inspection now. Mayer appeared on Labor News Conference, an AFL-CIO produced public affairs interview, broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EDT, on the Mutual radio network.

Mayer said that the AFL-CIO unions and other groups that fought successfully for effective federal inspection of meat and poultry in recent years are united in the push for similar safeguards for fish in Congress this year. He praised a bill sponsored by Sen. Philip Hart (D-Mich.) and 21 other senators that would set mandatory inspection for not only canneries and processing plants, but for the fishing boats and docks as well.

HE PREDICTED that the drive for a federal fish inspection law "will be a fairly difficult battle," with stiff opposition from the industry. He said that while the industry's trade associates say "they are for fish inspection, they urge amendments that would make that inspection meaningless."

Their main objection, he said, is to the demand for "continuous inspection" with "an inspector in the plant at all times," as is now the case with meat and poultry. The industry, he said, wants to limit the law to "continual inspection," which would really amount to only "spot checks," and would seriously dilute the effectiveness of a fish inspection program.

Reporters questioning Mayer were Spencer Rich of the Washington Post and Neil Gilbride of the Associated Press.

THE ISSUE OF ETHICS in government and conflict of interest among public servants is once again a major concern.

The headlines are being commanded by the cases of Associate Supreme Court Justice Abe Fortas and Sec. of the Treasury David M. Kennedy, but this is only the visible surface, perhaps minimal, compared to the depths of the problem.

The ethics in government issue periodically produces the headlines that shake the nation—the Teapot Dome Scandal, the Dixon-Yates affair, the Robert G. Baker and Thomas Dodd operations.

Each one of these inflicts an unhealthy quota of damage on our concept of representative democracy. And for every case of unethical conduct that reaches the headline stage, scores of others remain safely tucked into inner recesses.

Some members of Congress are knee-deep in financial operations that would suffer if genuine tax reform legislation were passed. Either personally or as members of law firms, they have a vested interest in maintaining some legislation on the statute books even though the vast majority of the citizens suffer from the laws.

But those are only two forms of conflict of interest.

Cases involving Baker, Dodd and Rep. Adam Clayton Powell spurred both the House and Senate last year to take the first action in 200 years to put into written language codes of conduct.

In the Senate, the vote in favor of four rules of conduct was 67 to 1. The single negative vote was cast by Sen. George D. Aiken (R-Vt.) who declared that the rules were a "farce" and that he refused to "be a party to the perpetrating of a fraud upon the American people. . . ."

The rules prohibited outside employment of Senate employes unless it did not conflict with their Senate duties; it limited senators' acceptance and use of political contributions and required public reports on them; it restricted political fund activities by Senate employes and required confidential financial disclosures of income, assets and debts by senators and employes, over $15,000 a year.

Proposed rules that were rejected by the Senate, however, tell a more complete story. These required:

- Detailed public disclosure of members' and employes' assets, liabilities and business relationships.
- That fund-raising events be held only under detailed conditions and provide for the disposition of funds left over after campaigns.
- More detailed financial disclosure by the officers of fiduciary trusts in which the individual filing, or his family, held an interest of 25 percent or more.
- That financial disclosures apply equally to spouses. The financial reports are kept secret unless an investigation is initiated.

THE HOUSE ADOPTED its own Code of Official Conduct for members and employes with only one dissenting vote, 406 to 1. The resolution set up a 12-member Committee on Standards of Official Conduct which was given limited authority to investigate alleged misconduct by members or employes.

Representatives and top employes of the House are required to list publicly their source of major income, usually business interests worth more than $5,000 and income of $1,000 or more from a single source.

Recently, reports filed by congressmen showed that what was not disclosed may be as important as what was disclosed. A total of 161 congressmen turned in blank reports indicating that they either had no outside income or were taking advantage of loopholes in the law.

Congress did take an important initial step in setting some standards in writing for the first time in 200 years. Now those standards should be made meaningful.

And similar disclosures would be in order for members of both the Judiciary and Executive branches, too.

ELEVEN DEATHS and thousands of sicknesses from "bad fish" in recent years point up the urgent need for federal inspection like that now covering meat and poultry, said Arnold Mayer, center, Meat Cutters legislative representative, on Labor News Conference. The public affairs interview is broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EDT, on Mutual radio. Questioning him were Spencer Rich, left, of the Washington Post and Neil Gilbride of the Associated Press.

Participation In Model Cities Termed Vital

Locals of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters should get involved in Model Cities programs in their home communities, Pres. Peter T. Schoemann urged.

Schoemann told union members attending a luncheon during the Building & Construction Trades Dept. legislative conference that it's up to them to work with other segments of the community on procedures "to help employ the unemployed and train the untrained."

It is the mandate of Congress, he reminded the delegates, that "maximum opportunities" for jobs and training be given to residents of the neighborhoods being rehabilitated.

'Proud Tradition'

And, he added, "it is the proud tradition of the building and construction trades to respond effectively to the needs of the nation."

If unions don't participate from the start, he warned, job procedures are likely to be set by people who are "totally unaware" of the skills required for various jobs and who think the unemployed can become "instant carpenters, instant plumbers, instant cement masons and instant pipe fitters."

Recruitment procedures, training and wage rates all have to be negotiated, Schoemann said. "Each city has its own immediate problem to solve" and there is opportunity for "new approaches."

The international union, Schoemann said, has prepared comprehensive information kits explaining the operation of the Model Cities program.

It's up to the locals, he stressed, to participate with other community groups in developing a realistic, workable program.

School Funds Urged to End Segregation

The AFL-CIO called on Congress to provide necessary funds to help the nation's school systems effectively end segregation.

Specifically a House Appropriation subcommittee was urged to:

- Approve a $20 million budget request for the civil rights educational assistance program.
- Approve a $4.3 million request by the Justice Dept.'s Civil Rights Division to help meet its increasing workload.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller wrote Rep. John J. Rooney (D-N.Y.), subcommittee chairman, describing the educational assistance program as the "only activity specifically designed to respond to the requests of school systems in overcoming problems associated with desegregation."

'Not Adequately Funded'

Biemiller said the AFL-CIO believes "this important program has not been adequately funded in the past."

The letter added that the "key to an effective school desegregation program is close coordination" between the Office for Civil Rights and the Civil Rights Division's compliance programs.

"In order to improve this coordination, however, and to carry out more effectively the many other activities of the Civil Rights Division, it will be necessary to assign more attorneys to the division," the letter said.

Approval of the $4.3 million authorization would permit the hiring of 90 more persons, including 50 lawyers, the letter noted.

Poll Finds Union Leaders Responsive to Members

Union members and their families give labor's leadership a strong vote of confidence, a professional polling firm reported.

A survey taken by Sindlinger & Co. in late April found that "union members overwhelmingly believe the leaders of labor organizations are concerned with the interests of the rank and file."

The nationwide sampling of union members found 73.9 percent agreeing and only 3.9 percent disagreeing that union leaders are concerned with the interests of union members. The remaining 22.2 percent either declined to answer or qualified their replies.

The attitude was almost as favorable among adults living in households where there is a union member, even though they were not members themselves.

In those households, 64.1 percent said union leaders represent the interests of the average member.

Grain Millers Endorse Demand for Tax Justice

Las Vegas—Delegates to the Grain Millers 11th convention here called for "tax justice for all Americans."

A key resolution adopted unanimously by more than 200 delegates said that American workers are willing to pay their fair share of taxes but "are tired" of paying an unfair burden under a system "rigged for the wealthy."

Copies of the resolution, which fully supported the AFL-CIO's proposals for tax reform and elimination of "loopholes of special tax privilege," were sent to Pres. Nixon and all members of Congress.

The convention urged union members to follow through with individual letters to their congressmen and senators.

Another convention action resolved to make achievement of a $2 an hour minimum wage and expanded coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act a top goal of the union in the 91st Congress.

It was pointed out that while 1966 amendments to the law represented a step toward reducing poverty, the present $1.60 minimum "is still inadequate in terms of living costs and family needs."

Specifically singled out was the need for eliminating the present $1.30 cutoff for farm workers covered by the law so that they also will progress to a $2 level.

Resolutions dealing with the National Labor Relations Act called for repeal of a section of the law which prohibits the inclusion of plant guards in the same bargaining unit with other employes and pledged resistance to moves to weaken the National Labor Relations Board or replace it with a Labor Court.

The delegates proposed sizable increases in social security benefits and a National Health Insurance System to guarantee "high quality" medical care for all citizens, "rich and poor alike."

The convention urged its members "to cooperate more fully financially" with COPE and called for the establishment of COPE committees by each local—"to promulgate the principles of Samuel Gompers of electing friends and defeating enemies."

Reports Received

In sessions covering three days, the delegates representing 40,000 union members received reports from AFGM Pres. Roy O. Wellborn and Sec.-Treas. H. A. Schneider, and heard addresses from a number of speakers.

They included Executive Sec.-Treas. Peter M. McGavin of the AFL-CIO Maritimes Trades Dept., Sec.-Treas. Joseph Lewis of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept., AFL-CIO Regional Dir. Daniel V. Flanagan and industry officials.

200,000 Gate in Denver:

Union Label Show Pulls Huge Crowd

Denver—The 1969 AFL-CIO Union-Industries Show hit here like one of Buffalo Bill's wild west shows of yesteryear.

Colorado's citizens turned out in record numbers to see the annual labor-management exhibition at Denver's new $13 million Currigan Hall and Exhibition Center. Visitors streamed into the big, new union-built hall at the rate of 1,000 an hour on opening day. Show officials estimated that more than 200,000 persons saw the show by the time it closed six days later.

The success of the 1969 show will be a challenge to future labor-management exhibitions, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler predicted at a luncheon honoring exhibitors and guests on opening day.

"In a very real sense," Schnitzler observed, "this show is a kaleidoscope of tens of thousands of work places across this country where skilled and experienced men and women produce the goods and perform the services that make it possible for Americans to have the highest living standards in the world."

More than 300 exhibitors gave away an estimated $100,000 in prizes and souvenirs in the 100,000 square-foot column-free hall. Visitors watched Bakers decorate cakes, Glass Bottle Blowers create bottles from molds, a union artist paint a spectacular view of the Denver skyline, and they saw movies in two theaters operated by the Theatrical Stage Employes and the AFL-CIO. Butchers gave away meat. Scores of television sets were offered as prizes. For the kids there were balloons and cotton candy, kites and other trinkets.

The show, the largest free national exposition in North America, offered a fitting debut to the new Currigan Hall and Exhibition Center. The building was actually dedicated on the morning of the second day of the show.

Palmer Hoyt, editor of the Denver Post, applauded the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept., which produces the exhibition for "breaking the ice" at the convention center and praised organized labor's advances in Colorado.

Under Sec. of Labor James Hodgson toured the exhibits, as did Colorado's Lt. Gov. Mark Hogan and other state and city officials. They found themselves among a big opening day crowd which included 25 classes of school children, 100 Boy Scouts and 150 Boys Club members who joined the ribbon-cutting ceremonies.

There were a number of exciting additions to this year's show. Communications Workers employed by the Mountains States Telephone Co. maintained a message center for show visitors. They demonstrated picture telephones, which communications firms expect to make available to the public by 1972. And one member demonstrated the work done by Communications Workers below street level in a manhole. The Meat Cutters added to their traditional magic shows and meat giveaways by displaying and awarding union-made western saddles.

The Railway & Airline Clerks boosted their campaign to get Americans to travel on their vacations with a special "travel industry employes" booth showing travelogues.

Visitors saw themselves on color television, as members of the Broadcast Employes & Technicians, in cooperation with Denver Station KOA, operated a color camera and monitors.

Two women representing the recently formed United Fishermen's Wives organization in New Bedford, Mass., encouraged passers-by to purchase scallops and other seafood products harvested by the New Bedford fishing fleet. They urged federal action to preserve the fishing industry against harassment and encroachments by other nations.

In another booth, members of the striking United Farm Workers Organizing Committee urged continued support of the California table grape boycott.

Among the yellow sports jackets of the men who staffed the Painters' exhibit, the colorful fashion displays of the garment and textile unions, and the many special costumes, there appeared the neat black blazers of Job Corpsmen from various Job Corps camps across the nation where young men and women have been trained by union instructors for future careers.

Among the new exhibitors was the Allied Chemical Co., which collaborated with the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers in a display of latest developments in the chemical and allied industries.

The 1969 show was in a tradition that began in 1938, when the first Union-Industries show was held in Cincinnati. The final night became a grande finale as crowds returned for drawings for the big prizes—color television sets, a fiberglass runabout boat given away by the Glass Bottle Blowers, a complete kitchen presented by the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, and similar attractions.

Pres. Nixon and Sec. of Labor George P. Shultz sent messages to Pres. Richard F. Walsh and Sec.-Treas. Joseph Lewis of the Union Label & Service Trades Dept. praising the show as a constructive demonstration of labor-management cooperation.

The 1969 show in Denver indicated, as Schnitzler told exhibitors earlier, that American employers recognize the dignity of workers and that the union card and union label carry messages not only from union employes but from union employers as well.

House Votes $20,000 Lid On Farm Aid

The House rebelled against huge subsidies running into millions of dollars to a handful of big corporate farms and voted to impose a $20,000 limit on any single payment.

Over Administration opposition, two Republicans led the fight to limit subsidy payments and carried a majority of their own party as well as the bulk of liberal Democrats with them.

On the 224-142 roll call vote, 118 Democrats and 106 Republicans voted for the $20,000 limit, while 89 Democrats and 53 Republicans opposed the ceiling.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council earlier this year called for "a reasonable ceiling" on subsidy payments to any farm. It said programs to assure the ordinary farmer of a fair return are still needed, but there is no justification for "excessive payments to large and profitable agro-businesses."

Rep. Silvio O. Conte (R-Mass.) and Rep. Paul Findley (R-Ill.) led a similar effort last year, when the basic farm program was extended. The House backed them then, although by a smaller majority. However, the Senate rejected any subsidy ceiling and farm bloc congressmen who represented the House in the conference committee happily gave in to the Senate without a fight.

Hardin Opposed

Before the vote, Pres. Nixon and Agriculture Sec. Clifford M. Hardin met at the White House with Republican congressional leaders in an unsuccessful effort to head off the subsidy ceiling. Later House Republican Leader Gerald R. Ford (Mich.) quoted Hardin as saying that the restriction would cost the government more money by triggering a different price support formula for paying cotton farmers who make up the bulk of the growers receiving big subsidies running into millions of dollars.

After the House insisted on the limitation, Hardin told newsmen he hoped the Senate would reject the provision. He promised that the Administration by next year will come up with a plan to "modify downward" the farm subsidy program.

The Agriculture Dept. money bill included the full $340 million authorized for the food stamp program for the coming fiscal year. Pres. Nixon several weeks ago told Congress that he will propose an additional $270 million for food stamps—but the Administration has

Labor Asks Stiff Law on Fair Credit

The AFL-CIO gave "enthusiastic support" to a Senate bill aimed at protecting the public from inaccurate or misleading credit reports that can destroy a buyer's reputation—or cost him his job.

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller urged quick congressional action on the Fair Credit Reporting bill sponsored by Sen. William Proxmire (D-Wis.). And he expressed the AFL-CIO's gratification for the endorsement and strengthening amendments advanced by Pres. Nixon's new consumer affairs assistant, Mrs. Virginia Knauer.

The legislation, Biemiller told a Senate Banking subcommittee, should be passed "in the strongest form possible."

The Proxmire bill would require that information gathered by credit bureaus and collection agencies be kept confidential. It would obligate agencies to inform consumers of any adverse notations on their records and give persons an opportunity to correct the information.

The trade union movement has a strong interest in halting credit agency abuses, Biemiller stressed.

"The secret circulation of wrongful, overly personal and irrelevant misinformation about individuals may impair a person's ability to find a job, his ability to obtain credit, and may harm his general reputation," he said.

Biemiller termed it "shocking" that private reporting agencies maintain credit files on some 110 million persons, including "54 mil-

LABOR'S HIGHEST HONOR—the Murray-Green Award—is bestowed on former Sen. Paul H. Douglas during the 14th annual AFL-CIO Community Services Conference. Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, right, of the Communications Workers and chairman of the Community Services Committee, makes the presentation.

Murray-Green Award:

Labor's Top Honor Given Sen. Douglas

Former Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.), whose dedication to liberal causes put him in the forefront of many of labor's battles, received the AFL-CIO's top honor, the Murray-Green Award, in ceremonies highlighting the 14th Annual AFL-CIO Community Services Conference.

Speaking of his 18 years in the Senate, Douglas told an audience of 800 at the award banquet:

"The efforts of the progressive bloc in behalf of the great mass of the American people would have been relatively ineffective if we had not had the American labor movement on our side. We could not have passed Medicare or put a floor under wages without your help."

He cited unions for their aid "in the long, continuing battle for civil rights" and said "they were the backbone of our successful movement to pass truth-in-lending and aid for depressed areas. The political history of those two decades would have been far more arid without your help."

The Murray-Green Award is given by the AFL-CIO in the name of the late William Green, who was president of the former AFL, and the late Philip Murray, who led the former CIO. In accepting the award, Douglas specified that the accompanying $5,000 be used "for purposes in the public interest."

The four recipients he designated are:

- The Joint Committee on Apprenticeship, consisting of the representatives of the building trades unions and of Negro and other minority groups ($1,000).
- The Hyde Park Neighborhood Club of Chicago ($1,000), ". . . one of the few communities that has been able to maintain racial integration over many years, instead of this being—as is so common—merely a fleeting transition between being a segregated white community to being a segregated black one."
- The Indiana Dunes National

Push Drive In Congress, Meany Asks

By Duane Emme

American workers are willing to pay their fair share of federal taxes but they will not continue to foot the bill additionally for millionaires who evade taxation —"the loophole set."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told delegates to the convention of the Laundry & Dry Cleaning Union in Washington that union members must "get that message across" to Congress if there is to be genuine tax reform.

The labor movement, Meany said, "is tired of playing the tax game with a stacked deck. Workers and taxpayers the country over are demanding fairness and equity in the tax system. And they mean to get it." (Excerpts, Page 7.)

"We say," he added, "there's no justice in a system that lets millionaires pay no taxes at all (21 of them in 1967) while it forces workers, earning barely enough to make ends meet, to make up the difference."

The day after Meany spoke, Chairman Wilbur D. Mills announced that the House Ways & Means Committee had reached tentative agreement on certain tax reform items. These involve foundations and other tax exempt organizations, charitable deductions, large scale "hobby" farming, multiple corporations and certain types of business mergers.

The committee so far has not developed proposals to deal with such major loopholes as capital

New Jobs Bill Picks Up Wide Support in House

Legislation aimed at providing a job or training leading to a job for every American looking for work has been introduced by Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.) with more than 100 other congressmen as co-sponsors.

The O'Hara bill has the AFL-CIO's "strongest endorsement," Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller said. Joining with labor in launching a major campaign for the bill are leading civil rights, religious and civic organizations.

The legislation would pull together and expand existing manpower programs geared to jobs in private industry.

It would provide incentives for employers to train their present workforce for higher-skilled, higher-paid jobs—opening up new entry-level jobs in the process.

And it would add to this a large-scale public sector job and training program that would both meet unfilled public service needs and provide assurance of full employment.

The goal of the legislation, O'Hara declared, is "to end involuntary unemployment in the United States."

A statement of purposes written into the bill opens with a finding by Congress that to achieve the objective of the 1946 Employment Act "we must assure an opportunity for a gainful, productive job to every American who is seeking work and make available the education and training needed by any

More Funds Urged To Conquer Hunger

The AFL-CIO asked Congress to provide more funds for the food stamp program than the Nixon Administration is asking in order to wipe out hunger and malnutrition in America.

The Administration has proposed a $270 million increase in the food stamp budget for the coming fiscal year—to a total of $610 million.

That's "a step in the right direction" but not a big enough step. Julius F. Rothman, associate director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Urban Affairs, said.

"When measured against the need, this sum is completely inadequate," Rothman told the Senate Agriculture Committee.

He said feeding the nation's hungry through the food stamp program "will require at least $1 billion" during the coming year "and a proportionate increase the following year."

Besides more money, there is a need for "substantial" reforms in the Administration of the program, Rothman testified.

Food stamps are sold at discounts based on family income and size to poor people in most, but not all, sections of the country. The intent is to enable families to buy the variety of food they need for an adequate diet at a cost they can afford.

Rothman advanced these AFL-CIO proposals to improve the food stamp program:

Equal Job Opportunities Conference Reviews Progress and Problems

Representatives of the AFL-CIO, its affiliated unions and government agencies exchanged experiences—good and bad—in implementing equal employment programs at a two-day conference in Washington.

On hand were leaders of 36 unions, assigned by their international presidents to work with the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights and government agencies in securing compliance with the equal employment provisions of the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

They discussed programs and problems with officials of the Equal Employment Opportunities Commission, the Justice Dept. and the Office of Federal Contract Compliance—all involved in enforcing areas of the law.

Schnitzler opened the conference by tracing "constant progress" by labor in advancing civil rights and helping to eliminate discrimination in employment.

The federation has a Dept. of Civil Rights that now works at "one speed—and that's top speed" in wide areas that involve "positive action on behalf of civil rights," Schnitzler said.

He assessed the steady effort made by unions over the past few years to eliminate the last vestiges of segregation by noting that there are now fewer than 100 segregated locals out of a total of more than 60,000 among AFL-CIO unions.

Slaiman, in noting the forthcoming retirement of Schnitzler, praised the leadership he has given to the federation's civil rights program as chairman of its Civil Rights Committee.

The AFL-CIO, Slaiman pointed out, called upon its affiliates to cooperate fully with the equal employment provisions of the 1964 law even before they became effective.

He recalled that an AFL-CIO Executive Council resolution adopted in August of that year emphasized that the "struggle to get compliance would be as difficult as getting the law through Congress."

Since then, Slaiman said, union representatives have made steady progress in securing compliance even though there continue to be problems. "Yours is not an easy area in which to work," he observed.

Lyons, who was chairman of the labor advisory committee to the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity that existed prior to passage of the law, was the main speaker at a conference luncheon.

He cited the progress building trades unions and other AFL-CIO affiliates have made in expanding opportunities for minority group workers by training them in job skills and placing them in apprenticeship programs.

Proof of the progress, Lyons said, is found in Labor Dept. figures showing that the percentage of non-whites in registered apprenticeship programs increased from about 2 percent in 1964 to 7.2 percent in 1968.

He also described Negro apprentices in training in his own union in Chicago, Cleveland, Dallas and Detroit.

"The contractors are generally as well satisfied as we are that these youngsters will make first-rate journeymen and nowhere have any (apprenticeship) standards been lowered to obtain these results," he said.

William E. Pollard and Doris Hardesty of the federation's civil rights staff along with AFL-CIO Associate Gen. Counsel Thomas E. Harris chaired panels on procedures for handling employment discrimination complaints and programs to expand opportunities for minority workers.

Participating on one of the panels were EEOC Commissioner Elizabeth Kuck; Jerris Leonard, civil rights director for the Justice Dept.; and Ward McCreedy of the Office of Federal Contract Compliance.

It produced a strong barrage of questions from the union representatives and a lively exchange of ideas on how both the government and labor can smooth the handling of equal employment problems.

Labor Editors Hone Skills at 3-Day Seminar

Madison, Wis. — Journalism's techniques and their application to the labor press was the main theme of a three-day meeting at the University of Wisconsin attended by 61 labor editors from 10 states.

The occasion was the annual conference of the Midwest Labor Press Association held in cooperation with the University's School for Workers. Editors came from Ohio, Illinois, Indiana, Minnesota, Iowa, Michigan, Kansas, Missouri, Pennsylvania, and Wisconsin.

MLPA's annual Eugene V. Debs Memorial Lecture was given by Vice Pres. Antonio Oredin of the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee staff, who described the farm workers' struggle "to get out from the bottom of the barrel."

Other speakers included Pres. Fred Sweet of the International Labor Press Association and Ann Gordon, editor of Connection, a student underground publication.

MLPA Pres. Raymond G. Dickow, editor of the Butcher Workman, and Sec.-Treas. William Scoggins, Steelworkers' Local 1011, were unanimously re-elected to new terms, as were the association's 11 vice presidents.

At 5th Convention:

Laundry Workers Spur Social Gains

The role union members must play in ending poverty and advancing human rights was the major theme of the fifth convention of the Laundry & Dry Cleaning Union in Washington.

It ran through a report of the union's officers, was pinpointed in an opening address by Pres. Russell R. Crowell and dominated actions by nearly 100 delegates.

Major speakers included AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany who saluted the union for "doing a fine job of helping workers at the bottom of the economic ladder."

Meany also carried labor's campaign for "tax justice" to the convention, urging delegates to demand that Congress close loopholes allowing millionaires to escape taxes. (Story, Page 1.)

Crowell noted that the convention was meeting "at one of the most critical times in our nation's history," with cities being plagued by violence, immense problems, and mounting demands for equal justice.

"Yet in a way," he added, "it's a time of great hope, for we may be on the verge of the greatest breakthrough in human rights that we have ever known."

He called upon the union's members to recognize that they can best participate in helping to build a strong society "by building a strong union, local by local."

Officers Re-elected

The convention unanimously re-elected Crowell, Sec.-Treas. Sam H. Begler and nine vice presidents. Crowell and Begler were prime movers in the drive that set up the union following expulsion of the Laundry, Dry Cleaning & Dye House Workers from the AFL-CIO in 1957 on findings of corrupt domination.

The officers report cited "great changes for our union" since the last convention in 1965, including enactment of legislation that brought laundry workers under the Fair Labor Standards Act.

Although the minimum for these workers—$1.30 an hour now and scheduled to go to $1.45 in 1970 and $1.60 in 1971—"is still inadequate, it represents a step in the right direction," the report said.

The delegates backed up the officers' call for a higher minimum wage by urging Congress to enact a $2 minimum under the law and also provide yearly adjustments to meet increases in living costs.

History proves, the resolution said, that past increases in the minimum wage have not resulted in "dire consequences of unemployment" as opponents invariably have predicted.

Instead, it noted, "these amendments have resulted in more jobs, as a result of the increased purchasing power of millions of the nation's lowest paid workers."

In other areas, the report pointed to successful organizing drives that resulted in new locals in Memphis, Tenn., and Phoenix, Ariz., negotiations that brought "some of the best wage increases ever won by our locals," and expanded educational programs.

The report hailed the affiliation of Local 52 in Los Angeles earlier this year. The local, with 6,000 members, was granted a charter after disaffiliating from the union that was expelled by the federation.

'Welcome Home'

"To Local 52 we say, warmly and sincerely, 'Welcome home, brothers and sisters,'" the officers declared.

AFL-CIO Organizing Dir. William L. Kircher described the "great challenges" being met by labor in organizing farm workers and other unorganized employes, including those in minorities, such as Negroes and Mexican-Americans.

"When I look around at this convention," he added, "I know that there isn't much I can really say on the subject because I see the people who really do the gut work in this area—people who have been on the picket lines."

He recalled that Crowell was among trade unionists who were briefly arrested for staging a sit-in at Safeway Corp. in Oakland on behalf of labor's boycott of California grapes.

Sen. Douglas Hails Trade Unions As Progressive Force in Nation

Lakeshore Trust Fund ($2,000), to purchase recreational land.

- The Consumers' Federation of America ($1,000), "to help provide expert representation for that numerous and long suffering body of citizens in their dealings with regulatory and public bodies . . ."

In presenting the award, AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne cited Douglas's voting record, saying: "Certainly no man more nearly matches labor's own image . . . COPE's official score card shows Paul Douglas voted 76 times on the 'right' side of the issue—zero times on the wrong side."

Beirne, who is outgoing chairman of the AFL-CIO Community Services Committee, called Douglas "the catalyst whose foresight and courage turned so many of our ideals into reality." He listed many of the senator's achievements in the social welfare field from co-authoring the original social security law to introducing the first truth-in-lending bill in the Senate.

Federation Pres. George Meany, noting how parallel are the contributions and aims of Douglas and the AFL-CIO Community Services, called him "a rare public servant who gives complete adherence by his actions as well as his words to the principle of public service as a public trust."

Meany cited Douglas's record as "life-long champion of all that is human and compassionate" and noted that the senator's career has encompassed being "a teacher, a member of the trade union movement (still a member of the Teachers), an impartial arbitrator for the printing industry in his home city, member of the city council, a soldier with honors for heroic achievement in action, and a United States senator for 18 years."

Douglas, recalling organized labor's long struggle against exploitative working conditions, Douglas said:

"Most of these abuses, and others as well, have now been cured, and cured primarily because of the activity of unions as well as the middle class of reformers. I am proud that I have been a member of my own union for nearly half a century, and I feel that it has greatly improved conditions in the teaching profession."

He observed that while the labor movement is not perfect and at times will make mistakes, "it is humane at heart, and we must see to it that this spirit continues to be dominant. The record is so good that we cannot permit it to be sullied by unworthy acts."

Teachers Pledged Funds:

Chicago School Pact Bars Program Cuts

Chicago—Teachers returned to public schools here after a two-day strike with assurances of financing for an $18 million package and a pledge of no layoffs and no cutbacks in the school program.

Members of Teachers Local 1 staged the first walkout in Chicago school history to protest the failure of city officials to implement an agreement reached last January. The strike also was precipitated by predictions of the superintendent that he might be forced to suspend the summer school program and lay off up to 7,000 employes for lack of funds.

While the strikers picketed, their officers met with Mayor Richard J. Daley and the 11-member Board of Education at City Hall. Daley mediated the dispute after consulting by telephone with Gov. Richard B. Ogilvie (R), who said needed funds can be raised if the state legislature approves his proposed 4 percent state income tax plan.

About 75 percent of the city's 22,000 teachers, clerks and attendance officers stayed out during negotiations. They returned May 26 after voting 9,778 to 530 to accept the city's promise to carry out its contract agreement with the union.

Added to the agreement in the City Hall talks was a new salary schedule raising beginning teacher salaries to $8,000 a year, plus $400 in vacation pay—the highest in the nation, Local Pres. John H. Desmond said.

Civil service employes, who are part of the AFT bargaining unit, will get a salary hike of 7.5 percent starting in September.

Other contract gains include fully-paid hospitalization insurance, three personal leave days, and a board-paid life insurance policy of $2,500.

One new feature is a severance pay plan under which those who retired in the 1967-68 school year will be given a third of the pay for their accumulated sick days in cash—an amount rising to one half for retirees in the 1968-69 year.

The city agreed to hire 725 additional teachers for the next school year to reduce class size to 25 in basic English classes, to a top of 35 in upper grade centers.

The number of teacher aides will be raised in September from 1,200 to 1,800. Other improvements:

The city agreed to budget $1.2 million to operate three inner-city "More Effective Schools" in a program pioneered by the AFT and its New York City local.

Effective in November, full-time substitutes with three years of satisfactory service in Chicago schools will be rated as certified teachers.

The union sought a $1,500 annual increase but accepted $1,000.

The Chicago School Board approved the settlement. One member pointed out that Illinois ranks 47th among the 50 states in state aid for public school pupils per year.

William Farson To Retire From Key Guild Post

Executive Vice Pres. William J. Farson of the Newspaper Guild announced that he will retire as of next October. Farson has served in his post for the past 14 years.

At the same time, the Guild's executive board recommended that the title of executive vice president be changed to president and that the title of president be changed to chairman, so that the position of president would be the Guild's top post.

ANG Sec.-Treas. Charles A. Perlik, Jr., said he would seek the top job and incumbent president James B. Woods said he would seek the job of chairman if the convention accepts the board's recommendations.

Farson has served as ANG executive vice president longer than anyone in the Guild's history. He will be 65 next December. Before he assumed his present post in 1955 he served as secretary-treasurer, organizing director and international vice president.

Retirement Dinner Slated for Schnitzler

The AFL-CIO has announced plans for a retirement dinner for Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler.

In a letter to all affiliates and all state and city central bodies, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said the dinner would be held July 17 in the Regency Ballroom of the Shoreham Hotel in Washington.

The dinner committee will be headed by AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Maurice A. Hutcheson. Other committee members are Vice Presidents James A. Suffridge, Hunter P. Wharton, Paul Jennings and Matthew Guinan.

Meany said the dinner would pay "public honor to a man who has been a staunch trade unionist and warm friend."

Alabama Dock Election Set After 10-Year Fight

A 10-year quest by the Firemen & Oilers for an election among 600 Alabama state dock employes won judicial approval in a federal court order for an election without further delay.

The 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans ordered an election to be held at Mobile, Ala., among employes of the state's cargo piers, warehouses, grain elevator, cold storage plant and other port facilities.

The appeals judges, voicing "dismay" at the length of the struggle, said "we order that the jousting must terminate so that the electoral tournament may proceed."

"Let the epilogue to this epic be written," Judge Irving L. Goldberg wrote for the court.

The decision noted that the law's command for a prompt and orderly settlement of labor disputes has been "made a mockery in cynical disregard of the Supreme Court's . . . words that there is to be 'no dragging out of the controversy into other tribunals of law.'"

The opinion concluded: "As we are witness these days to much vocalizing for participatory democracy, we can feel nothing but dismay at the length of the enforced . . . disengagement here."

Patience Praised

A union spokesman praised Mobile members for their patience in refusing to drop their battle for union representation. The Firemen & Oilers will stay "with them to the finish," he said.

The attempt of state dock workers to get an election began in 1958 when some of them signed membership cards.

In 1959 the union petitioned for an election among all employes except office and clerical workers and Mobile terminal railroad employes, already represented by other unions.

The Alabama State Docks Dept. refused to deal with the union on the ground that it could not be compelled to bargain collectively with employes.

The National Mediation Board decided it had jurisdiction under the Railway Labor Act definition of a "carrier" as including any railroad carrier "and any company which is directly or indirectly owned or controlled by, or under common control with, any carrier by railroad."

The first legal skirmishing was over the NMB's right to see Docks Dept. records. The department refused to post election notices and when the board finally called for a vote Mar. 8, 1968, got an injunction against the election. The injunction now is dissolved and the NMB will set another date for a vote unless it is further restrained by the courts.

Wall St. Pact Wins Pay Gain At Exchange

New York—Wage increases of 15 to 17.5 percent within the next 20 months are provided in a renewal contract negotiated by the Office & Professional Employes for 2,100 employes of the New York Stock Exchange.

OPEIU Local 205 won a long-time membership objective when management of the big board agreed to "fold in" to the wage structure a quarterly bonus formerly ranging from 2 to 20 percent. By doing this, the new agreement adds a total of 18 percent to wages.

3-Step Raise

The new pact, ratified both by members and the exchange's board of governors, provides wage increases in three steps:

Seven percent effective May 4 for employes working 40 hours a week. 6 percent for floor employes and others working 32.5 hours weekly; additional raises of 4-5 percent next Mar. 1, and a final 5-5.5 percent more on Jan. 3, 1971.

The union also won a wage differential for those on late afternoon or midnight shifts, and other improvements, Pres. John R. Kret reported.

The former contract, due to expire May 3, was extended by agreement to May 31. The new expiration date is Oct. 30, 1971, with an automatic three-month extension clause to prevent crisis bargaining.

Final sessions in this year's negotiations centered on wages, with two members of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service assisting the negotiators.

Labor Policy Set for Federal Reserve Banks

The Federal Reserve Board for the first time has said it will recognize and bargain with unions representing its employes.

The system, with 12 district banks and 24 branch offices, is exempt from the National Labor Relations Act and is not covered by the presidential Executive Order that governs the federal civil service.

The Fed's Board of Governors announced a labor policy patterned after the federal government's program. It said its action was intended to "contribute to continued effective employe-management relations."

Some 15,000 non-supervisory employes work for the Federal Reserve System.

As is the case with direct federal government employes, strikes are barred.

Back Pay Won At J. P. Stevens Near $1 Million

New York—Back pay won by the Textile Workers Union of America for employes of J. P. Stevens & Co., who were discriminated against by that firm for union activity in violation of the law, is now nearing the $1 million mark, Pres. William Pollock announced.

Pollock said a second round of claims against Stevens has been settled, with 18 workers sharing a gross payment of $187,798.71 in lost wages. Combined with an earlier settlement involving 71 workers, the total paid out by J. P. Stevens in line with National Labor Relations Board directives now stands at $854,784.27.

The $1 million mark is certain to be passed when the NLRB's order in a third Stevens case, involving 17 more workers, is complied with, Pollock said.

Two of the workers benefiting from the most recent payments by Stevens collected checks in excess of $20,000 before taxes. Juanita Faulkenberry of Great Falls, S. C., received $20,444 while the award to John R. Fulbright of the Dunean Plant in Greenville, S. C., was $20,369.70, Pollock said.

Rail Safety Legislation Held 'Long Overdue'

Direct action by Congress "to deal with the deplorable railway safety problem" was urged by A. H. Chesser, national legislative director of the United Transportation Union.

Appearing before the Senate Commerce Committee in support of the railway safety bill sponsored by Sen. Vance Hartke (D-Ind.), Chesser spoke on behalf of all railway labor.

He noted that the Dept. of Transportation reported 2,359 persons killed and 24,608 injured in railroad accidents in 1968, and that 8,028 train accidents last year exceeded 1967 accidents by 10 percent.

"There is no indication that the transfer of safety responsibility from the Interstate Commerce Commission to the Dept. of Transportation has had any effect in improving railroad safety," Chesser said.

Pointing out that virtually all types of railroad accidents have increased, Chesser said the prime responsibility for accidents "must be placed directly on the carriers."

He said: "The limited legal authority possessed by the federal government over railroad safety has made it impossible for the government to take effective action to compel railroads to operate safely."

Chesser explained how the proposed safety bill would fill in regulatory gaps in existing laws and listed five areas in which additional regulatory controls are essential. They are: track and roadway equipment, operating rules, highway grade-crossing hazards and explosives and inflammables.

"The federal government has broad, effective authority with respect to both air safety and regulated common carrier motor carriers," he said. "It is indisputable, as experience over the years has demonstrated, that a comprehensive railroad safety statute is long overdue."

Outstanding Job Films Win 'Randy' Awards

New York—Union officials shared the dais with business leaders, stage and screen stars, educators, and government representatives at a Job Film Fair award dinner sponsored by the American Foundation on Automation & Employment, headed by Arbitrator Theodore W. Kheel.

The event climaxed a two-day seminar where the motion picture approach to "jobs in the ghetto" problems were explored by more than 400 representatives of labor, industry, minority groups and education.

"Randy" awards, so-named in honor of AFL-CIO Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph, were presented to 12 producers of films dealing with the training of minority group men and women and sociological problems of the ghetto.

The films were selected from 250 entered in the competition from Puerto Rico, Canada and Britain, as well as the United States.

The two-day workshop, supported by a $25,000 Ford Foundation grant, was the first of its kind to deal with films devoted to jobs and job training.

Keynote speaker was Postmaster Gen. Winton M. Blount who hailed the efforts of the American Foundation on Automation & Employment to establish a central clearing house for information on job training.

Production of the films is part of a massive educational campaign being launched by industry with the cooperation of the labor movement, professional actors, and technicians.

Film Increase Predicted

Kheel, the foundation's president, predicted that the first international job film fair would lead to a 25 percent increase in production of such films by next year.

He said films like those entered in the competition "have proven their effectiveness in training people for unfamiliar jobs. And they have a host of other uses as well, from explaining the company's contribution to the community to acquainting supervisors with the background problems of the hard-core unemployed."

The "Randy" awards covered four categories: Understanding the Ghetto, Orientation Toward World of Work, Sensitivity Training and Orientation of White Managers, and On The Job Training.

Excerpts of several of the winning films were shown at the awards dinner at which James Lavenson, director of the Hotel Corp. of America, served as toastmaster.

The American Foundation on Automation & Employment, a nonprofit organiaztion, was founded in 1962 by unions and management. Its aims are to provide an opportunity for involved groups to deal with the human problems created by automation and technological change and to demonstrate what labor and management can accomplish in their own and the public interest by working together.

R. C. Coutts, Dispatchers Leader, Dies

Chicago—R. C. Coutts, president of the Train Dispatchers since 1959, collapsed and died at the union's headquarters here. He was 69.

The union's joint board chose Vice Pres. Charles R. Pfenning, 49, of Coggon, Ia., to fill Coutts's unexpired term until the October 1971 convention. Pfenning became a telegrapher at 17, served in the Army Signal Corps from 1942 to 1948, and returned to telegraphy until 1950, when he became a dispatcher on the Western Pacific. He was office chairman and general chairman until elected as ATDA vice president in 1964.

Memorial services for Coutts were held in Chicago, with burial in Grinnell, Ia. Born in Grinnell, he was a telegrapher until promoted to dispatcher, became general chairman on the Rock Island, and was elected union vice president in 1947 president in 1959.

In other changes caused by Coutts' death, D. V. Chandler, trustee for the union's Western region, was named vice president to succeed Pfenning. R. E. Johnson, general chairman for the Santa Fe System, was named to Chandler's former post.

IAM Members Vote to Reject Pact at United

Mechanics and ground service crewmen for United Air Lines voted to reject a proposed three-year contract which they said failed to meet the needs of more than 17,000 members employed by the carrier.

The IAM said it will ask management to return to the bargaining table. It did not release details of the company offer, but said it parallels those offered by other major U.S. airlines in recent settlements.

The union previously came to terms in this year's round of negotiations with Eastern, Northeast and Braniff air lines, and with Air Canada after a two-week strike.

More than 1,000 IAM members have been locked out since Jan. 21 on National Airlines, whose planes have been maintained mainly by supervisors and strikebreakers ever since, the union charged.

Still to be settled are IAM contracts with Northwest, Trans World and Continental air lines.

'RANDY' AWARD—named for AFL-CIO Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph—is presented to Harold Mayer by Motion Picture Academy Award winner Estelle Parsons at the first awards banquet of the Job Film Fair in New York City. James Lavenson, Hotel Corp. of America director who was banquet toastmaster, observes, while Joseph Krevisky of the Job Film Fair staff applauds. The fair is sponsored by the American Foundation on Automation & Employment.

Keyed to Organizing, Defense:

Utility Workers Vote Per Capita Increase

By John Oravec

Miami Beach—An expanded organizing drive and a campaign to build the union's defense fund were launched by the Utility Workers following an increase in per capita payments from $1 a month to $1.25.

More than 400 delegates to the UWUA's 16th convention here voted overwhelmingly to raise the dues following an appeal by the executive board.

Pres. William J. Pachler noted that several lengthy strikes during the past year had cut into the defense fund by $350,000.

From the increased dues, 20 cents will be added to the defense fund—double the previous allocation. Additional funds will be funneled into the union's organization efforts, Pachler said.

A convention resolution also clarified the unon's stand on strike sanctions by UWUA locals, specifying that at least a simple majority of members' votes is needed to call a strike action. But local bylaws will prevail if they require a two-thirds or three-quarters majority.

Atomic Concern

Concerned with the effect developments in atomic energy will have on Americans and workers—especially in the utilities industry—the UWUA called on the Atomic Energy Commission to accelerate its program of developing economically feasible nuclear technology.

It also urged federal guidelines governing nuclear power plants "to enable all utilities to participate in such development, to safeguard worker and public health safety, to protect the air and water from discharge of radioactive wastes and to meet the needs of power-short areas of the country."

The UWUA atomic energy resolution stressed stiff federal standards for the protection of workers from atomic radiation exposure in all industries, including underground mines.

Sen. John O. Pastore (D-R.I.) emphasized the importance of the technological advances in nuclear energy, calling on the union to maintain a deep involvement in the field. He noted that by the end of the century the need for power will triple and most of it will have to come from nuclear sources. "And that's you," he told Utility Workers' delegates.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler traced the federation's fight for tax justice.

"This battle pits people—workers, wage and salary earners, housewives, children—against some of the richest and most powerful interests in this country," he said.

Noting that "we've all just lived through the annual agony of tax time," Schnitzler said this makes people especially aware of the income tax structure problem.

"We want that load shared equally and fairly," he stressed. "To us, that is justice for people."

Tax Reform Urged

The delegates promptly passed a resolution calling for the elimination of tax loopholes for the wealthy. It also urged a minimum tax on all income "over a total which would provide protection for legitimate small investors," but which would require some tax payment from huge incomes that are now preferentially taxed or totally exempt.

National Labor Relations Board member Howard Jenkins, Jr., discussed the operations of the NLRB. He said the board continues to maintain the important function of guaranteeing workers' rights, but warned of the consequences that may result should the NLRB be replaced by a "labor court," as numerous antilabor forces are promoting.

Jenkins' Appeal

Jenkins appealed for full labor support of the civil rights struggle, which he noted, parallels the efforts of the labor movement.

The convention answered Jenkins' appeal with a resolution pledging "our unrelenting and strongest support for legislation that would not only fully implement existing civil rights laws, but, would also eliminate those economic and social weaknesses which are so largely responsible for racial discrimination."

In other resolutions, the delegates urged Congress to act on:

- An investigation of conglomerate mergers to halt the current wave of manipulations where control of wide segments of the nation's economy is slipping into the hands of a few giant concerns.
- Wider coverage for the Fair Labor Standards Act to take in the millions of workers who are still excluded from the federal minimum wage protection.
- Stronger legislation to curb abuses of consumers.
- Extension of Medicare benefits to disabled workers and to child health programs.
- Measures to re-employ workers displaced by automation and to improve existing income maintenance programs.

The convention also voted to increase pension benefits of UWUA retired officers and staff members 10 percent effective immediately and revised other provisions in the union's pension program.

Other key speakers at the convention were COPE Deputy Dir. Joseph Rourke and UWUA General Counsel Gerhard P. Van Arkel.

This is a portion of the massive turnout for the Union-Industries Show in Denver's exhibition center. More than 200,000 toured the spectacular six-day show.

Ethics in Government

LAST YEAR the House and Senate adopted new rules on ethics and conduct covering members and employes that were laudable in their intent but called for only limited financial disclosure reports.

The statements required under the new rules have been filed and their obvious shortcomings put on public display. This plus the public furor raised by the conduct of Justice Abe Fortas that led to his resignation from the Supreme Court, and the continuing questioning of possible conflicts of interest of executive branch officials, adds up to a new urgency for the creation of a body of law covering public officials—elected or appointed.

The basis for such a statute is simple enough: a public official should be required to make full disclosure of income over and above his salary as a public official, and as importantly, the source of the outside income.

The electorate has a basic right to this information in making its choices of elected officials and in placing its full confidence in the government in terms of those appointed to office.

CONTRAST the principle of full disclosure with the current practice.

In Congress, members of the Senate must disclose fees for speeches, writing, television appearances and other related activities as well as the source of political contributions and gifts. House members must list interests worth more than $5,000 in any firm doing substantial business with the federal government or subject to federal regulatory agencies, as well as other sources of outside income, of capital gains exceeding $5,000 and association with any professional organization from which they get $1,000 or more.

Members of both houses must file confidential financial reports with special committees, but these can be opened only by a majority vote of the committees.

In the executive branch, Cabinet and sub-Cabinet officers must divest themselves of holdings in companies doing business with the government, and all executive employes are barred from direct dealings with former firms or employers.

While the Constitution provides for impeachment of federal judges for "treason, bribery or other high crimes and misdemeanors," the only statutes that exist make it a felony for a judge to peddle influence or practice law.

THERE IS an obvious need for an across-the-board code of ethics and conduct rather than this bits and pieces approach. And while Congress exhibits commendatory zeal in seeking to avert conflicts of interest in the executive branch, there is a need for certain prohibitions on the legislative side.

The basic problem is to assure full confidence of the nation in the men elected and appointed to public office. This confidence can be called into question by failure to make a full and complete disclosure of financial status.

A carefully developed code with meaningful provisions that can be enforced will go a long way to assure confidence and reinforce the basic principles of a democratic system of government.

A Word Edgewise:

Vietnamese Base Political Life On French, Not U.S. Model

By John P. Roche

OVER THE YEARS a number of efforts have been launched from Washington and the U.S. Embassy, Saigon, to get the South Vietnamese to act in sensible political fashion; that is, to behave like Americans. In specific terms, we have hoped that they would set up a stable constitutional government, implement civil rights, and form a nice, solid two-party system.

Although critics interpreted this pressure as part of Pres. Johnson's alleged compulsion to impose the "Great Society" on the world, it was a notion that is quite traditional and reflects a generalized American hope that democratic institutions should be nurtured throughout the globe.

The Foreign Assistance Act, for example, contains a provision (Section 281 of Title IX) that urges programs to encourage the growth of democratic institutions and "training in skills required for effective participation in governmental and political processes essential to self-government."

Sponsored by liberals in Congress, notably Rep. Donald Fraser (D-Minn.), this interventionist credo clearly justifies the use of American economic power to shape political development elsewhere.

Currently there is considerable effort under way to intervene in the internal affairs of Greece by cutting off aid to the military junta.

Some critics denounce this as "moral imperialism." If believing that a free society is better than a dictatorship makes one into a "moral imperialist," I cheerfully plead guilty. I hasten to add that one who believes this can have no favorite dictators. If he jumps up and down with rage about the Greek junta, he must reserve at least a paragraph for Fidel Castro and Ho Chi Minh.

The real problem, however, is implementing this shining aspiration. How does one go about the job of encouraging the growth of democratic institutions?

Here the Republic of Viet Nam is an interesting case study, for since the Honolulu Conference in February 1966—at which Vice Pres. Ky promised Johnson that Saigon would move toward representative, constitutional government—a tremendous amount of American advice has been provided, and the Vietnamese have made great progress in the right direction.

The current South Vietnamese government has taken a terrible beating from American commentators. Without for a second arguing that it is a democratic paradise, I am prepared to defend the proposition that the Republic of Viet Nam is somewhat more democratic than 80 percent of the members of the United Nations.

YET THE VIETNAMESE are persistently un-American. When their new constitution came out, for example, Sen. Stephen Young (D-Ohio) loosed a salvo at it because it had no Bill of Rights. Young worked himself up into quite a frenzy and the theme was widely repeated in anti-war circles. Regrettably no one in the Senate caught Young's cultural parochialism: the Vietnamese Constitution in its treatment of civil rights is almost a line-by-line repetition of the Constitution of the Fifth French Republic.

Three years ago Pres. Johnson sent me to Saigon to review the possibilities of democratic political development. I spent a good deal of time talking to Vietnamese political figures and within two weeks I was, figuratively speaking, back in France (where I once taught). The political vocabulary, the whole governmental style was French and it soon became quite clear that—while American pressure for democratization was vital—the Vietnamese were going to draw their models from Paris, not Washington.

Some nit-wit accused me of going to Saigon to write the Vietnamese Constitution. The truth was that my report to the President came down to one proposition: "If we are lucky, we will get the Fifth French Republic; if we are unlucky, we will get the Fourth."

This pessimistic advice (based on my certainty that the Vietnamese were far better at Vietnamese politics than Americans) distressed various associates who were busy trying to work out a foolproof formula for a strong two-party system in Viet Nam.

They are still at it, but the Vietnamese persist in being Vietnamese and looking elsewhere for their cultural style. Like the French, they fundamentally believe that there is something prosaic and stultifying about a two-party system and I am convinced that, no matter how much it distresses Sen. Young, they will persist in this heresy.

Meany Tells Laundry Workers:

Unjust Tax Bite on Workers Swells Demand for Reforms

The following is excerpted from a speech by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to the Laundry Workers convention in Washington.

YOUR UNION and all the unions in the AFL-CIO are waging a fight to put real justice into the tax system. And there is real need for that.

All of us here, and the vast majority of Americans, just filed their annual April 15th tax returns. Lots of Americans even had to pay much more than had been deducted from their pay envelopes every pay period.

But a lot of people, with income many times yours, had little or nothing to worry about on April 15th. They just do not have to pay any income tax at all. They did not chisel—they did not gyp. They just did exactly what the law—as it now stands—lets them do.

And that's where the real rub comes. The law is rigged in their favor and it is rigged against workers.

Workers, wage earners, salaried employes pay their taxes pay day after pay day, without fail.

But what about some millionaires and other high income people—those who make fortunes every year trading in real estate or the stock markets? What about the "loophole set?"

Well, they get all the breaks—all the tax breaks.

We in the union movement are tired of playing the tax game with a stacked deck. Workers and taxpayers the country over are demanding fairness and equity in the tax system. And they mean to get it.

We say there's no justice in a system that lets millionaires pay no taxes at all while it forces workers, earning barely enough to make ends meet, to make up the difference. That's exactly what happened in 1967. Twenty-one millionaires completely avoided income taxes that year, while $100 million in taxes were paid by workers earning less than what the government itself says it takes for poverty-level living.

Here is one example of what's wrong that seems to me to sum up the problem:

A married worker who earned $8,000 paid a $1,000 tax bill. But in that same year, 134 people who reported incomes over $200,000 didn't pay any taxes at all.

No wonder Americans are calling for tax justice. No wonder the labor movement is involved in this fight.

Now we in the AFL-CIO aren't just demanding that Congress "do something—do anything" to reform the tax system. We have developed a comprehensive tax reform program that our tax experts say will put the system in line with justice, equity and fairness.

We've presented our program to Congress—to the House Ways & Means Committee, where federal tax laws are written. We have shown them how they can plug loopholes that now cost the federal treasury as much as $15 billion every year.

And we have shown them how some $7 billion of those savings can be used for long-overdue relief for that vast majority of American taxpayers who are in the low, moderate and middle-income brackets.

For instance, we propose an end to the special break now given unearned capital gains income—the profits from long-term investment of dollars. We say that the investment a worker makes—his skill and talent, his life—is just as important, just as valuable. We say that the profits the rich make from their dollar investments should be taxed the same way that the earnings of workers on their human investments are taxed—as ordinary income.

PLUGGING the capital gains loophole is just one of the tax reforms that the AFL-CIO demands—a list too long to recite here today. But the capital gains loophole is typical of the glaring unfairness of the law as it now stands. It is a clear example of why the law has to be changed.

As you know, Pres. Nixon has asked Congress to extend the so-called temporary 10 percent surtax, instead of letting it expire at the end of June. Without tax reforms, that surtax only adds to the already too-heavy tax burden of workers. It really doesn't affect the millionaires and other high income people.

A surtax is an additional percentage added on to the regular tax. And when a millionaire is already paying nothing in taxes, the surtax doesn't cost him a cent.

Under the circumstances, there was only one thing we could do. We said: "No. We will not support the surtax until it is combined with immediate, substantial and equitable reform of the entire tax system."

In a real sense, victory in the fight for tax justice is up to you and to workers everywhere.

You and they can do the job—by seeing to it that your congressman and your senators know how you feel. Write them letters, call them on the phone, see them while you are here in Washington.

Make sure you have the details—they are available in the material we've sent over here for your delegates.

Get the message across that we are willing to pay our fair share.

But we refuse to pay the share of others—the share of the millionaires who today escape taxation.

After all, they can afford to pay their own bills.

Faupl Views ILO Issue:

Global Minimum Wage Action One Way to Curb Slave Labor

A WORLD-WIDE minimum wage may soon be a major issue in the International Labor Organization, the U.S. worker delegate to the tripartite United Nations specialized agency reported in a network radio interview.

The aim would be to "take slave labor out of the goods produced for sale on the world market," said Rudolph Faupl, who is also international representative for the Machinists. He said the ILO has "already undertaken a wage study of international corporations in various parts of the world."

Noting that the ILO rounds out a half-century this year, Faupl said the world-wide organization made up of worker, employer and government representatives, has proved its worth in formulating and stimulating adoption of labor and social legislation in various member nations. He cited the social security system in the United States as an example.

Questioned by reporters on Labor News Conference, Faupl said that with "few exceptions, standards in the United States are higher than the minimum standards adopted by the ILO." But, he noted, the failure of the United States to ratify more than "a handful" of the 127 conventions adopted by the ILO "has had an adverse impact on the workers in other parts of the world."

FAUPL SAID that although the U.S. worker delegate is appointed at the recommendation of the AFL-CIO, policies and tactics are developed through consultation with government and employer delegates, as well as delegations from other countries—"especially worker delegates who are committed to the objectives of the ILO—the free trade union movement."

While there are differences of opinion among U.S. worker, employer and government delegates, "this is inherent in a free society . . . and on most of the basic issues, we agree," he added.

Reporters questioning Faupl on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs program, broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m. EDT, on the Mutual radio network, were Stanley Levey of Scripps-Howard Newspapers and William Eaton of the Chicago Daily News.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

WHEN PRES. NIXON nominated Judge Warren Burger of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia as Chief Justice of the United States, he said that sometimes a Chief Justice can have even more influence on the course of the nation than a President.

The Nixon statement should make every American realize that the court and its leadership can affect the lives of every working man and woman—union or not.

The Fortas case, the attacks on Justice Douglas for his connection with the Parvin Foundation, the retirement of Chief Justice Warren on July 1, the advanced age of Justice Black, have suddenly become more than headline stories for workers.

They are personal stories not to be ignored.

What is clear is that the U.S. Supreme Court is certain to be remolded in the next year or two by a relatively conservative Republican President.

Until the Roosevelt Administration, court appointments usually went to more or less venerable legal scholars with a conservative bent. Liberals, such as Brandeis, were the exception rather than the rule. When Roosevelt found his New Deal legislation thwarted by a court that he inherited after 12 years of Republican rule, he tried first to "pack" it, but Congress balked. However, over his long tenure in office he managed to replace the "nine old men" with men of his own choosing.

Black, Frankfurter, Douglas, Murphy were all scholars enough, but they were also legal liberals and far closer to the political scene than their predecessors. In the end the Supreme Court reflected "people" far more than "economic interests," and its decisions soon showed this change.

Eisenhower appointees to the court were on the conservative side—except for Earl Warren, three-time Republican governor of California. As Chief Justice he has led the court on a liberal course in the field of civil rights that even, at times, brought on hysterical cries of "Impeach Warren."

THE WARREN COURT, by and large, has dealt fairly with organized labor, notably in the past 10 years. In 1955, for instance, the AFL-CIO Executive Council reported to the convention:

"Unions posted an exceptional won-lost record in the unusually large batch of labor cases which were considered by the Supreme Court during the past two years. Of some 28 significant decisions, 20 can be scored as labor victories."

Only three were outright defeats, in the judgment of the legal staff; three involved legal difficulties and the other two losses were minor. Basically the Supreme Court has been supporting NLRB decisions, many of which have stirred the wrath of the business community.

Now, suddenly, the Warren Court appears on the verge of great change.

What does this mean for organized labor?

Obviously a great deal depends on the kind of men Pres. Nixon names during the years ahead.

The makeup of the National Labor Relations Board in the future holds special Supreme Court significance. The current court has upheld NLRB decisions to an extraordinary degree. In fiscal 1967 the court sustained the NLRB in 7 out of 8 cases.

Conservative demands for a "labor court" to supersede the NLRB have dropped off of late. Conservative business groups are hoping that a conservative NLRB plus a conservative Supreme Court, to be named by the Nixon Administration, may make a special labor court unnecessary from their viewpoint.

Pres. Nixon already has given us one clear indication of his thinking about the nature of the appointments he will make. Judge Burger is in the tradition of the conservative justices of the past. His record on civil rights is good. His record on "law and order" is in line with the "strict constructionists" which means "traditionalist." As chief justice, he is certain to influence the whole "tone" of the court, possibly in a new direction.

THE ILO'S DRIVE to end "slave labor" in the production of goods for the world market may soon raise the issue of a world-wide minimum wage, U.S. Worker Delegate Rudolph Faupl, center, said on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Stanley Levey, left, of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers and William Eaton of the Chicago Daily News. The program is heard Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EDT, on Mutual Radio.

How to Buy:

Price Tags on Cars Trimmed While Meat Costs Grow Fat

By Sidney Margolius

JUMPING MEAT PRICES are shocking and alarming housewives this spring as they find tags of $1 a pound and sometimes more on some widely-used cuts of beef.

A survey by this writer shows that many meats have gone up 10 to 25 cents a pound from a year ago. Even hamburger now costs 79 cents in many cities, while boneless chuck roast is getting close to $1 a pound. Round steak has gone over $1.50 in some cities.

If you had any thought of treating your family to a sirloin steak, you'll probably have to pay around $1.45 a pound. Lamb and veal chops and cutlets have gone out of sight altogether with price tags of $1.50 to $2.19 a pound.

There is no shortage of beef to justify the startling rise in prices. In fact, livestock marketings are running ahead of last year. Producers and processors are simply cashing in on strong demand.

Pork, too, which has been relatively reasonable, is going up although less drastically.

If you don't need to eat much, you at least can find a new phenomenon—Detroit actually has cut prices of some cars, the smaller ones, that is.

Car Competition: The introduction of Ford's new small car, the Maverick, with a $2,000 list price, has led Chrysler to cut the tag on its compact Valiant, to a basic list price of about $2,100. (These prices are for the least-costly two-door models.) Cuts range from $100 to as much as $300. Other compact cars in this price range or a little higher include the Rambler. With dealer discounts, the Maverick is available for less than $2,000.

The Maverick was introduced to compete especially with the Volkswagen and other small imported cars. Foreign cars have been grabbing an increasingly big share of the U.S. car market this year—selling at a rate 17 percent ahead of last year even though car sales in general are lagging.

Both the Maverick and Valiant cost about $200 more than the Volks but are larger cars.

With their larger size and six cylinders, the Maverick and other U.S.-made compacts do not have the gas-saving economy of the small imported cars. But they can get at least 20 miles to the gallon or more under ordinary driving conditions.

Another advantage of light cars like these is that they do not need extra options such as power steering. They usually are less expensive to repair and service.

BUT WITH ANY CAR, you need to try it out yourself to see how it handles and steers.

In general, new-car prices begin to dip in June with successive price trims until the real price cutting starts in September. Used cars, however, have gone up this spring rather sharply. They don't usually go down until mid-summer.

Booming Home Prices: The inflation is sending housing prices as well as food prices spiraling. Individual new homes are well out of reach now of families earning average industrial pay. Median (or middle) sales price of new houses this spring reach $25,800, a jump over $1,200 over last year's $24,600.

Mortgages are still very expensive, with rates around the country up to 7.5-8.5 percent and lenders also charging points, Robert J. Cole, New York Times financial specialist found in a new survey. "Points" are an extra fee. For example, 4 points means an extra fee of 4 percent, or $800 on a $20,000 mortgage. Cole found that in some areas lenders are charging as much as 6 to 8 points.

Often you may not realize you are paying "points" because the lender may require the seller or builder to pay them. But this extra fee usually becomes part of the price the seller charges.

Food Buying Calendar: You may be tired of eggs, chicken and turkey, but these are the best buys for June.

Researchers Report:

Job Satisfaction Tied To Status in Society

STUDIES IN THE UNITED STATES and other industrialized nations show a clear connection between over-all job satisfaction and social status, a University of Michigan researcher reports.

Dr. John P. Robinson of the Survey Research Center, in the U-M Institute for Social Research, says that the more status an individual has, the more satisfaction he is likely to derive from his job.

The conclusion is based on a summary of research results from job satisfaction questions asked of representative cross-section samples.

Research in this area does not indicate, however, that low-status workers are dissatisfied to the point of revolt. According to Dr. Robinson, just having a job seems to provide a high degree of satisfaction.

Well over 80 percent of the working population give their job an over-all positive evaluation when straightforward job satisfaction questions are employed. It is only the question "If you had it to do again, would you pick the same job?" that elicits negative response from majorities of workers.

"This hardly means that they are ecstatically attached to their jobs," Robinson observes. "Rather their general mood has been well described as one of 'fatalistic contentment.' "

Robinson's remarks are in one of the chapters he contributed to the recently released book "Measures of Occupational Attitudes and Occupational Characteristics," published by the Institute for Social Research.

Money and other external factors have proved to be major causes of job dissatisfaction, the report reveals, while self-fulfillment and related intrinsic factors are most often listed as determinants of job satisfaction.

Here again, the report concludes, the results are directly related to social status. The higher one's status, the more gratification one expects and recevies from the job. Those in low-status jobs become adjusted to the lack of opportunities for self-fulfillment.

Robinson says the recurring finding that blue-collar workers seem more concerned with the extrinsic factors of work (money), whereas higher-status workers concern themselves more with problems of ego-gratification, is in part attributable to the fact that high-level jobs in the social hierarchy already are well paid. They offer "the best of both worlds."

Studies also show, the U-M researcher notes, that people in "data-oriented" professions are far less contented than those in "people-oriented" professions. Women, older people, those free of close supervision, and those with an orderly work history are among groups showing the greatest satisfaction from their work.

Soup to Nonsense:

Anxieties of Worrywarts Eased By Strict Grieving Schedule

A FRIEND OF MINE has worked out a worry schedule, and she claims that it has done wonders for her. Not only does she worry more efficiently than she used to, but her mental health has improved enormously.

Like many of us, she used to worry in a disorganized, hit-or-miss fashion, flitting distractedly from one problem to another. One minute she'd be shaking her head over the population explosion, and the next she'd be fretting about her ragged cuticle or wondering where on earth she put the barbecue tools last September.

Often, at 2 a.m., she'd stare into the darkness, unable to decide which of her anxieties most deserved her immediate attention. Should she wring her hands about her son's motorcycle? Her daughter's long-haired boyfriend? The brown spots on the rhododendrons? Her husband's weight problem?

Or might she better brood on more cosmic problems? Student riots? Water pollution? The situation in Rhodesia? The crisis in the Middle East? The Paris peace talks?

Being a fairly compulsive worrier myself, I was eager to find out how my friend had organized her schedule.

First, she made a list of all her current anxieties. Then she arranged them in alphabetical order, beginning with Accidents (possibilities of) and ending with Zinnias (whatever was the matter with the puny little things?)

It was her intention to worry her way through the alphabet, one letter at a time. Thus, she could fret on Monday about Bills, Backache, Biafra, the Bureau of Internal Revenue and Budgets; but she must postpone until Tuesday her concerns about Clothes, Carpet Stains, Colds, Crabgrass, Children, Computers, Car Problems and Communism.

Not surprisingly, she ran into difficulties. She found herself with a lot more P's than Q's, and no XYZ's at all except Zinnias which didn't actually qualify as a worry, merely a small nagging concern.

A LITTLE TINKERING corrected these imbalances. By combining some letters and adjusting classifications (for example, she maneuvered her mother-in-law into the G's by calling her Grandma), she worked out a nicely balanced worry program.

My friend is quick to admit that she doesn't follow it slavishly. When her husband is on a plane bound for Chicago, or when her daughter hasn't come home by 1:30 a.m., she sensibly suspends her schedule. It would be utter folly at a time like that to allow herself to dwell on anything but torturing visions of smoking engines and ambulances speeding through the night with sirens screaming. But these are emergency situations which don't, mercifully, come up every day.

For ordinary, day-in-day-out worrying, my friend finds her schedule very helpful.

Outlines Foreign Aid Program:

Nixon Submits Plan On Post Office Shift

Pres. Nixon has sent messages to Congress urging that the Post Office Dept. be taken out of the federal government and asking a continued foreign aid program with new incentives for private investors.

The President described his request to turn over the postal service to a government-owned but largely-autonomous corporation as "one of the most significant proposals that will be made during the entire period of this Administration."

It is a revival of a plan first advanced by former Postmaster Gen. Lawrence F. O'Brien and supported last year by the majority of a presidential commission set up to study it.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, a member of the commission, dissented from the recommendation. The major postal unions strongly opposed the plan, and there was only a thin sprinkling of congressional support for the proposal.

Answers Criticism

Nixon, in his message, sought to answer past criticism of the concept. He said it would make possible modernization and greater efficiency, eliminate political influences in filling postal jobs, and permit "new and extensive collective bargaining rights" for postal workers, whose pay and basic working conditions are now set by Congress.

Postmaster Gen. Winton M. Blount said the collective bargaining rights would stop short of the right to strike. He told newsmen the proposed legislation would set up a permanent panel on disputes, with compulsory arbitration as the final step.

There appeared to be little likelihood that Congress would act on the postal plan this year. The Administration reportedly is hoping for a buildup of public support for the proposal as a means of changing congressional sentiment in the future.

The President asked Congress for $2.58 billion in foreign aid appropriations for the fiscal year starting July 1.

It is the smallest foreign aid request in the program's history, but is still some $900 million more than Congress approved last year.

The President asked $2.2 billion for U.S. economic assistance to developing countries around the world, including a boost in technical assistance programs. He proposed $375 million for military assistance, the amount voted by Congress last year. And he requested $75 million to start a new public corporation to promote private investment in the developing nations.

The new corporation would sell insurance against loss to overseas private investors, backed by the credit of the federal government.

Nixon also said he will name a task force of prominent private citizens to study and make recommendations on the future course of the foreign aid program.

Congress has consistently voted less money than both Democratic and Republican presidents have requested for foreign aid. The President's success in getting an appropriation close to his budget figure is likely to depend on whether a significant number of Republicans who have voted against foreign aid funds will drop or modify their opposition.

House Votes $20,000 Limitation On Subsidy Payments to Farms

not yet sent up legislation to bring this about.

The Agriculture Dept. has come under fire from both the U.S. Civil Rights Commission and the Justice Dept. for allegedly dragging its heels on enforcement of non-discrimination policies—and this became an issue in the legislation.

On the plus side, the full House Appropriations Committee added to the money bill drafted by a subcommittee an additional $250,000 for coordination of civil rights enforcement programs.

Then a section of the bill which would have directed the federal government to resume payments to school districts found in violation of desegregation rulings was ruled out of order. The payments are those made from the income of federally-owned timber lands which are earmarked for schools and roads as compensation for loss of taxes by the counties where the timber is located.

Adverse Ruling

The attempt to circumvent the fund cutoff was ruled to be legislation on an appropriations bill and thus a violation of the rules of the House.

On the minus side, an attempt to write into the bill a ban against use of funds to support racially discriminatory farm programs was rejected on a 91-66 non-record vote. Opponents noted that Title VI of the 1964 Civil Rights Act already bars federal funds to support discrimination.

The House overrode both the Administration and the Appropriations Committee by earmarking an additional $100 million to continue the program of low-cost, subsidized milk for all school children. The Administration had sought to limit elegibility to poor children.

In other congressional developments:

- The Senate Labor Committee approved a construction safety bill similar to one reported earlier by the House Committee. It would authorize the Secretary of Labor to set and enforce safety standards on federally-financed construction.
- Both the House and the Senate Labor Committees approved legislation permitting employer contributions to jointly administered funds to provide scholarships and day care centers. The legislation had been sought by the Clothing Workers and backed by the AFL-CIO. The committee bills specify that bargaining on such contributions is permitted but not mandatory. Last year, the House passed a similar bill but it died in the Senate.
- The Senate Finance Committee voted to repeal permanently a 1967 law limiting the number of children in each state who could be assisted under the Aid to Families with Dependent Children program.

The freeze never went into effect, since Congress last year postponed its effective date until July 1, 1969. At the urging of Sen. Fred R. Harris (D-Okla.), the Senate committee added a repealer to a minor, unrelated House-passed bill and cleared it for floor action.

- The 13-member Senate Democratic Policy Committee voted to carve out a more influential role for itself in the future. The committee unanimously agreed to make recommendations to Senate Democrats on significant legislation from time to time.

Senate Democratic Leader Mike Mansfield (Mont.) said the intent was to provide "some unifying party cement" in framing a Democratic position when the Republicans control the White House. In the past, the policy committee has confined itself to the role of "traffic cop" for legislation, deciding which bills should be brought up on the floor for action.

- The House Labor Committee approved a three-year extension of the Older Americans Act, authorizing $252 million over three years and setting up a new program to pay travel, food and clothing allowances to senior citizens who volunteer to work in programs for the aged.

Electoral Reform Issue Divides Senate Group

A Senate subcommittee split three ways over proposed constitutional amendments to change the method of electing the President and agreed to buck the issue up to the full Senate Judiciary Committee.

The electoral reform drive continued to mount in the House, however. The House Judiciary Committee made public a strongly-worded report spelling out its reasons for supporting the direct, popular election of the President and Vice President.

All other alternatives, the committee said, leave open the possibility of "election of a President who is not the first choice of the voters."

The House committee earlier had voted 28-6 approval of a constitutional amendment abolishing the Electoral College and assuring the election of the presidential ticket receiving the most popular votes—provided its nationwide vote was at least 40 percent of the ballots cast. With less than a 40 percent plurality, there would be a runoff between the two top slates.

Senate Action

The House committee's amendment is basically the same as that proposed and publicized by Sen. Birch Bayh (D-Ind.), chairman of the Senate Constitutional Amendments subcommittee.

But Bayh was unable to get his proposal acted on by the conservative-dominated subcommittee.

First the subcommittee voted 8-3 against a substitute proposal to retain the Electoral College, abolish individual electors, and divide each state's electoral votes in proportion to the popular vote in that state.

The subcommittee then voted 6-5 to substitute for the Bayh amendment a district system of dividing a state's electoral votes. Under this system, each state would be divided into districts and the candidate carrying a district would receive one electoral vote.

Bayh and his supporters then joined in a 9-0 vote to report the district plan to the full Judiciary Committee—but without a recommendation.

The effect is to enable the full committee to adopt whatever plan it chooses and direct election supporters think they can count on a majority—despite the opposition of Committee Chairman James O. Eastland (D-Miss.).

The AFL-CIO is strongly on record in favor of direct, popular vote election of the President and Vice President, as is the politically-potent American Bar Association. The U.S. Chamber of Commerce also has expressed its preference for this plan.

The House Judiciary Committee said in its report that the basic principle is that "no citizen's vote should have more weight than any other's—above all in the election of a President and Vice President."

Any constitutional amendment requires two-thirds approval by both the House and Senate, followed by ratification by three-fourths of the states.

District 50 Must Pay $8 Million UMW Loan

District 50, a union formerly affiliated with the Mine Workers, has been directed by a U.S. District Court to pay $8 million to the UMW and to stop using the words "United Mine Workers" in its title.

Judge Alexander Holtzoff of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia ruled after hearing testimony that District 50 must pay the balance due on a note its officers signed in 1962.

In a related lawsuit, the judge enjoined District 50 from continuing to use the name of its former parent organization.

Attorneys for District 50 asked for a stay of that order pending appeal to higher courts. UMW counsel said the union will oppose any further stay.

The court described the UMW as a nationwide labor organization of coal miners subdivided into numerous local unions, and District 50 as an organization of workers in gas, coke and chemical industries which formerly was allied with UMW and is likewise subdivided into local units.

The UMW, the court said, admitted the non-miners to membership in 1936 but was "very careful" not to make District 50 an integral part of the Mine Workers. District 50 had no vote in the UMW, and sent no delegates to its conventions.

It was a "vassal" rather than a member of the parent union "and was governed . . . in an autocratic method. It had no elections of its own and its members had no participation in its government and affairs" from 1936 to 1961, the court found.

UMW advanced funds to District 50 for 25 years but in 1962 the two unions agreed to operate as "separate, distinct and independent labor organizations," with either having the right to terminate affiliation on 30 days' notice.

District 50 signed a note for $8 million owed the UMW, and agreed to pay an affiliation fee of 10 cents a member per month. District 50 stopped making payments on the note in 1964, and the UMW terminated the affiliation Apr. 6, 1968, the court noted.

Government Revises Labor History Outline

The Labor Dept. has issued a new booklet on labor history in America. It is titled Important Events in American Labor History, 1778-1968.

The booklet is available at 25 cents per copy from the Superintendent of Documents, U.S. Government Printing Office, Washington, D.C., 20402.

LONG-RANGE DEVELOPMENTS for New York state's capital area are studied by students from Brooklyn's St. John the Evangelist School during a tour of Albany sponsored by the Seafarers. The 80 students were shown through the state house by state Sen. William J. Farrell, right. A capital guide explains the proposed developments on the model.

Court Scores Charleston Hospital For Race Bias in Jobs, Admissions

Charleston, S.C.—The Medical Society of South Carolina has been ordered to eliminate a wide "pattern and practice" of discrimination against Negroes in its operation of Roper Hospital here.

The U.S. District Court found the society violated the Civil Rights Act both with respect to employment policies and in admission and treatment of patients.

Federal Judge J. Robert Martin prescribed a detailed remedy in upholding the Justice Dept.'s request for an injunction against violations of the law's employment and public accommodations' provisions.

The decision drew additional attention to a city which has been in headlines because of a strike for union-recognition against the state Medical College Hospital and Charleston County Hospital.

The Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare said it is investigating complaints of racial discrimination at the state hospital, which receives federal funds.

The court found that operation of Roper Hospital—set up under an 1829 will of Thomas Roper for the medical treatment of "paupers without regard to religion, complexion or national origin"—has been on a "white-only" basis in admitting patients since 1957.

For most of 100 years prior to that time, the hospital was the primary facility for the treatment of Negroes. The change came with the opening of a new hospital facility and the closing of the old one.

The court said that most of the 232 Negroes among the hospital's 523 employes performed menial work, were paid less than white workers, and were obliged to use segregated facilities.

To the society's claim that its wage and promotion policies were based on "merit," the court said the policies were "subjective" and designed to keep Negroes in "the least attractive and lowest paid jobs."

It cited examples of Negro workers having remained "at the lowest paid levels even though some of them have as much as 10 years service."

The hospital was ordered to file a document with the court within 90 days showing each job classification, its duties, salary and grade or step promotion possibilities.

Also, the management was ordered to take a series of steps to assure against future discrimination in hiring, making job assignments and promoting workers.

The substance of the compliance program with regard to employment is to be communicated "to at least 10 prominent Negro citizens in the area, including at least three Negro physicians."

In other areas, the judge ordered the Roper hospital to:

- Eliminate race or color as a factor in the admission, assignment, classification, transfer or treatment of patients.
- Assign patients to floors, wings, wards, and rooms solely on the basis of age, sex, illness, or other relevant factors without regard to race or color.
- Operate all programs conducted or sponsored by or affiliated with the hospital without regard to race or color.
- "Desegregate all of the facilities for employes," including work areas, employes lounges, locker rooms, dressing rooms, bathrooms and toilets.

The order also forbids any discrimination against Negro doctors as staff members, interns or residents on the basis of their race.

Within 20 days of the order's issuance, the hospital must furnish all employes and members of the staff a brief written explanation of the court's order, and for a period of two years Roper must make quarterly reports to the U.S. Attorney General on all personnel actions.

Public Officials Revive Management Rights Cry

Los Angeles—Private industry's time-worn battlecry of "management rights" today threatens a rash of upheavals in the public sector, Pres. Jerry Wurf of the State, County & Municipal Employes told the National Academy of Arbitrators here.

"With ever-increasing determination and frequency, lawmakers are adopting 'management rights' statutes that are intended to negate that which is accomplished when the hurdle of (union) recognition has been crossed," Wurf said.

But public officials are going to have to accept the fact that public workers no longer are "willing to place their destiny in the fickle hands of lobbyists—no longer are they going to fill the role of the supplicant, the beggar," he added.

Wurf was a panelist at the one-day seminar on critical aspects of labor-management relations in the public sector.

He told the 400 arbitrators and labor and public officials that "the very inadequacy of the civil service system has resulted in the tremendous thrust of union organizing among public employes in recent years."

The highest percentage of trade union membership and the most militant public employe trade union movement is in states with the most elaborate civil service machinery, Wurf said.

His counterpart on the panel, Richard Carpenter, executive director of the League of California Cities, indicated public management was seeking to avert development of collective bargaining, as it is known and practiced in the private sector.

He said "the nature" of public employment requires a different approach although "there may be little difference between the needs and desires of public and private employes."

Benjamin Aaron, director of the UCLA Institute of Industrial Relations, predicted that public employment at federal, state and local levels would reach 15 million by 1975.

Apprenticeship Training Certified at 4th Prison

There are now four prisons in the United States that provide Labor Dept.-approved apprenticeship training programs for their inmates, Sec. of Labor George P. Shultz announced.

The latest to get approval of a program is the State Correctional Institution, London, Ohio. Earlier programs were set up at McNeil Island, Wash., federal penitentiary and Mansfield Reformatory and Chillicothe Correctional Institute, both in Ohio.

All of the programs are conducted with the cooperation of both labor and management outside the prisons.

Instant Cities:

Union Co-ops Fight The Housing Crisis

Co-op City is growing into a massive building complex that will be home for 15,382 New York City workers and their families by 1971.

The $300 million project is the nation's biggest apartment community and the world's largest housing cooperative. It is like many other union-sponsored housing cooperatives—although on a smaller scale — popping up around the country.

Labor has been involved in housing cooperatives since the mid-1920s, writes Harold Ostroff in the May issue of the American Federationist. It all started when the Clothing Workers backed a 303-apartment project in the Bronx.

From this effort, the pattern was set for most housing cooperatives that followed.

Under the leadership of Sidney Hillman, Jacob S. Potofsky and Abraham E. Kazan—the man Hillman picked to develop the ACWA cooperative housing program—the Amalgamated Housing Cooperative established the principles that are now the guidelines for today's cooperative communities, the article states.

The force behind Co-op City is the United Housing Foundation, a non-profit federation of 62 groups—trades unions, civic organizations and housing cooperatives.

The objective of the housing cooperative is to provide good housing to its members at the most reasonable prices, Ostroff points out. Tenants of Co-op City invest about $450 per room and pay about $25 a month. For this they receive fully air conditioned facilities, which on the private market in New York City would range up to $100 per room.

Apartments in Co-op City are available in one, two and three bedrooms.

Most of the money comes from a 45-year mortgage through the New York State Housing Finance Agency. The loan rate is considerably below the conventional mortgage charges, Ostroff reports.

The City of New York also has granted the cooperative a 50 percent tax abatement for 30 years. Despite the abatement, the city will be receiving about $6.6 million more in revenue from the project area than before the site was redeveloped.

Since the inception of housing cooperatives, open membership always has been a basic principle.

"One of the most encouraging aspects of the development of housing cooperatives has been that they create naturally integrated communities," observes Ostroff, who is also executive vice president of the UHF.

The UHF is an outgrowth of the initial ACWA project, which through the years was quadrupled in size. In 1965, the union sponsored three additional cooperatives that provided homes for 3,628 families.

Noting the success of the ACWA projects, a number of other unions entered the cooperative housing field as a critical shortage of homes arose following World War II and the mid-1950s. Among the leaders were the Ladies' Garment Workers, Local 3 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and the Meat Cutters.

In 1951, the United Housing Foundation was incorporated to establish a central organization for the various cooperatives that evolved through the years. ACWA Pres. Potofsky is president of the UHF and Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., financial secretary of IBEW Local 3, is vice president.

The combined strength of the organization has resulted in the foundation sponsoring and building eight cooperatives, Ostroff reports, which have provided homes for 30,442 families in the city. These communities were built at a cost of $536.5 million.

A 6,000-unit cooperative is on the drawing boards now that will be built by UHF for $125 million.

The union-backed housing cooperatives do not end at the edge of the Hudson River.

Ostroff points out that unions have been deeply involved in projects elsewhere in the nation:

- In Roxbury, Mass., Service Employes Local 254 sponsored a $3.3 million 200-unit project and then backed a companion $5.6 million 314-unit co-op.
- In Connecticut, the Greater New Haven Labor Council sponsored a 101-unit project.
- In Nashville, Tenn., Communications Workers Local 3808 backed a 76-unit co-op after an earlier project of 178 units.

These union-sponsored projects are helping fill in the critical gaps in urban America's housing needs, Ostroff writes.

But greater participation must come from the federal government, he urges in the Federationist article, pointing out that while Co-op City alone will cost $300 million, Congress allocated only $625 million for the model cities program for the entire nation last year.

Strong Curb Sought On Credit Reports

lion personal dossiers, collected largely in behalf of insurance companies, with intimate details on personal characteristics, sex and drinking habits, manner of living, condition of household, marital history and numerous other matters."

He termed it "incredible" that credit reporting agencies "are responsible to no one but themselves for the information or misinformation in their files."

Biemiller said the American public is "only now waking up to the truly frightening dimensions of private reporting systems offering no reliable safeguards to the individuals reported on, despite ruinous potential to the individual's ability to obtain credit, to qualify for insurance, or to get a job."

He charged that credit bureaus show "callous indifference to the fate of maligned individuals" and are motivated primarily by cost considerations.

Thus "it is relatively inexpensive to hunt up notices of law suits from court records . . . but more expensive to search out the disposition of such suits. The recording of neighborhood gossip is cheaper than actually verifying it. . . . A certain cost is involved in removing obsolete and irrelevant material from the files, no matter how unfairly prejudicial to the individual involved."

Biemiller stressed that reform cannot be expected from adoption of voluntary industry codes "but must be assured through legislation, with penalties for violation and with the creation of legal rights for the individual with respect to the contents and use of the records."

In her opening testimony before the subcommittee, Mrs. Knauer emphasized that credit is crucial for the poor.

She urged that the bill be strengthened by barring credit agencies from listing transactions more than seven years old and by lifting the limit on the amount of punitive damages courts may set under the legislation.

Mrs. Knauer made her first official appearance on Capitol Hill to testify for the bill.

When asked if she were speaking for herself or the White House, she replied that the proposed legislation "would be consistent with the policy of the Nixon Administration."

Another witness before the subcommittee was Columbia University Prof. Alan F. Westin, author of a book on invasions of privacy.

He told of a salesman who was turned down for job after job over a six-year period. The cause, he finally learned, was the unconfirmed gossip of a hostile neighbor and a typographical error in a report on him prepared by an information-gathering firm.

Chairman Paul Rand Dixon of the Federal Trade Commission said the Proxmire bill was needed "as the lone barrier" to creation of a vast computerized network of personal information about nearly every American.

He said there is ample evidence "that abuses do exist in the credit investigating and reporting field that can readily be corrected by adoption of the basic safeguards in the bill."

- Less restrictive eligibility requirements, with federal standards, "so that a broader spectrum of the poor will be eligible" for the food stamps.
- Free food stamps for the lowest income groups, including households with monthly incomes of $60 or less.
- Authority for the federal government to administer food stamp programs if local agencies are unwilling to cooperate or to finance the administrative costs if local funds are not available.
- Simpler procedures with less red tape in certifying eligible families and issuing the food stamps.
- Permission for families to pay for food stamps on an installment plan or just pay part of the monthly allotment "to facilitate purchasing by families whose paydays do not coincide with stamp issuance periods."

Rothman acknowledged the importance of providing education in nutrition to poor families so that the goal of a healthful diet can be achieved.

But he suggested that this might best be done by hiring and training persons from the poverty group who would be better able to work with food stamp recipients than professional home economists who "have been notably unsuccessful in reaching the poor."

A major expansion and reform of the food stamp program was urged also in testimony by the Meat Cutters.

The union's legislative representative, Arnold Mayer, said the campaign to end hunger and malnutrition "should have top priority." Hunger in the world's richest nation "is incredible and shameful," he stressed.

A group of prominent southerners urged that food stamps be given free to those who cannot afford to buy them. Brooks Hays, former congressman who heads the Southern Committee on Political Ethics, said the food stamp program should be administered by a committee of citizens in any county where elected public officials will not permit the program to operate.

Harris Named to Panel To Appraise FTC Work

Thomas E. Harris, AFL-CIO associate general counsel, has been named to a 16-member commission to appraise the work of the Federal Trade Commission in the fields of consumer protection and enforcement of laws.

Other members of the commission, appointed by Pres. William T. Gossett of the American Bar Association, are attorneys, economists and educators familiar with the operations of FTC in the two areas.

The study is being undertaken by ABA at the request of Pres. Nixon.

Yorty Scores Upset Victory In Los Angeles

Los Angeles—Mayor Sam Yorty, who made the race issue a key campaign point, upset the polls and pulled out a third term as he defeated Negro City Councilman Thomas Bradley in a record outpouring of 850,000 votes.

Unofficial results gave Yorty, a political maverick, 450,000 votes (53 percent) to Bradley's 400,000 (47 percent).

Bradley, running with broad based support from labor, business and civil rights sectors, was top vote-getter in a four-way primary election Apr. 1. Yorty was second, 16 percentage points behind.

Yorty immediately set the pace for his campaign by bitterly charging Bradley with making a special appeal to black voters, who made up about 17 percent of the electorate.

But the political polls had indicated Bradley would win by anywhere from 1 to 3 percentage points.

Edmond G. Brown, Jr., son of the former California governor, proved his name was still politically potent when he emerged as high man in a race for seven seats on the Junior College Board of Trustees. But conservatives, campaigning on recent school disturbances, captured two of three contests for the city school board.

Cement Union Reaches Pact With 6 Firms

Chicago—The Cement, Lime & Gypsum Workers announced a contract settlement with six Far West cement firms providing wage increases averaging 66.7 cents an hour plus 16.5 cents in fringe benefits for Arizona and southern California members.

The two-year agreement was reached after a marathon negotiating session which headed off a strike deadline at plants of the American Cement Co., Kaiser Cement & Gypsum Corp., California Portland Cement Co., Southwestern Portland Cement Co., Monolith Portland Cement Co., and Pacific Western Industries.

The pact calls for wage increases ranging from 32 to 40.4 cents an hour effective May 1 and 21 to 29.4 cents next May 1.

Insurance improvements including a new dental care plan will cost the companies an estimated 6 cents an hour.

Pension benefits will be increased to $6.50 for each year of service effective next Jan. 1; disability pension benefits to $7.50 but not less than $150 a month; a $75 floor on a widow's pension to age 62, and a pension on layoff or shutdown for workers whose age and service total 75 years.

The pension improvements will be applied Jan. 1 to all employes who retired on or after May 1, 1969.

Improvements were made in the supplemental unemployment benefit clause, and in other non-economic provisions, Pres. Felix C. Jones said.

Mediation Service Fills Chicago Post

The National Mediation Service named M. Clair Willmeth as Chicago regional director and Charles L. Bowen as assistant director. Willmeth succeeds C. K. Call, retired, in an area including Illinois, Indiana, Wisconsin, Minnesota, North and South Dakota and Michigan's upper peninsula.

New Jobs Bill Picks Up Wide Support in House

person to qualify for employment consistent with his highest potential and capability."

It declares that "the guarantee of meaningful employment opportunities for all Americans requires public investment to the extent the private sector is unable to provide such opportunities."

O'Hara said he foresees a first-year target of 200,000 jobs in the public and non-profit sectors, with the future extent of the program depending on the ability of private industry to provide jobs for those looking for work.

The public sector jobs wouldn't be make-work, he stressed. He cited surveys showing urgent needs of cities, states and rural areas for expanded facilities and services.

Public service jobs would be provided through contracts with government and non-profit agencies, with safeguards to assure that persons hired will be paid prevailing wages, will receive the same benefits as other workers, and will not be used to displace present employes.

Similar safeguards would be written into private industry training and upgrading programs.

A small-scale public sector job program is reportedly included in an Administration manpower bill drafted in the Labor Dept., but still awaiting final White House clearance before being sent to Congress.

The 105 initial sponsors of the O'Hara bill included 19 of the 20 Democratic members of the House Education & Labor Committee—all but Rep. Edith Green (D-Ore.). Nearly all of the sponsors are members of the liberal Democratic Study Group of the House.

O'Hara said the government has already had sufficient experience with its assortment of manpower programs to demonstrate the practicality of the approach.

"This bill takes the wraps off," he said, "and lets us really move toward the optimum use of our most valuable natural resources—the hands, muscle and brains of the American people."

To 'Get Message Across':

'Tax Justice' Drive Rallies All Workers

gains, the oil depletion allowance, and income from tax-free bonds.

Meany told the Laundry Workers' delegates that the AFL-CIO is not asking Congress to "do something—do anything" in reforming the tax system, but has presented a comprehensive tax reform program "in line with justice, equity and fairness."

The program, outlined to hearings in Congress, would plug loopholes that are costing the federal treasury up to $15 billion a year in lost revenue, Meany said.

And, he added, the program shows how "some $7 billion of these savings can be used for long-overdue relief for that vast majority of American taxpayers who are in the low, moderate and middle-income brackets."

Meany singled out the need for ending a "special break" given to capital gains income—the profits from long-term investment—as one of the important reforms needed.

He reiterated the AFL-CIO's opposition to extending the income tax surcharge, as recommended by the Nixon Administration, until it is tied to "immediate, substantial and equitable" tax reform.

The surtax, he pointed out, can't affect millionaires who escape taxes since it is a percentage added to the regular tax. "Without tax reforms," he said, "the surtax only adds to the already too-heavy tax burden of workers."

"In a real sense, victory in the fight for tax justice is up to you and workers everywhere," he told the convention's delegates.

"You and they can do the job," Meany concluded, "by seeing to it that your congressman and senators know how you feel. Write them letters, call them on the phone, see them while you are here in Washington."

The Ways & Means Committee's tentative package of reforms contained these major proposals as outlined by Mills:

Foundations — Prohibitions on self-dealing (borrowing) between a founder and his foundation. A requirement that foundations distribute all of their income within a year after earned, or face a 15 percent tax; limits on voting stock a foundation may hold in a company; a 5 percent tax on net investment income; bans on political activities and direct grants to individuals; disclosure of operations to the Treasury Dept.

Other tax exempt organizations —Unrelated business income of churches, social welfare clubs, civic leagues, and fraternal organizations would be taxed. In the case of churches, they would be allowed to dispose of unrelated businesses over a period of five years.

Charitable deductions — Repeal over a 5-year period of provisions allowing some people unlimited charitable deductions—mostly used by the wealthy to escape paying taxes. For most other people, the maximum allowable deduction for charitable contributions would be boosted from 30 to 50 percent of income.

Farm losses — Prohibitions against wealthy persons operating farms at a "paper loss" through accounting gimmicks that have reduced their taxable non-farm income to zero in some cases.

Corporate mergers — Disallowance in some cases of interest deducted in connection with bond issues used to purchase other unrelated businesses—the conglomerate mergers. Tax treatment also would be tightened on other financing procedures used in mergers.

Multiple corporations—Elimination of the use of multiple surtax exemptions over five years. These permit a corporation to divide up into numerous branches so as to pay the lower tax rate of 28 percent on the first $25,000 of income for each of its divisions instead of the regular 48 percent rate on the business as a whole.

The committee also has agreed to liberalize the tax deductions allowed for moving from one job to another by permitting deductions for house-hunting trips, temporary living quarters, and expenses related to selling one home and buying another.

Mills emphasized that all reforms agreed to by the committee are tentative decisions and subject to review once statutory language is adopted. He said the committee "will continue to work until it has covered all the items" of tax reform on which it held hearings in April.

He made no mention of when the committee will consider the proposal to extend the income tax surcharge or a measure, backed by labor, calling for repeal of the 7 percent tax credit on investment given to businesses.

DEMAND FOR TAX REFORM pours in from all parts of the country to the House Ways & Means Committee on Capitol Hill. This is just a portion of the 1,100 pieces of mail that has been arriving daily. Virginia Butler, committee staffer, delivers a load.

THE AFL-CIO's Charleston Hospital Strike Fund is launched as Federation Pres. George Meany hands a $25,000 check to Sec.-Treas. Alvin E. Heaps of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union. The federation's Executive Council asked all union members and organizations to back the South Carolina hospital workers in their fight for union recognition and a living wage. At left is AFL-CIO Dir. of Organization William L. Kircher.

Finch Urged To Adopt New Welfare Rule

The AFL-CIO has strongly urged Sec. Robert H. Finch of the Health, Education & Welfare Dept. to put into effect a public welfare reform aimed at bringing greater efficiency, economy and dignity to programs to aid the needy.

The change, advanced by former HEW Sec. Wilbur J. Cohen last year, would require states to rely on first-hand information obtained from applicants in determining if they are eligible for public aid.

There would be controls to guard against abuse. The intent is to end complex home investigations that have been criticized as "needless snooping" and often degrading to the needy. The proposal is to go into effect July 1 if approved by Finch. He has said he is studying it, and conservatives in Congress have been pressuring him to reject it.

In a letter to Finch, AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman emphasized that the new declaration method would be "simplified, less costly and more humane" than home investigations. Critics of the plan, he added, "have produced no evidence to lend credibility to their opposition."

Seidman enclosed a copy of a letter AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany sent to Cohen supporting the declaration plan when it was first proposed. Meany called it a move "toward making more humane a system which has in many ways been geared to punishing the disadvantaged."

Plumbers Report Executive Shifts

Three top executive changes in the organization of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters have been announced by Pres. Peter T. Schoemann following action by the union's executive board.

John J. McCartin, assistant president, is retiring.

He will be succeeded by Martin J. Ward, at present secretary-treasurer. Son of a longtime member of the union, Ward is a native of Chicago. When he became assistant secretary-treasurer in 1958 at the age of 39, he was one of the youngest men ever to hold executive office in the union.

Taking Ward's place as secretary-treasurer is William T. Dodd, now executive vice president. A member since 1920, Dodd served many years in New York City as a local president and business manager.

Job Freeze Costs U.S. $500 Million in Taxes

A job freeze ordered by Congress last year may have saved the Treasury Dept. a few million dollars in payroll costs. But it cost the government more than $500 million in lost revenue.

That's one of the reasons why appropriations bills now moving through the House all carry provisions exempting the federal agencies being financed from the rigid restrictions on filling job vacancies.

The law enacted last year required federal agencies to leave one out of four job vacancies unfilled until total government employment dropped to the level of June 30, 1966.

Even before it went into effect, a few essential agencies were exempted. But problems arose almost immediately.

The House Appropriations Committee, usually the stronghold of conservative, budget-slashing sentiment, documented the failure of the job ceiling in a report on the Treasury Dept. money bill.

It said the department had to let 4,900 job vacancies go unfilled because of the law. While this resulted in a supposed $23 million savings, "in many instances the full amount of the savings were offset by increased overtime costs in order to perform essential activities."

It quoted Treasury Sec. David M. Kennedy as testifying that more than half-a-billion dollars in taxes went uncollected because of a shortage of people to process tax returns and collect money due.

"Probably the most serious effect," the committee said, "is the undermining of public confidence in the effectiveness and impartiality of revenue and tax law enforcement when adequate enforcement personnel are not available."

A few days later, the Agriculture Dept. appropriations bill also carried an exemption from the job ceiling. The House was told that the limitation on filling vacancies would have made it impossible to carry out adequate meat and poultry inspection, food stamp and child nutrition programs.

The Appropriations Committee actions, if accepted by the Senate, would gradually lift the job freeze for a one-year period as the money bills move through Congress. Meanwhile an Administration request for a repeal of the job freeze law is being considered by the House Ways & Means Committee.

But until the ceiling is lifted, federal agencies will have even tighter hiring limits imposed, the Budget Bureau announced.

In order to staff the Administration's "anti-crime" program without running afoul of the overall ceiling on filling job vacancies, the Budget Bureau is requiring most government departments to leave a larger percentage of vacancies unfilled so that additional employes can be hired by the Justice Dept. Its new restrictions are effective July 1. However, the order will not affect agencies exempted by Congress.

Shultz Names Educator As New Deputy

George H. Hildebrand, an educator and labor relations expert, has been named by Labor Sec. George P. Shultz as deputy under secretary of labor for international affairs, a post newly authorized by Pres. Nixon.

Hildebrand has been a professor of economics and industrial-labor relations at Cornell University since 1960. Prior to that he was a professor of economics at the University of California, Los Angeles, and director of UCLA's Institute of Industrial Relations.

A labor arbitrator since 1951, Hildebrand also has served as a Labor Dept. consultant and on a committee to guide the department's study of the basic steel industry in 1959 and 1960.

During World War II, he was principal economist on the War Labor Board and a technical adviser on the President's Cost of Living Commission. He has written a number of books and articles on economics and industrial developments.

ILO Elects Worker to Head Conference

AFL-CIO News

Vol. XIV — Issued weekly at 815 Sixteenth St., N. W. Washington, D. C. 20006 $2 a year — Second Class Postage Paid at Washington, D. C. — Saturday, June 7, 1969 — No. 23

Choice Seen Reaffirming Principles

Geneva — The International Labor Organization rededicated itself to the workers' cause by breaking new ground with the unanimous election of a distinguished worker delegate instead of a government representative as president of its 50 anniversary conference.

U.S. Worker Delegate Rudolph Faupl, in nominating Jean Moeri, the Swiss worker delegate, told the more than 1,300 persons in the three-tiered Palace of Nations assembly hall that the election of a trade unionist would reaffirm ILO's "tripartite" structure that assures "participation of governments, workers and employers on an equal basis."

Faupl, a Machinists' international representative, recalled that this fundamental principle was established by a commission presided over by Samuel Gompers, first president of the AFL, that drafted the ILO constitution at the close of World War I.

The election of Moeri, who has been chairman of the worker delegates since 1960, would "reaffirm great principles of human freedom and social justice" for which the ILO stands, the American labor representative said in addressing the conference's opening session.

The Asian governments paved the way for the election by acclamation of Moeri, secretary of the Swiss Trade Union Federation, when they agreed to postpone for a year the presidency one of them would have received under the unofficial rotation system.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany headed a high-level group of federation officials who are serving as technical advisers to Faupl.

Pope Paul VI will fly to Geneva on June 10 to address the worker, government and employer delegations to the 121-nation organization that first met in Washington in 1919.

In his major report to the conference, Director Gen. David A. Morse recalled that the ILO, now a United Nations specialized agency, was one of the very few institutions created by the World War I peace settlement to have survived the 50 "turbulent" years that followed.

An under secretary of labor during the Truman Administration, Morse stressed that the ILO's "ultimate aim" had always remained the "furtherance within the member states of labor policies that make for social progress."

To help promote this goal, Morse proposed that the general

Labor Renews Campaign For Job Safety Standards

SHOW GIRLS AND ENTERTAINERS demonstrate outside Las Vegas casinos 24 hours before a strike deadline in the Nevada resort city. The Variety Artists called the strike after managements reneged on a contract agreement reached Mar. 21. IUD Parley Stresses Vital Federal Role

By Duane Emme

There will be no reduction in the mounting toll of on-the-job deaths, injuries and illnesses until Congress enacts strong federal standards for safety and health in the workplace.

That was the consensus of labor leaders, health and safety experts and government officials addressing a conference sponsored by the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. in Washington.

The nearly 250 representatives of 45 unions attending the two-day meeting also were told that Congress will act only if union members across the nation exert a "maximum effort" on behalf of the legislation.

Pres. Johnson called for federal standards last year in his proposed Occupational Safety & Health Act. But the legislation died after the National Association of Manufacturers and other employer groups mounted a nationwide campaign against it.

Sen. Ralph Yarborough (D-Tex.) and other lawmakers have introduced legislation in this Congress similar to Johnson's measure. The Nixon Administration has indicated it will also submit an occupational health and safety bill.

Major speakers at the conference included IUD Pres. I. W. Abel; Yarborough; Esther Peterson, former assistant secretary of labor and now legislative representative for the Clothing Workers, and Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.).

Opening the conference, Abel said "I know of no more important issue demanding our attention and concern" than securing passage of occupational health and safety legislation.

He pointed out that 100 workers "will lose their lives in work accidents while we are meeting here."

Nixon Forms Key Council On Pollution

Pres. Nixon has set up a new Cabinet-level Environmental Quality Council as the "focal point" of the Administration's efforts to combat pollution and protect national resources.

While the President and Vice President will be the titular chairman and vice chairman of the council, the key man in the new advisory body will be Nixon's science adviser, Dr. Lee A. DuBridge, who will serve as executive secretary.

The Secretaries of Agriculture, Commerce, Health, Education & Welfare, Housing & Urban Development and Transportation will be the other members.

Nixon described the council as comparable in its field to two other White House policy advisory groups—the National Security Council and the Urban Affairs Council.

In announcing its establishment, Nixon said "the quality of the American environment is threatened as it has not been threatened before in our history."

Covers Federal Projects:

Construction Safety Bill Passed by House

A construction safety bill, an important part of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.'s legislative program, has passed the House of Representatives by an overwhelming voice vote.

The measure, which BCTD Pres. C. J. Haggerty describes as a "vital need," provides for and enforces safety standards for workers on federal construction projects.

The House also passed by a 350-0 vote and sent to the Senate a three-year extension of the Hill-Burton Act under which the government helps finance construction and modernization of hospitals and nursing homes.

On the Senate side, the Judiciary Committee unanimously approved Pres. Nixon's nomination of Appeals Judge Warren E. Burger to become Chief Justice of the United States.

There is no precise total of the number of workers covered by the safety bill, but the BCTD points out that "a large proportion" of the 4 million employes in the construction industry work on federal projects from time to time.

In testimony before Congress, Haggerty had noted that "well-conceived and well-enforced safety standards are about as rare on federal jobs as they are in the rest of the construction industry."

Furthermore, he said, standards are almost non-existent on federally financed and federally assisted

Long Island Rail Pact Settles UTU Dispute

New York—Union trainmen on the Long Island Rail Road extended a strike deadline and reached agreement on a new contract providing 10 percent benefit gains, job protection and a six-month pension study.

One factor in the settlement, a union spokesman said, was the trainmen's desire to keep the trains going for the sake not only of employes but also of the Long Island's 170,000 commuter passengers, long beset by equipment breakdowns and "erratic" Transportation Authority management.

Members of four locals of the United Transportation Union representing 1,600 train service employes, bartenders and patrolmen, ratified the settlement, reached with the aid of the National Mediation Board and a three-member federal emergency board.

The pact provides an 8 percent wage increase and a $5 contribution to the union health and welfare fund, both retroactive to Oct. 1, 1968; an additional 2 percent per hour for welfare effective Jan. 1, 1970, and a sick leave provision commencing on the latter date.

Senate Urged to Back Lid on Farm Subsidies

The AFL-CIO urged the Senate to join with the House in putting a $20,000 ceiling on the amount of farm subsidy that can be paid to any individual or corporation.

The House wrote the subsidy ceiling into the Agriculture Dept. appropriations bill in an effort to cut off huge windfalls to a few big corporate farms without hurting the family farmer.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller termed the $20,000 limit "reasonable" and in line with the position taken by the federation's Executive Council earlier this year.

In a letter to Sen. Spessard L. Holland (D-Fla.), chairman of the Appropriations subcommittee now considering the bill, Biemiller urged that the House-passed ceiling be retained.

"Many Americans find it difficult to justify the huge subsidy payments to large producers under the best of economic circumstances," he wrote. "They see no justification for them at a time such as this when pressing domestic needs of the American people are going unmet because of a tight budgetary situation."

GLASS BOTTLE BLOWERS' delegates listen to an address by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler during a session of the 64th convention of the GBBA in Bal Harbour, Fla. The union traces its history back to 1842 when a number of locals were organized.

For Economic, Social Gains:

Glass Union Charts Expanded Program

By David L. Perlman

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Delegates to the Glass Bottle Blowers convention here prepared to fight at the bargaining table, the ballot box and in the halls of Congress for a broad-ranging program of economic and social justice.

GBBA Pres. Lee W. Minton warned in his keynote address that the bargaining table has become an arena of sharper conflict because of the new breed of management brought in by the huge conglomerates that are changing the face of American industry.

Gone from the scene, he said, are many of the company executives who had learned over the years to accept and work with the union. In their place, too often, are corporation officials indifferent to workers as people and interested only in squeezing out greater profits.

In the glass container industry alone, Minton said, 30 companies have already shrunk to 14 and the consolidation trend is not yet over.

The GBBA, which traces its origins to the mid-19th Century, went into its 64th Quadrennial convention with a record 72,500 members.

Its 916 delegates also set a record. All but three GBBA locals were represented, and the three that did not send delegates, in accordance with a unique provision of the union's constitution, were each fined $100.

The officers' report to the convention expressed hope that talks among unions affiliated with the AFL-CIO Stone, Glass & Clay Coordinating Committee would lead to an eventual merger.

Greetings Exchanged

Minton read to the delegates an exchange of fraternal greetings with the Flint Glass Workers, whose convention in Chicago opened on the same day as the GBBA convention.

A letter from Flint Glass Workers Pres. George M. Parker stressed that "our two organizations have been working closer together in recent years than ever before" and predicted that still more progress will be made. "Without a doubt," Parker wrote, this cooperation has resulted in "better contracts than ever before" for both unions.

Minton, in reply, expressed the hope that the cooperation will lead to full merger.

"It is a pity," he suggested, "that we are wasting our time, money, effort and talents meeting at the same time, in a different place, thousands of miles away when our objectives are similar and mutual."

In its first major policy resolution, the convention declared that "American wage-earners are thoroughly weary of carrying more than their fair share of the nation's tax load."

Citing the AFL-CIO's tax justice program, the delegates declared, "reforms are obviously needed, and they are needed now."

'Get Mad'

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, who spoke to the convention on the opening day, urged union members to "get mad" about tax injustice and insist that "the rich stop riding on the backs of the poor."

He warned that the drive for tax justice is being bitterly opposed by "some of the richest, most powerful interests in this country."

Schnitzler and COPE Dir. Alexander Barkan both stressed the role of bigotry in the defeat of a labor-endorsed Negro candidate, Thomas Bradley, for mayor of Los Angeles.

"Somehow, someway," Barkan urged, "you have to find the way to make sure that your members know friend from foe, real issues from phony issues, and you have to make them understand."

The point was stressed also by Margaret Thornburgh of COPE's Women's Activities Division, a member of the GBBA. Bradley, she pointed out, "wasn't endorsed by the labor movement because he was black; he was endorsed because he was superior to the other candidate." She warned that "until we educate our membership and their families, we will meet more defeats."

Other Resolutions

Other policy resolutions adopted early in the convention included calls for:

- A congressional investigation of health insurance in view of "outrageously high" increases in premium rates and indications of poor administrative practices.
- Increased social security benefits as an "imperative" need and protection of the Medicare program against abuses and fee-gouging.
- Peace in Viet Nam based on "justice" and reflecting "this nation's dedication to the principles of freedom."

A report to the convention stressed the union's active anti-litter campaign as crucial in the effort to head off threatened state legislation which would ban the use of non-returnable bottles—and throw thousands of GBBA members out of work.

The report noted that some 100 locals already have undertaken "vigorous community action programs on litter, reaching into the schools, civic organizations and other community bodies."

It said the GBBA has taken the lead in seeking to convene a tripartite conference representing industry, labor and government to seek the best solutions to the problem of solid waste disposal.

Election of officers, constitutional changes and committee reports were still on the delegates' agenda midway through the six-day convention.

Arkansas Labor Keys Dues Hike to Progress

Hot Springs, Ark.—Delegates to the Arkansas AFL-CIO's seventh convention approved an increase in per capita payments to continue the state body's "Program of Progress" and expand its legislative goals for the coming two years.

Approving the officers' recommendation to continue the seven-year-old program marked by "unprecedented progress in the face of great difficulties," the 300 delegates voted new two-year terms for Pres. J. Bill Becker and Sec.-Treas. E. J. Jacobs, and raised the monthly affiliation tax from 22.5 cents per member to 23 cents.

Since the Program of Progress was adopted, the state federation increased its dues-paying membership by 11,000 and achieved many of its objectives in the fields of legislation, political education, public relations and union cooperation, the officers said.

They listed these gains:

- An increase in unemployment insurance, voted by the legislature in 1963, when Arkansas became the first southern state to base maximum unemployment benefits on a percentage of the state's average wage.
- Passage in 1964 of a permanent voter registration law, initiated by labor and other groups and approved in a statewide referendum.
- Enactment of the first minimum wage law in state history.
- Passage in 1968 of a workmen's compensation law the federation called "the best in the South."

The federation also mounted a statewide campaign against an unfavorable unemployment insurance bill which the governor vetoed, won enactment of a state prevailing-wage law, secured a union dues deduction procedure for state employes, won exemption of the first $25 of wages from garnishment, and other goals including an increase in teachers' salaries.

Despite these gains, the officers reported, "many problems remain in the antiunion atmosphere" of a state that still is "saddled with a compulsory open shop law and records the second lowest per capita income" in the nation.

Convention speakers included Gov. Winthrop Rockefeller (R), Pres. Thomas F. Murphy of the Bricklayers, Sec.-Treas. William Botkin of the Woodworkers, Vice Pres. George T. Watkins of the Machinists, Vice Pres. Wayne E. Glenn of the Pulp, Sulphite & Paper Mill Workers, Rep. David Pryor (D-Ark.), Richard Shoemaker of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, and Al Kehrer of the federation's Dept. of Civil Rights.

Rockefeller urged an increase in the state sales tax, but the delegates voted to oppose it unless its "unfair effect" on the poor is removed. Murphy urged all unions to affiliate with state federations for their full membership—an objective he has asked all Bricklayer unions to achieve.

Becker announced the affiliation of the Chemical Workers for all its 1,800 Arkansas members.

Two Join Staff Of Research Dept.

Frank F. Pollara has been appointed assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research and Richard W. Humphreys has joined the department as an industrial engineer.

Pollara comes to the federation after 19 years with the Steelworkers where he was an international representative in charge of coordinated bargaining. He also served the USWA as assistant research director at one time and held posts on various human relations committees for the union.

Earlier, Pollara had been with the National Labor Relations Board, the Veterans Administration and the U.S. Employment Service.

Humphreys comes to the AFL-CIO from the University of West Virginia. He had been director of the university's Institute of Labor Studies and also headed its Manpower & Labor Studies Division.

From 1959 through 1967, Humphreys had been with the Allied Industrial Workers both as education and research director and as administrative assistant to the president. He also was with the State, County & Municipal Employes before serving on the University of Wisconsin staff, 1952-58.

School Official Named Deputy Mediation Chief

Dr. Lowell M. McGinnis, assistant superintendent of the Los Angeles public schools for employer-employe relations, has been named deputy director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service. McGinnis, 55, has been the school system's chief negotiator with employe unions, FM&CS Dir. J. Curtis Counts said.

3 Unions Agree To Terms With Shipping Firms

New York — Three unions reached tentative settlement with ship operators here on new three-year agreements providing contract gains ultimately for an estimated 40,000 crewmen on 386 ships managed by 36 companies.

The agreements, subject to a membership vote, were initialed at National Maritime Union offices here by NMU Pres. Joseph Curran representing unlicensed seamen; Pres. M. Calhoun of the Marine Engineers Beneficial Association, representing licensed engineer officers, and William R. Steinberg of the American Radio Association, for ship radio officers.

Edward Silver, chief negotiator for the Maritime Service Committee, signed for the employer group. He is counsel also for the Tanker Service Committee, which will continue talks with the same unions for a companion agreement.

Still unsettled, Silver said, is a contract with the Masters, Mates & Pilots for licensed ship's officers.

The unions put the value of the wage and benefit package at 33 percent above current terms.

In a joint statement the union heads said the settlements provide "fair and necessary improvements for our members in wages, working conditions and security benefits." The terms reflect increases in living costs and recent contract settlements, they pointed out.

APPEAL FOR IMPORT CONTROLS on apparel coming into the United States from Japan is presented to White House deputy counsel Peter Flannigan by representatives of Clothing Workers from Baltimore. Delivering the petition signed by about 100,000 union members and friends are Mrs. Bessie McCullough, Mrs. Helen Getz and Mrs. Rita Petti. Copies of the petition, urging the American and Japanese governments to agree on controls for apparel imports, also were given to the Japanese Embassy.

50th Anniversary Conference:

Worker Delegate Heads ILO Parley

discussion during the three-week session be centered on the ILO's projected World Employment Program.

The program's objective, Morse said in his 151-page report, is to make "productive and renumerative work available for ever larger numbers of people."

"We can make no headway in raising incomes and standards of living for the majority of the world's working population unless we can create the conditions in which incomes can be earned and improved through more productive work," Morse declared.

At a two-day meeting that preceded the conference, worker delegates to the ILO's 48-member Governing Body successfully repulsed government and employer efforts to limit the organization's key work of establishing ever-higher international standards for working and living conditions.

Faupl declared it was "particularly shocking" that the proposal to reduce the number of such standards to be considered at the 1971 ILO conference should have been made by the U. S. government. It was offered, Faupl noted, at the very time that this government was accelerating its own standard-setting activities at home.

The spokesman for U.S. labor warned the less developed countries that it was a mistake to sacrifice the ILO's work on the minimum conditions to be guaranteed workers by ILO member states in favor of its technical assistance programs.

The two activities should go "hand in hand," Faupl said. The worker delegates, he continued, could not agree that technical aid should be at the "expense of standard setting."

Speaking in the name of the workers' group, Moeri called "with all our force" for the widespread dissemination in Spain of a report underscoring the gambling on trade union rights in that country.

The report was prepared by an independent three-man committee appointed by the ILO after an on-the-spot investigation. It urged the freeing from Spanish jails of persons condemned for having engaged in what would be "regarded in other countries as legitimate trade union activities."

The committee found that Spanish trade unionists who refused to bow to the government's puppet labor organization were subjected to "ill treatment" by the police even if it had not been possible to establish the full extent of police brutality.

The workers also obtained the assurance that next year's ILO conference would be called on to examine the problem of how to guarantee the right of delegates to speak out freely without fear of government reprisals on their return to their countries.

The issue has arisen because the Moroccan worker delegate to last year's session, Abdelkader Awab, was arrested and jailed for one year on his return home for having criticized governmental policies when addressing the conference.

Faupl told the council that action was needed because all too often delegates who spoke out at the conference did "not know on returning home whether they would be greeted by their families or the secret police."

While the executive body was finishing its work, the AFL-CIO delegation to the anniversary conference was assembling and mapping its strategy for dealing with the session's nine-point agenda.

In addition to Meany and Faupl, its members are Pres. Jacob Potofsky of the Clothing Workers; Pres. Roy Siemiller of the Machinists; Pres. Peter Fosco of the Laborers; Executive Vice Pres. Richard H. Nolan of the Operating Engineers; Lane Kirkland, executive assistant to Meany; Edward Hickey, Jr., attorney for a number of transportation unions; Bert Seidman, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, and Joseph M. Pomarlen of the Ladies' Garment Workers.

Edwin Kaiser Dies, Stove Union Officer

St. Louis—Edwin W. Kaiser, secretary-treasurer emeritus of the Stove Workers, died at 82 of a heart attack and was buried after services in Salem Evangelical & Reformed Church.

Kaiser retired in 1963 and was succeeded by his son, Edwin, as union secretary-treasurer. Another son, Maj. Alexander Kaiser of the St. Louis Police Dept., also survives.

The retired official had been an active member of his union for 57 years. He served as a local union officer, as vice president and president of the international union, and as secretary-treasurer for 25 years.

ROSEMARY WOODS, the 1969 poster child for the National Cystic Fibrosis Research Foundation, makes friends with AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany during a visit to Washington. Rosemary, 7, is the youngest of 11 children and the only one in her family afflicted with cystic fibrosis, a respiratory disease. Her father, Joseph Woods, is sheriff of Cook County, Ill.

FIRST SESSION of the International Labor Conference was held at the Pan American Union building in Washington, D.C., October 1919. Despite pioneering efforts by the American labor movement in the formation of the International Labor Organization, the United States did not affiliate with the ILO until 1934.

Expectations of ILO Seen Fulfilled In 50 Years of Service to Workers

For the past 11 years, Rudolph Faupl has represented American workers at the International Labor Organization—unique among world organizations because it gives a direct voice to workers and employers as well as governments.

From this vantage point, the former Milwaukee machinist has written an appraisal of the ILO on its 50th anniversary. The article is featured in the June issue of the American Federationist, the AFL-CIO's magazine.

Faupl discusses the origins of the ILO—its conception in the aftermath of World War I by a committee headed by Samuel Gompers, first president of the American Federation of Labor.

Because the ILO was born at Versailles, along with the League of Nations, it was not until 1934 that the United States shed its isolationism sufficiently to affiliate. But in the 35 years since then, American labor's representatives have played an active constructive role. And the ILO, itself, was the only remnant of the League to be carried over intact into the United Nations.

Has it fulfilled Gompers' prediction that the ILO "will have the effect of bringing light into the lives of workers in the more backward countries?"

Faupl thinks it has.

The preamble to the ILO charter, he notes, states that "the failure of any nation to adopt humane conditions of labor is an obstacle in the way of other nations which desire to improve the conditions in their own countries."

There are two mechanisms by which the ILO has sought to carry out its mandate, Faupl notes.

One is through recommendations—in effect an international consensus of reasonable and desirable basic working conditions. These have no force of law, but they have been useful guides to nations approaching industrialization.

The more potent method is the adoption of conventions, or treaties, which bind the nations ratifying them to standards which have been developed and refined at ILO conferences.

Faupl expresses deep regret that the United States thus far has ratified only seven ILO conventions, all related to maritime industries.

The failure of the Senate to ratify major conventions on human rights, forced labor, freedom of association, right to organize, anti-discrimination and others is especially unfortunate, he says, because U.S. delegations were instrumental in getting them adopted.

There is another important part of the ILO activities, the article notes. In the past two decades, ILO technical assistance has been provided to developing countries throughout the world.

"Hundreds of ILO technicians have set up and conducted thousands of training programs in scores of countries," Faupl writes. "ILO people have studied manpower needs, devised and set up vocational training programs and implemented training methods. They have built schools, prepared instructional materials and even recruited trainees."

Likewise, through workers' education, the ILO "seeks to encourage the growth of free trade unionism as well as the growth of industry."

Faupl writes in the Federationist that he has had a change of mind about the affiliation of the Soviet Union with the ILO in 1954.

"Although I originally opposed Russia's entry into the ILO," he notes, "I have come to believe it was a net gain for the United States. . . . The ILO serves America's interest by providing us with an excellent showcase in which we can compare communism and democracy, side by side, to our own advantage."

By helping to raise living standards everywhere in the world, the ILO helps to maintain high standards in the United States, Faupl notes. He concludes:

"For 50 years the ILO has been engaged in a worldwide effort to improve the conditions and safeguard the freedoms of workers everywhere. As the only inter-governmental organization dedicated first and foremost to the welfare of workers, it deserves the wholeheated support of American labor."

Union and management agreed that there will be no job layoffs or rules changes during a six-month study of existing rules. The study was recommended Apr. 21 by the emergency board, which advised that any savings brought about by rules changes be divided among the trainmen.

The agreement provides that while joint committees make a rule and pension study starting July 1 and ending about Dec. 31, 1969, employes will retain the right to strike under Railway Labor Act procedures.

Management agreed that, for the duration of the contract, it will not attempt to collect a $100,000 civil contempt fine imposed on members for a two-day walkout called last November to protest management "foot-dragging."

The settlement also contains provisions for reopening the contract six months from now to negotiate further wage improvements.

Union Chairman Harold J. Pryor and Sec.-Treas. Charles J. Quinn said negotiations were prolonged by the road's financial difficulties. Eventually, they said, operating expenses must be provided either by the legislature or passengers and freight users.

Pryor said management has "been crying poverty ever since I came to work here 28 years ago."

During negotiations in the Barclay Hotel, a commuters' committee appeared carrying a "yard-long" sandwich to encourage the negotiators to settle without a strike.

The Long Island has been called the "world's largest commuter line."

Catholic Group Appoints Cosgrove

The United States Catholic Conference of bishops announced that John E. Cosgrove has been named director of the Dept. of Social Development of the conference effective immediately.

Cosgrove served as a staff member in the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education and recently as director of the Office of Regional Development Planning in the U.S. Dept. of Commerce. In his new post he will work with diocesan staffs in family life, poverty program coordination, rural and urban life and Spanish-speaking programs.

Clamping the Lid

THE HOUSE has taken a major step toward cutting off excessive government subsidy payments to large and profitable "agrobusinesses," by voting a $20,000 limit on any single payment.

The subsidy problem has been building up as farms become fewer and larger and move out of the sentimental concept of the family farm into the realm of a major large business enterprise.

The Congressional Record shows that there are 16,430 persons who now get more than $25,000 each in government farm subsidies—a total of $518 million annually.

Other figures show that under farm subsidy programs in 1967 a total of 8,778 producers in 15 cotton-growing counties of the South and Southwest—half of them in Texas and Mississippi—got payments of $20,000 or more each. This compares with similar payments to 1,174 producers in all other states and territories.

One of the largest recipients of government payments is Sen. James O. Eastland (D-Miss.), who last year received $117,000 in cotton subsidies. He is listed as one of 82 persons in Sunflower County, Miss., who receive more than a quarter of a million dollars annually from the government.

Paul Findley, the Illinois Republican congressman who has led the fight for four years to limit subsidy payments, makes the point that in many counties where farm subsidies for wealthy farmers are heaviest there are no programs to feed the hungry.

The government subsidies have taken various forms from price supports for specific crops to direct payments for leaving acreage idle. All told the complex government system of regulation and subsidization of farm crops adds up to an annual cost of more than $5 billion.

The AFL-CIO has made its position clear. A statement recently adopted by the federation's Executive Council declared that "while much is being done to enrich the prosperous few in commercial agriculture, far too little aid is reaching those most in need on and off the farm."

It asserted that "a reasonable ceiling should now be placed on the federal income maintenance benefits paid to any farm. . . . Excessive payments to large and profitable agrobusinesses . . . cannot be justified."

IN CONTRAST to the large subsidy payments is the situation of the farm worker, still deliberately deprived of the benefits of most protective welfare legislation other American workers have long enjoyed—including the coverage and protection of the National Labor Relations Act.

The fate of the subsidy limitation measure will be determined in the Senate where many senators from cotton-producing states are pledged to scrap the House action on payment ceilings—probably under the leadership of Sen. Eastland, the man who draws the $117,000.

There must be an end to outrageous sums of money being funneled into major business enterprises hiding under the protective coverage of the nation's rural and farm mystique. It's up to the Senate to see that some sense of equity and justice is restored to the farm programs.

A Word Edgewise:

America Can't Afford Luxury Of Serene Irish Foreign Policy

By John P. Roche

DUBLIN, IRELAND—There is a wonderful, remote quality about Irish politics. The Prime Minister, known in Gaelic as the "Taoiseach," has just received approval from Pres. de Valera for a dissolution of the "Dail Eireann," or parliament, and a general election is scheduled for June 18.

This has been in the wind for some time and a while back the big opposition party, "Fianna Gael," held its annual conference. For several days they banged away at Prime Minister Lynch's "Fianna Fail" administration: Mr. Cosgrave, their president, was according to the local press "breathing fire." The delegates were roaring defiance and girding themselves for what seemed like the battle of the century. It was, as they say hereabouts, "lovely, lovely."

But when an American, accustomed to worrying about Viet Nam, the Middle East, ABM's, urban riots, and the cost of welfare, looks at the issues, he wonders what all the shouting is about.

After going through the resolutions introduced into the "Fianna Gael" conference—most of them ferocious denunciations of the policy of the present government—I suddenly realized that there was no mention of Southeast Asia, the Israeli-Arab confrontation, or any major world problems. Only the Common Market and Biafra made the order-papers.

The relevant debate deserves quotation: "Sir Anthony Esmonde, spokesman for External Affairs, was dissatisfied with the Government's EEC (Common Market) policy . . . Fianna Fail (the Government) had done nothing but wrap the Union Jack around them and trail on the heels of Britain in foreign affairs."

On Biafra, which is an issue with strong appeal here because many Ibos have been converted and taught at Irish Catholic missions, Sir Anthony was more explicit: "He asserted the right of the heroic Biafran people to assert their right to self-government and said that Ireland should send a parliamentary delegation to Nigeria to settle that unhappy question." That disposed of that problem.

This is not said in any patronizing spirit. It must be a wonderful luxury to live in a country with no foreign policy and I confess that after the last eight years, it is a luxury I could put up with.

Imagine, for four days I found no reference to Viet Nam in any of the four leading Irish papers! The spot on page one, which usually has the bad news, was filled with ominous tidings, but from Ulster. And the arrival of New York Police Commissioner Howard Leary, Sen. Edward Kennedy's appeal for commutation of Sirhan's death sentence, and Apollo 10 were the big news items from America.

Once upon a time, the United States was like this. For most of the 19th century we had no foreign policy, living insulated from Europe by the British fleet. Who, except his descendants, knows the name of Millard Fillmore's Secretary of State? Or Grant's? Or Benjamin Harrison's?

DESPITE A LIFETIME spent in library stacks rummaging around in various aspects of American history, I cannot identify any of these statesmen. Being an American Secretary of State used to be a 10-to-4 job, with two hours out for lunch and a nap. Then, rather than conniving for world power in the grasping, imperialist fashion that some critics assert, we were trapped by power. We found ourselves willy-nilly in a position where everything we did, or didn't do, influenced the course of world events in an unfortunately decisive way.

It would be nice to regain that lost paradise where we could play the role of innocent bystanders. After the rigors of responsibility we have lived with these last 30 years, it is understandable that most Americans (as a recent Harris poll indicated) would like to take a vacation.

But there is no turning back the calendar; if they want that sort of rest, they should take a trip to Ireland. It simply cannot be done at home.

What has to be remembered is that a nation can only live without world problems when there is someone protecting the playground. The British did it for us a century ago; we are now doing it for Britain. (The Irish, who even managed to keep out of World War II, did not achieve that idyllic neutrality because Hitler was terrified of their fighting reputation.)

It would be grand to take a few years off from world responsibilities, but before we can try it, we have to find someone to protect our playground. At the moment, there are no volunteers in sight.

'Arbitrary, Ignorant, Cruel':

Black Separatism on Campus Repeats Segregationist Line

The following is excerpted from a letter by Kenneth B. Clark, widely known Negro sociologist, resigning from the Board of Trustees of Antioch College.

THE PROBLEM of Antioch's support of the Afro-American Institute and the controversy with the HEW as to whether Antioch's support of this racially organized and exclusionary facility on its campus did or did not violate Title VI of the Civil Rights Act is to me a serious matter involving racial justice and dignity, and the role of the college and university in helping to free the human mind and body of primitive passions. I have been, not only disturbed, but vigorously opposed to the college's decision to participate in any form of racial exclusion.

I opposed this for the same reasons that we fought together in the school segregation cases which led to the Brown decision. I continue to believe, that racial prejudice, discrimination and segregation are damaging to the human personality without regard to the racial rationalizations or excuses offered in support of such practices.

There is absolutely no evidence to support the contention that the inherent damage to human beings of primitive exclusion on the basis of race is any less damaging when demanded or enforced by the previous victims than when imposed by the dominant group.

There is absolutely no valid basis by which educational institutions can or should make any distinctions on the basis of race or color. Some argue that blacks and whites must be separated because they represent different cultures and that cultures, like oil and water, cannot mix. Segregationists have argued so for generations against integrated transportation, drinking fountains, integrated schools, and intermarriage—maintaining that mixture would lead to mongrelization of the races.

Such racial distinctions are arbitrary, dangerously ignorant, and cruel. They are destructive and inimical to all of the goals of serious education. In this regard I am in complete agreement with the editorial in the New York Times of Wednesday, May 7, 1969, which said among other things that HEW did "a serious disservice to the cause of racial integration by authorizing Antioch College to operate an all-Negro black studies institute." I am not, however, particularly surprised that practical and political men would find such justification consistent with their political needs to seek to accept a patently racist arrangement by subterfuge.

To exclude someone of one race—or to admit that it would be appropriate to do so—on the grounds that his background or experience are irrelevant, that they render him unable to achieve is precisely what white segregationists have been doing to blacks for centuries. Yet this seems to be the burden of rationalization at Antioch for a black separatist policy. Yet, it is whites who need a black studies program most of all.

The white liberal for his part who concedes black separatism so hastily and benevolently must look to his own reasons, not the least of them perhaps an exquisite relief. To encourage or endorse a separate black program not academically equivalent to the college curriculum generally, indeed to endorse any such program, is to reinforce the Negro's inability to compete with whites for the real power of the real world. It is no excuse to justify the deed by citing the demand.

The history of the civil rights movement, the pattern of evasion since the Brown decision 15 years ago prepared me for this HEW type of logic and evasion of the fundamental moral and legal implications of this problem. What I am not prepared to accept is continued association with an educational institution which is an accessory, if not an instigator of this type of game-playing with the lives of human beings and with the life and stability of the society.

I am personally not prepared to continue an association with Antioch College in which as a member of the board of trustees I am, and must be considered educationally responsible for and a participant in what is to me, a shoddy evasion of the moral and educational responsibility which a college must assume or frankly admit that it is indistinguishable from political areas of society.

I believe that above all under times of tension, stress and pressures to conform to the shouting demands of the populace, colleges must have the courage to stand firmly for the rule of reason and for those principles and values considered indispensable to serious education. I do not believe that Antioch, in acceding to the demands for a separate facility for its Negro students, has showed this type of courage.

COLLEGES AND UNIVERSITIES must be the custodians of the rational and intellectual approach to the study and eventual solution of difficult and complex human problems. To succumb to any form of dogmatism, to institutionalize the irrational is to fail in fulfilling this important obligation. I am convinced that Antioch has not only violated this sacred obligation by its approach to the Afro-American Studies Institute, and by permitting the existence of and financially supporting the racially exclusionary Unity house on its campus, Antioch has also tarnished its own glorious traditions of stubborn resistance to the fashionable. It was this history which made me profoundly proud to be identified with Antioch.

In permitting a group of students to inflict their dogmatism and ideology on other students and on the total college community; and in being silent while some students intimidate, threaten, and in some cases physically assault the Negro students who disagree with them, the administration at Antioch has not only defaulted in its responsibilities, but, I believe has made a mockery of its concern for the protection and development of human dignity without regard to cost.

Therefore, for all the above reasons and many more which are tied up in my being, I cannot continue the pretense of membership on the board of trustees at Antioch and, hereby, send you my resignation, to take effect immediately.

In Dispute With Gov. Moore:

West Virginia Strikers Strive To End Political Spoils System

WEST VIRGINIA'S striking road workers are determined to win recognition of their union as protection against a "vicious and insidious" spoils system that "impugns the dignity of man," the president of the West Virginia Labor Federation declared on Labor News Conference.

Miles C. Stanley charged that Gov. Arch Moore's refusal to even discuss union recognition, coupled with the lack of a collective bargaining law for state workers, leaves the West Virginia controversy "a game without rules."

The governor is "the one man who can resolve this situation," Stanley said, but he wants to retain the "spoils system . . . to perpetuate a political machine that will do his bidding—that will do the work on election day" and "perpetuate his party in power."

Stanley said the governor's summary firing of 3,400 West Virginia State Roads Commission workers striking for recognition of their union, the Laborers, included "everyone who was not working as of the moment," which meant that workers on sick leave or vacation also lost their jobs. He said the governor later offered to re-hire any workers who would sign "what is, in effect, a yellow dog contract."

THE SPOILS SYSTEM that the unions are trying to end not only disrupts the lives of workers, but is also costly for the state's taxpayers, Stanley observed. "There is not a business in this country that could remain competitive changing its entire work force every four years and training new workers," he asserted.

Noting "tremendously strong support from the (entire) labor movement" for the West Virginia strikers, Stanley said a nationwide boycott has been launched against the state's tourist industry.

IT MAY BE A LONG TIME between now and the 1972 nominating conventions of the major political parties but the Democratic Party is already hard at work on rules and procedures to perfect the democratic process.

The 1968 Democratic Convention took major strides in this direction and, now, there is a follow-through that could make political history this summer.

Even prior to the 1968 convention much work was done to assure that the nominating process is more responsive to the popular will.

Two committees of the convention—on rules and order of business and on credentials—set up a Commission on the Democratic Selection of Presidential Nominees under the leadership of then Gov. (now Senator) Harold Hughes of Iowa and Rep. Donald Fraser (Minn.).

Its report makes a number of recommendations. The commission observed:

"The key to selecting a presidential nominee who is genuinely the people's choice lies with the states. If delegations to the national convention are not chosen democratically even the most admirably structured convention will not be democratic."

"Conversely, if state delegations are democratically selected, efforts to 'rig' the convention will probably fail."

The commission's recommendations are now being seriously considered by the party but many of them were adopted by the 1968 Democratic Convention. The actions included these, that:

- Scrapped the unit rule whereby a majority of a delegation could cast a vote for the entire delegation—thus depriving the minority of their rights.
- Discarded the right of one or two state leaders to choose undemocratically and control entire delegations.
- Enforced the 1964 convention ruling that delegations which discriminate against any racial, ethnic or other group will not be seated.
- Approved a provision that any local, county or state convention which discriminates in choosing 1972 delegates will not be seated.

IN ADDITION, the convention directed the chairman of the Democratic National Committee to appoint special commissions to recommend further improvements in the delegate selection process to both the 1972 convention and the Democratic National Committee.

It was this latter directive that led to Sen. Fred Harris, the committee chairman, naming a Commission on Party Structure & Delegate Selection. Its chairman is Sen. George McGovern (D-N.D.) and among its 28 members is Steelworkers Pres. I. W. Abel.

The commission has held eight of 16 planned hearings throughout the country. At these hearings some 225 witnesses—housewives, trade unionists, Negro leaders, professional politicians, students and others—have given their views.

"We have been extremely careful to balance the list of witnesses," said Robert Nelson of the Democratic National Committee who is helping to coordinate the hearings.

In discussing the tone and tenor of the hearings to date, Nelson said that the primary emphasis was on the essential need of an open political process with the one-man, one-vote concept frequently recurring.

"There seems to be a general agreement that a national presidential primary is not the answer," he continued. "Most witnesses stated their belief that the convention process is a good system. However, it is good only so long as it is open, from the precinct caucus up to the national convention and people are encouraged to participate in a meaningful way."

The democratic system in both political parties has come a long way since the days of powerful political bosses who dominated and decision-making was largely removed from the people.

WEST VIRGINIA'S road workers are determined to win recognition for their union and protection against the state's "vicious and insidious" spoils system, Pres. Miles Stanley, center, of the State AFL-CIO declared on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Frank Swoboda, left, of United Press International and Ben A. Franklin of the New York Times. The AFL-CIO produced interview is heard Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EDT, on Mutual radio.

Groundswell of Support for Strike Buoys Charleston Hospital Workers

Charleston, S.C.—An outpouring of nationwide support for 600 striking hospital workers has buoyed their spirits and instilled deep confidence that they will win through to victory.

Nothing else has changed in Charleston since the workers struck two hospitals Mar. 20, except the heady feeling of optimism generated by the growing support of workers across the country.

Checks and pledges of financial aid have continued to come in to the headquarters of the strikers' union, Local 1199B of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union. The money is needed, but even more useful is the spirit of unity that results, the union said.

Pickets still march in court-restricted numbers as closely as they can get to the state Medical College Hospital, where the walkout started when a dozen union leaders were fired, and at Charleston County Hospital, whose workers joined the protest movement.

Gov. Robert E. McNair has lifted a curfew that prevailed for weeks but business is still off, tourists are scarce and state officials from the governor on down still refuse to meet with the strikers or their union. McNair has maintained throughout the dispute that state law prohibits bargaining with employes of state institutions.

Mrs. Coretta King, widow of the slain Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., expressed the sentiments of the strikers and 5,000 supporters who held an outdoor rally May 29 in Stony Field Stadium a few blocks from strike headquarters.

"Everywhere I go," Mrs. King said, "people ask me about this strike. For what began as a little-known walkout by black hospital workers has captured the imagination and touched the conscience of millions of Americans."

The crowd rose to its feet, cheering and applauding, when she assured them "the truth is, you are making history here in Charleston."

Pres. Mary Moultrie of Local 1199B brought a laugh when she advised the governor to "either shape up or ship out."

The Rev. Ralph Abernathy of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, Dr. King's successor, promised the strikers "I'm here until the end."

The AFL-CIO Executive Council started the Charleston defense fund with a gift of $25,000. Other unions have pledged varying amounts, and individuals have sent in sums from $1 on up.

The council's action reaffirmed a pledge by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany of full and continuing support for the striking hospital workers.

A statement by the council declared:

"Because they have no other recourse to win union recognition and to bargain collectively, the hospital workers were compelled to strike.

"For nearly two months now they have marched on the picket lines, where they have been joined by their fellow unionists, by civil rights leaders from other parts of the country, and by a growing number of citizens of Charleston—white as well as black."

This evidence of cooperation among community forces, civil rights organizations and labor holds out hope, the council said, for "success in the AFL-CIO's effort to organize the lowest paid and most exploited people in our society."

Nixon Asks Congress To Extend OEO 2 Years

The Nixon Administration has taken a second look at the anti-poverty program and now wants Congress to continue it for another two years.

That's twice as long as the President indicated last February when he requested a one-year stop-gap extension and promised that by June 30 he would submit "a comprehensive proposal for the future of the anti-poverty program."

In his latest statement, Nixon said he has concluded that "a two-year extension would provide a better framework within which the necessary improvements in the anti-poverty program can be made" and "a stable environment in which those changes can be considered."

The new director of the Office of Economic Opportunity, Donald Rumsfeld, told the House Education & Labor Committee that he would not have any new proposals to make until he had an opportunity to review the existing program. He has been in office less than two weeks.

While asking continuation of the OEO and appropriations slightly above last year's level for its operations, the Administration has delegated operation of some of the OEO programs to other government departments — notably the Job Corps to the Labor Dept. and Head Start to the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare.

Rep. Carl D. Perkins (D-Ky.), chairman of the Education & Labor Committee, has been pressing for a five-year extension of the OEO. He welcomed the Administration's shift to a two-year extension, commenting "I think they got the message."

Rumsfeld in his testimony stressed the Administration's view that OEO should be "an innovating agency, an incubator of new programs," rather than primarily an operating agency.

To Expand Opportunities:

Laundry Workers Push Rights Drive

Appeals for legislation to continue the advancement of civil rights and the drive to wipe out poverty highlighted actions by the fifth convention of the Laundry & Dry Cleaning Union in Washington.

The nearly 100 delegates unanimously adopted a series of resolutions urging Congress to expand opportunities in education, housing, and jobs—and to back the legislation with sufficient appropriations.

Calling for a greater effort to eliminate poverty, the convention emphasized that "this great and wealthy nation has the resources to combat unemployment, illness, lack of education and all the multiple causes of human suffering."

The delegates further instructed each union local to "identify the extent of poverty" in its area, participate in existing anti-poverty programs, and if nothing is being done "to initiate action."

A civil rights resolution asked Congress to "speed up" passage of measures "to further the human rights of all peoples in all areas" and take steps to strengthen enforcement of existing rights laws.

"This union," the resolution stated, "has participated in all major efforts in the civil rights field and will never let up in its efforts to achieve complete equality for all workers."

In the area of housing, the convention said that dwellings for low-income families and urban renewal must be pressed forward at a faster rate and on a broader front "if the lack of housing is not to become a catastrophe for the nation."

The resolution pinpointed the need for adequate funds for rent supplement programs and the building of 750,000 low-rent public housing units each year "as soon as possible."

Among several resolutions calling for strengthened educational programs was one strongly supporting the Head Start program to aid poor families in obtaining preschool education for their children.

The convention voiced opposition to Pres. Nixon's proposal to cut back the Job Corps as a move that will "hurt those people who can least afford to be hurt."

The Job Corps, it was pointed out, is helping poor young persons get job training, education and self-confidence, while removing them from an atmosphere of idleness and possible involvement in crime.

One resolution assured "heroic" farm workers of the union's support in their efforts to organize and to win legislation to protect their right to organize and bargain.

Another action resolved that the union would work for legislation in all states to provide collective bargaining rights for public employes.

The convention called upon each local to join COPE and make political action "an important part of your program." It urged support of all union labels, backed bans on professional strikebreakers and proposed expanded summer job programs for youths.

Speakers during the four days of sessions included Rep. Jeffery Cohelan (D-Calif.); Benjamin D. Naumoff of the Bureau of Labor & Management Reports; Stanton Smith, coordinator of AFL-CIO state and city central bodies; Paul R. Ornburn of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept.; William Pollard of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights; and Peter M. McGavin, executive secretary of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept.

Mill Reaches Dead End In Battle to Bar Union

The Pepperell Mfg. Co. lost a four-year fight to avoid bargaining with its organized employes when the Supreme Court refused to review an Appeals Court order against the big Southern textile firm.

The decision slammed shut the last legal escape hatch for Pepperell, which had campaigned to keep the Textile Workers Union of America out of the West Point-Pepperell plant near Rome, Ga., since the start of a 1965 organizing drive by the union.

TWUA Pres. William Pollock called on management to start negotiations June 16, and urged Congress to "take note of this additional evidence of the conspiracy" in the textile industry to "frustrate the desire of workers for union representation."

TWUA "earnestly hopes the company will finally recognize the right of its employes to a contract and will bargain in good faith," Pollock said, adding "we also hope that Congress will act to speed the processes of justice."

The apparent end of the line for Pepperell came when the high court let stand a 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals decision, made last Nov. 13 at New Orleans. That decision was that the National Labor Relations Board had good legal reason to order Pepperell to recognize the union and bargain with it.

The case hinged on a 1965 election which the union lost, 959-1,155. Union claims of company interference with the free choice of the voters were upheld by the NLRB, which ordered a new election. TWUA won the second vote, 1,139-917 in 1966, and was certified as the employes' bargaining agent.

Pepperell objected to the second election on the ground that the union distributed copies of an advertisement in the Rome News Tribune which exaggerated wage rates in area plants.

The NLRB found that discrepancies of 20 to 30 cents an hour in the quoted rates did not really constitute any real interference in the election because Pepperell rates, at $1.80 an hour, were far below the other area rates, and the company had time to set the record straight. The appeals judges agreed.

"We are in accord with the order of the board" in the first election also, they said in listing the evidence of the firm's law violations.

"One prime thrust of Pepperell's campaign" to defeat the union was that selecting TWUA "meant a plant shutdown and economic disaster." Against this background, the employes also had the statements of three supervisors "that the plant would be closed down," the court said.

Covers Federal Projects:

work, which also is covered by the bill.

In the face of this deficiency, Haggerty testified, there has been no year since 1959 in which fewer than 2,300 construction workers were killed on the job, nor less than 209,000 disabled.

The legislation authorizes the Secretary of Labor to develop, promulgate and enforce the safety standards. He would be assisted by an advisory committee of equal numbers of representatives of labor, industry and the public.

The secretary is empowered to make inspections of federal projects to see if they meet standards. Those that do not would be ordered to comply, through court action if necessary.

In the event of non-compliance, the agency for which the work is being done may cancel the contract and enter into another one, charging any additional cost to the original contractor. Where a contract is financed in whole or part by federal loans or grants, the agency may withhold the assistance if the contractor is found in non-compliance.

The secretary may withhold the awarding of federal contracts for a three-year period to any contractor or subcontractor who fails to comply with the safety standards.

The secretary is directed to establish safety education and training programs for employers and employes. He also is authorized to require reports from employers on accidents and ways of avoiding them.

The House bill was drawn up by Chairman Carl D. Perkins (D-Ky.) of the House Labor Committee and Rep. Dominick V. Daniels (D-N.J.), and co-sponsored by most of the Democratic and Republican committee members.

Labor Sec. George P. Shultz testified for the legislation by pointing out that it "recognized the federal government has a special obligation to those who work on government contracts" and extends safety protection to workers who do not have it.

The measure now goes to the Senate where a similar bill introduced by Sen. Harrison Williams (D-N.J.) also has strong bipartisan backing. Williams' subcommittee has approved the measure and it is now before the full committee.

The Hill-Burton extension, as it passed the House, authorized $937 million in matching grants for hospital construction, hospital modernization, diagnostic and treatment centers, emergency room modernization and interest subsidies on loans.

Urban area House members led by Rep. Richard L. Ottinger (D-N.Y.) lost an effort on the floor to revise the law's current grant formula under which rural areas with less population often get a higher percentage of help than crowded cities.

City members also sought unsuccessfully to increase the proportion of the total authorization that goes for modernization and make other changes tailored to "give the big cities a better break" in improving medical facilities.

There are indications that a further battle to revise the bill along these lines will be waged in the Senate.

THOUSANDS OF SIGNATURES adorn this giant post card that is being sent to Congress urging a 16.5 percent pay raise for mail handlers. A delegation leaves for Capitol Hill at the conclusion of a two-day pay raise rally in Washington sponsored by the National Post Office Mail Handlers Division of the Laborers Union attended by more than 800 representatives.

CWA Picketing Blocked At Arizona University

Flagstaff, Ariz.—A Communications Workers picket line at Northern Arizona University, the state's first strike on record against a state institution, was broken up by a temporary injunction granted after a hearing that lasted nearly six hours.

The union, following an overwhelming strike vote, had walked out as a last resort after the State Board of Regents and the university administration for six months had denied it recognition as bargaining agent for physical plant employes, said CWA Rep. Bruce Thoren. The CWA has signed up 114 of the 130 employes in the maintenance unit, he added.

Thoren said he was bluntly told by Pres. W. P. Goss of the regents that the board would not allow any of the three state universities under its jurisdiction to recognize or deal with a union.

In the petition for the restraining order, Daniel J. Stoops, attorney for the regents, charged the CWA with trying to "force and coerce" the board into recognizing it.

The injunction was granted by Superior Court Judge J. Thomas Brooks on the second day of picketing. His decision followed the long session in which he raised the free speech issue on several occasions.

Representatives of the state attorney general's office and Stoops told the court that the regents and the university do not have the authority to recognize any union as a bargaining agent for any employes.

Anderson D. Ard, CWA counsel, argued that the board has discretionary power to recognize a union, citing past rulings by the attorney general's office. The statute books do not contain a single reference to the right of state employes to organize unions or bargain collectively.

Judge Brooks scheduled a later hearing on a permanent order. He refused to bar the union from distributing leaflets and other literature.

Two days after the court action, the regents held a regularly scheduled meeting at NAU at which they refused permission to speak to William D. Shafer, CWA's chief shop steward in northern Arizona and a former president of the State AFL-CIO. The board later met in closed session but declined to comment on the situation.

The maintenance strikers during their first day off the job halted work on a high-rise dormitory when building trades workers refused to cross their picket line. The builders (Lembke Construction Co.) promptly charged the CWA with a secondary boycott and obtained an injunction that ended picketing at the entrance used by the construction workers.

Ekeberg Heads Compensation Unit

John M. Ekeberg, a career Labor Dept. employe for over 25 years, has been appointed director of the Bureau of Employes' Compensation, Sec. of Labor George P. Shultz announced.

The Bureau is responsible for administering federal programs providing workmen's compensation protection for federal employes and certain private employment within federal jurisdiction, including longshore and harbor workers.

Lithographers Win Pay Gains In 3 Big Cities

The Lithographers & Photoengravers achieved new contract benefits for 1,100 members in 50 Pittsburgh and Kansas City shops after settling a two-week strike of 5,500 members in 200 Chicago shops.

Chicago Local 245 returned to work after approving a two-year agreement providing a $25 weekly pay boost effective May 1, 1969, another increase of $13 a year later, and a third raise of $5 as of Nov. 1, 1970.

The pact also provides adjustments in night shift premiums and upgrading of certain jobs.

Local 245 Pres. Harry F. Spohnholtz said the new pact will give Chicago lithographers an annual pay range of $10,000 to $14,000 by the final contract year.

In Kansas City, members of Local 235 ratified a two-year settlement giving 700 lithographers wage hikes of $25.15 a week, $12.95 and $4.90 in three steps. The agreement also provides increased premiums in two steps of $11.55 for the first night shift, $16.10 for the second night shift. Other improvements include an early retirement plan, four weeks' vacation after 10 years in the industry and three years with the employer, inequity increases, and triple time for work on Easter Sunday.

The settlement between Pittsburgh Local 24L and employers will give 400 lithographers wage increases of $20 and $12.50 per week in two annual steps, an extra paid holiday—the day after Thanksgiving Day, improvements in early retirement and health and welfare, and a fund for training new employes.

Denver Dinner Honors Schnitzler

Denver—The chief financial officers of AFL-CIO affiliates honored the federation's retiring Secretary-Treasurer, William F. Schnitzler, for his "lasting contribution" to the trade union movement.

The tributes came at a dinner session of the Secretary-Treasurers' Conference here, and included a resolution signed by the entire group.

Speakers included Lane Kirkland, who will succeed Schnitzler as AFL-CIO Secretary-Treasurer, and Assistant Sec. of Labor William J. Usery.

Vegas Entertainers Nail Down Contract

Las Vegas, Nev.—United action by the Las Vegas labor movement has forced the multi-billion-dollar resort industry here to honor its collective bargaining agreement with the American Guild of Variety Artists.

Last March, in the face of a threatened shutdown of all the major hotels along Las Vegas' glittering Strip, management agreed to a new three-year contract containing a 50 percent wage and benefit package and giving entertainers, for the first time, a six-day week, sick pay, vacation pay and other fringes.

Three weeks later, however, hotel lawyers came to formal contract-signing ceremonies with a radically revised version of the contract. While the basic economic benefits remained untouched, the hotels sought to impose 28 different sections of the contract on AGVA, admitting openly that the owners had "changed their minds" about working conditions in the big show rooms and smaller lounges.

Among the "second-thought" demands presented by the hotels were:

- A provision that the cost of administering the sick leave and vacation programs would have to come out of the pockets of the singers, dancers and specialty performers.
- An elaborate "cut-off" formula that would have had the effect of denying fringe benefits to entertainers who worked overtime.
- A clause that would have given management the right of arbitrary dismissal of an entertainer for "poor performance," without the dismissal being subject to grievance or arbitration—a clause that the union insisted would have given management a license to harass performers.
- A stringent "act-of-God" clause that would have relieved the hotels of the responsibility to pay entertainers who reported for duty only to find that the show had been cancelled for any one of a number of reasons, including the "illness" of the director.

AGVA flatly rejected the efforts of the hotels to insert the new clauses.

The 700-member entertainers' local prepared for a showdown with the hotel owners. They had the full support of the Southern Nevada Central Trades & Labor Council, which includes 16 other unions.

Twenty-four hours before the strike deadline, the entertainers staged a mass demonstration in 100-degree heat outside five of the largest hotels in a show of determination that attracted the attention of thousands of tourists arriving in town for the big Memorial Day weekend.

The demonstration and the continued solidarity of the Las Vegas labor movement had the desired results. Ten minutes before the strike was scheduled to start, management hastily called the union back into discussions.

While entertainers gathered at AGVA headquarters prepared to take up picket assignments, and while sister unions put the finishing touches to their plans for support, hotel and union negotiators hammered out the final terms of the agreement — including the withdrawal of all of the "second-thought" demands by the industry.

Company Must Bargain Boost In Worker Rent

The Supreme Court left standing a lower court finding that an Arizona copper firm cannot raise the rent on houses it owns without negotiating with the union representing the employes who live in the houses.

The case involved a decision of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals at San Francisco and the National Labor Relations Board. The NLRB ruled that company housing, under the circumstances involved, is a "condition of employment" and therefore a mandatory bargaining subject at the Silver Bell, Ariz., mine of American Smelting & Refining Co.

ASARCO, claiming it was "none of the union's business," had raised the rent without bargaining with the unaffiliated Mine Workers.

The appellate court upheld the NLRB order that the company must restore rents to the former level, return the excess rents with 6 percent interest, and bargain with the union on any future changes.

The appeals judges noted that in the early 1960s, ASARCO rejected a union request for travel allowances with the claim that company housing was available. That indicated housing is a condition of employment, the court said.

The Supreme Court also refused to review a decision of the 5th U.S. Court of Appeals, New Orleans, that employes of a city-chartered airport limousine service at Houston, Tex., were covered by the federal wage-hour law.

At IUD Conference:

Labor Renews Drive For Job Safety Law

The economic waste and the tragedy of broken bodies, heartache and family suffering "is beyond comprehension," Abel declared.

He charged that many employers "put profits ahead of human life" by refusing to install safety measures and asserted that the government "has not placed a high enough priority on saving lives and protecting the health of workers."

"It follows as night follows day that our unions must exert their maximum influence to obtaining measures that will reduce job accidents to their lowest possible level," Abel concluded.

Yarborough, addressing a dinner meeting, described the features of his bill, which would give the Secretary of Labor powers to set and enforce safety standards; provide for research, training and special safety education drives; and encourage states to establish their own safety programs.

Only a handful of states have meaningful safety laws, Yarborough said, with most existing statutes calling for "voluntary" compliance He added, "and you know how anxious management is to voluntarily spend money to protect employes."

The Texas senator deplored the lack of general safety inspectors, noting that their total in state and federal employment averages out to "about 17 inspectors for each state in the union."

'National Campaign'

Calling for a "nationwide campaign" by unions to educate their members to the need for federal legislation, Yarborough declared, "It's no longer time for philosophical discussion. It's time to pass a law. It will be a fight but we can win it."

Mrs. Peterson, who was a leader in the Johnson Administration's effort to win enactment of federal health and safety standards, spoke on the "pitfalls" that were encountered in last year's drive and can be expected to show up again this year.

She accused the NAM and employer groups of "blanketing the country" with misleading letters and statements in opposition to the legislation after their representatives had previously agreed to a "compromise" version of the original bill.

"If we are to see passage of an occupational health and safety bill this year, we must campaign equally as hard as our opponents will be campaigning," she emphasized.

O'Hara, a main sponsor of the health-safety legislation in this and the last Congress, spoke at a luncheon held in connection with the conference. Like Yarborough, he stressed that passage of the measure is "overdue" and requires a full labor effort.

Sen. Richard S. Schweiker (R-Pa.) and Rep. Dominick V. Daniels (D-N.J.) also pledged support for strong legislation.

Position Challenged

Dr. David Goldstein, medical director of the New York Times Medical Center, was the only speaker to advocate legislation without enforcement powers. His position was challenged by subsequent speakers and in remarks from the floor.

A panel of medical experts described the "silent enemy" of workers—a horrifying line-up of occupational diseases such as lung cancer that result from the largely uncontrolled use of toxic chemicals in industry.

The speakers were Dr. Hawey Wells of Memorial Hospital, Johnstown, Pa., a leader in the fight for mine standards to reduce "black lung" disease; Edward Baier, Pennsylvania's occupational health director and an expert on industrial noise; and Dr. Irving Selikoff of Mt. Sinai Medical School, New York, an authority on asbestos hazards.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller summed up the legislative picture with regard to securing safety standards, and George Taylor, executive-secretary of the AFL-CIO Safety Committee, spoke on the role of the labor movement in the health-safety field.

Among other speakers were David Swankin, director of the Bureau of Labor Standards; C. C. Johnson, director of consumer protection and environmental health service, Health Education & Welfare Dept.; and Dr. Thomas S. Mancuso of the University of Pittsburgh.

Abel, IUD Administrative Dir. Jacob Clayman, and Presidents Matthew Guinan of the Transport Workers and Peter Bommarito of the Rubber Workers served as chairmen of various conference sessions.

'First, Assemble Ingredients . . .'

ON-THE JOB SAFETY STANDARDS were urged by Pres. I. W. Abel of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. at a two-day conference on occupational safety and health in Washington, D.C. Conference speakers included leaders from labor, industry, medicine and government.

Pamphlet Details AFL-CIO Functions

The structure, the function and the objectives of the AFL-CIO are described in a newly published pamphlet, "This Is the AFL-CIO."

It is designed for distribution to community groups, to schools and students, to news media and other groups unions encounter in their activities.

While the title goes back to a pamphlet issued shortly after the AFL-CIO was formed, the contents of the federation's Publication No. 20 are completely new. Single copies are free; orders up to 100 copies are 10 cents each and for orders of more than 100 copies, the price is $7.50 per 100.

Orders should be sent to AFL-CIO Pamphlet Division, 815 Sixteenth St., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006.

Nixon Sets Up Key Council to Fight Pollution

The "technological genius" of the nation has created pollution problems, he said, and the same skills must be devoted to solving these problems. "Together we have damaged the environment and together we can improve it."

Nixon said the council must do more than provide answers to today's questions. "It must also pose the new questions which will face us tomorrow."

DuBridge told newsmen that immediate priority would be given to three urgent problems —harmful effects of prolonged use of DDT, air pollution and methods of solid waste disposal.

He said the cost of reducing pollution from waste disposal is one of the biggest obstacles to pollution control.

The council also plans to meet with automobile manufacturers on the need for further anti-pollution controls. Noting that the main source of pollution in Los Angeles and a number of other cities has been automobile exhaust, DuBridge asked, "Can we still tolerate the combustion engine or is some other kind of propulsion mechanism going to be available?"

Nixon also announced the establishment of a 15-member Citizens Advisory Committee on Environmental Quality, to be headed by Laurence S. Rockefeller. Rockefeller headed the 12-member Advisory Committee on Recreation & Natural Beauty, set up by Pres. Johnson, which will be moved intact into the new advisory groups. Three other appointments will be made later.

3 Rulings by High Court Back Rights of Negroes

The rights of Negroes to equality in education, recreational opportunities and voting have been upheld by the Supreme Court in deciding three civil rights cases.

In the first case, the court ruled unanimously that a school board could be required to move toward eliminating recognizable "Negro" schools by assigning its teachers according to racial ratios set by the federal judiciary.

The decision written by Justice Hugo L. Black, upheld an order written by U.S. District Judge Frank M. Johnson, Jr. of Montgomery, Ala., ordering city school officials to aim at a ratio of three whites to two blacks on each school's faculty—the same ratio as exists in the system's total teacher force.

Black praised Johnson for "patience and wisdom" over recent years in handling school desegregation legislation and said the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals erred in overturning his order when it was challenged by school officials.

The ruling also contained several sharp references to "Alabama's Governor"—former Gov. George Wallace—for a past policy of attempting to block the efforts of school boards to comply with federal court desegregation orders.

In the second case, the court held, 7-1, that a lake recreation area in Arkansas was covered by the public accommodations section of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and must admit Negroes.

The suit was brought by several Negroes against Lake Nixon Club, near Little Rock, after it refused to admit them to membership, advertised widely at only 25 cents. Payment entitled a person to enter the area for a season.

Lower courts held that the club discriminated against Negroes—a fact that was admitted by its owner—but found that the discrimination wasn't illegal because the club was not in interstate commerce and therefore was not covered by the act.

The Supreme Court, however, ruled in a decision written by Justice William J. Brennan, Jr., that the club, accommodating 100,000 whites annually, serves food and customers from outside of Arkansas and clearly is in interstate commerce.

The club's membership device, Brennan said, "seems no more than a subterfuge designed to avoid coverage of the 1964 Act."

The third decision, also by 7-1, upheld a lower court decision that Gaston County, N.C., had used a literacy test to discriminate against Negroes in violation of the Voting Rights Act of 1965.

The basis of the decision, written by Justice John M. Harlan, was that the literacy test was not illegal in itself but became a "discriminatory device" under the law because it was used in combination with segregated schools that gave Negroes an inferior education.

Harlan said the ruling did not rest simply on the state's segregated school system that existed prior to the 1954 Supreme Court decision against school segregation. He said the Justice Dept. also had submitted extensive evidence of inferiority of Negro schools in the county.

Meyner, Cahill Capture Jersey Primary Races

Newark, N.J. — Former Gov. Robert B. Meyner handily won the Democratic nomination for governor in the New Jersey primary election, and U.S. Rep. William T. Cahill won the Republican nomination in a close race.

Gov. Richard J. Hughes, a Democrat, is barred from seeking reelection because New Jersey's constitution limits the incumbent to two consecutive terms.

Meyner, who served two terms as governor in the 1950s, overcame challenges in the Democratic primary from State Senators William F. Kelly and Ned J. Parsekian; U.S. Rep. Henry Helstoski; State Highway Authority Dir. D. Louis Tonti; and John Hennessey, a tavern owner.

Unsuccessful candidates in the GOP primary were U.S. Rep. Charles W. Sandman, Jr.; State Senators Frank X. McDermott and Harry L. Sears and State Public Utilities Commissioner William E. Ozzard.

Unions Hail 'Landmark' GE Decision

By John Oravec

New York—Organized labor's strategy for coordinated bargaining was reinforced as the 2nd District U.S. Court of Appeals held that an employer cannot refuse to negotiate because a union's bargaining team includes representatives of other unions.

The court ruled that General Electric Co. violated the National Labor Relations Act when it would not bargain with the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers' negotiating committee which included members of nine other unions under contract with GE.

Only during pre-negotiation talks could an employer decline to discuss contract issues with a mixed bargaining group, the court said.

The decision was hailed by the IUE "as a landmark triumph for real and effective bargaining."

Pres. Paul Jennings of the IUE said it will "go a long way toward equalizing the imbalance of bargaining power that has resulted over the years from the technique of multi-plant corporations whipsawing one union against another during its negotiations."

The ruling has an especially timely bearing as 10 AFL-CIO affiliates are preparing for coordinated bargaining talks with GE and the Westinghouse Electric Corp.

Jennings added that the court's decision "has historical meaning for labor everywhere. . . . In view of the forthcoming negotiations with GE, it will permit every union having contracts with that company to cooperate and establish meaningful bargaining for common bargaining goals."

A spokesman for GE said the company's lawyers are studying the appeals court decision and that there would be no comment immediately.

In the spring of 1966, GE representatives walked out of a meeting with the IUE and representatives from several other unions. The company refused to bargain until forced to do so by a court order.

This refusal resulted in an unfair labor practice finding against GE by the National Labor Relations Board.

The appeals court decision upheld the NLRB finding that a mixed union negotiating committee was not improper without a showing of "substantial evidence of ulterior motive or bad faith," and that an employer committed

Labor Calls for Roll-Back Of Soaring Interest Rates

50th ANNIVERSARY CONFERENCE of the International Labor Organization at the Palais des Nations in Geneva, Switzerland, hears U.S. Worker Delegate Rudolph Faupl nominate Jean Moeri for the presidency of the conference. Moeri, a Swiss union leader, became the first worker delegate ever elected to preside at an ILO conference.

Worldwide Program:

Meany Lauds Goals Of ILO Jobs Drive

Geneva—The launching of a World Employment Program by the International Labor Organization is in "the forward-looking spirit" of the 50-year-old agency, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared here.

He told the ILO's anniversary conference that the program—an international, cooperative effort to increase job opportunities in all parts of the world—has a goal "to which the American trade union movement has long been dedicated."

Meany spoke, as did labor leaders from other ILO-member nations, in comment on a report submitted by the ILO's director-general to the conference.

The address advanced ideas toward making the program a success and reaffirmed labor's strong support for the ILO. At the same time, it pointed to "shortcomings" in the United Nations' agency.

Meany emphasized that he does not share the view of some who would de-emphasize ILO's standard-setting activities through the adoption of conventions.

"To the contrary," he said, "I firmly believe that existing international labor standards will need to be modified and new ones adopted if workers all over the world are to be assured a fair share in economic and social progress."

The report's reference to the need for new protections for workers using tractors, in use of pesticides and in mining and milling radioactive ores "are just a few of the new areas where ILO standards can help to safeguard health and save lives," Meany pointed out.

"Indeed," he added, "the World Employment Program itself stems from the recently adopted ILO Convention and Recommendation on Employment Policy."

Meany praised the report's emphasis on the need for the program and on review procedures to devel-

Jobless Rate Holds Steady At 3.5 Percent

The nation's jobless rate was unchanged in May and employment increased only moderately, reflecting a continuing slowdown in economic growth, the Labor Dept. reported.

The unemployment rate was 3.5 percent, the same as in April which followed two straight months in which the rate edged upward. Prior to that it had been declining.

Non-farm payroll employment increased by only 90,000 in May to 70.2 million seasonally adjusted. Monthly increases have averaged 100,000 since February, compared to a 325,000 average monthly gain for the six previous months.

The civilian labor force, at 79.6

Latest Boost Blasted As Bank 'Greed'

By Duane Emme

The AFL-CIO appealed to the Administration and Congress to "take every possible action, without delay" to get a roll-back of the latest, "outrageous" increase in the prime interest rate.

The appeal was made after the nation's largest banks boosted the rate they charge on loans to their biggest and best customers by a full percentage point to 8.5 percent.

It was the fifth increase in a little over six months, the largest single hike ever imposed, and the action pushed the rate to its highest point in history.

AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger denounced the increase by the banks as "an outrageous assault on the economic well-being of the American people."

The bankers' "greed and avarice," he said, amount to a "mad plunge for extra profits in the next few months, even if it means higher prices and unemployment for the rest of us."

He asked the Justice Dept. to investigate the banks' action for possible antitrust violations and he urged Congress immediately to examine the nation's monetary policies as a basis for monetary reform.

Goldfinger told the Michigan AFL-CIO convention in Grand Rapids that the price of money "now is the highest in 100 years and you have to go back to right after the Civil War to find anything like it."

Although the American economy is strong and flexible, he warned,

Struck Hospital Told To Restore 12 to Jobs

Charleston, S. C.—The Medical College of South Carolina was directed to end its discriminatory practices against hospital employes or lose more than $12 million in federal grants for construction and research.

The state-owned hospital was advised by the U.S. Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare "as a first step" to rehire with full backpay the 12 employes it fired last Mar. 17.

The discharge of the 12 triggered a strike of nurses' aides and other employes at the college hospital where many of South Carolina's doctors and nurses are trained, and at Charleston County Hospital, whose aides also walked out.

The strike is still continuing with the full support of the AFL-CIO and national civil rights and church groups.

The strikers are represented by Local 1199B of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union. Their major objectives are reinstatement of the fired workers and recognition of the union as their chosen bargaining representative.

The refusal of state officials to reinstate the fired workers, or even to engage in discussions with the

FCC Doctrine Upheld On Broadcast Fairness

The Supreme Court has unanimously upheld the power of the Federal Communications Commission to require radio and television stations to air both sides of controversial issues and provide free time for reply by persons attacked on programs.

Its decision upholding the FCC "fairness doctrine" had been urged by the AFL-CIO, which asserted in a legal brief that the government has both the right and duty to insist that basic rules of fair play be followed.

Two broadcasting networks and an association of radio and television news directors had challenged the FCC regulations as an unconstitutional invasion of their freedom of speech. A federal appellate court in Chicago agreed with them.

The FCC appealed the decision to the Supreme Court and the AFL-CIO joined in the appeal, even though the federation was not a direct party to the case.

The AFL-CIO brief cited exam-

Swiss Unionist Calls ILO Election 'Vindication' of Tripartite Structure

Geneva—Jean Moeri, first worker delegate to be president of the International Labor Organization's annual conference, said his election was "striking vindication of the tripartite principle" on which the ILO was built.

In his first formal address to the conference's 50th anniversary session here after his election by acclamation the secretary of the Confederation of Swiss Trade Unions termed this vindication a "comforting fact."

The departure from the tradition that gives the presidency to a government representative served to dispel any lingering fear that there might be of a diluting of the autonomy that assures both worker and employer delegates the same rights as the official government spokesmen, Moeri stressed.

The long-time chairman of the workers at the ILO conferences and the agency's governing body, was alluding to unsuccessful past attempts by the Soviet Union and its satellites to curb the independence of the free trade unionists and employers.

By the time Moeri spoke, nearly 1,300 delegates and their advisers from 114 of the ILO's 121 member states had checked in for the session that marks the foundation of the organization by the World War I peace treaty.

Moeri was nominated for the presidency by Rudolph Faupl, United States worker delegate, who is being assisted at the three-week session by an AFL-CIO team of advisers headed by Pres. George Meany.

The 66-year-old Swiss trade unionist singled out Samuel Gompers, first president of the American Federation of Labor, for the "pioneering role" he played in the "creation of an international organization for defending the workers."

Gompers was chairman of the commission at the peace negotiations that drafted the constitution of the ILO, now a United Nations specialized agency.

At the close of his address, Moeri urged the delegates to reach "practical conclusions" on the issues before them that bore on the "social repercussions of underemployment, automation, major industrial concentration and technological developments in a world which is changing at increased speed."

The conference immediately got down to the specific items on its agenda by appointing the committees that will do the technical work.

Faupl, a member of both the conference's and the workers' steering groups, is also serving on the committee reviewing the ILO's structure and program. He is being aided on this committee by Bert Seidman, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security. Seidman is also working in the committee drafting new international standards on workers' health insurance.

Pres. Roy Siemiller of the Machinists and Lane Kirkland, executive assistant to Meany, are serving on the committee that is preparing special youth and training programs for the particular benefit of developing countries.

The AFL-CIO's views on the problems of minimum-wage fixing arrangements for protecting the workers in the newly industrializing states are being given by Clothing Workers Pres. Jacob Potofsky in another technical committee. Working with him is Joseph M. Pomarlen of the Ladies' Garment Workers.

Pres. Peter Fosco of the Laborers is a member of the committee preparing new regulations for the ILO member states to assure that farm workers are protected by adequately trained and independent labor inspectors.

An upgrading of the standards previously established on holidays with pay is being studied by a committee on which Richard H. Nolan, executive vice-president of the Operating Engineers, is serving.

Edward J. Hickey, Jr., counsel for a number of AFL-CIO unions, is working with other legal experts who check at each conference on whether the ILO member states are abiding by their pledges to the workers.

ples of unions being denied air time to present their views during organizing drives, strikes and legislative campaigns. Because the number of broadcast channels are limited, the AFL-CIO said, "the airwaves cannot, consistent with the Constitution, be made the exclusive domain of those in the business of broadcasting."

A companion case before the Supreme Court upheld the action of the FCC in ordering Station WGCB in Red Lion, Pa., to provide free time to author Fred J. Cook after he was savagely attacked on the right-wing Christian Crusade radio program of Rev. Billy James Hargis.

A different federal appellate court had upheld the FCC in this case, which was decided before the FCC codified its fairness doctrine into a set of regulations.

The 7-0 Supreme Court decision was written by Justice Byron R. White, who declared the fairness rules "enhance rather than abridge the freedoms of speech and press protected by the first amendment."

There is "no constitutional right" for anyone "to monopolize a radio frequency to the exclusion of his fellow citizens," White ruled.

"It is the right of the viewers and listeners, not the right of the broadcasters, which is paramount," he declared.

The two FCC rules challenged by the broadcasters:

- Require that if the "honesty, character or integrity" of a person or group is attacked on the air, the station must notify those attacked, supply a text or tape of the program, and offer free air time for reply.
- Require that a station broadcasting an editorial favoring one candidate provide reply time to other candidates.

Growth Slowdown Seen:

Jobless Rate Holds At 3.5% for May

million, was unchanged from April, although it usually rises substantially at this time of the year.

Howard V. Stambler, an employment analyst with the Bureau of Labor Statistics, said developments indicate "a slowing down or slackening of economic growth."

A slowdown was first noted last month by Harold Goldstein, BLS deputy commissioner, in analyzing April job figures. He said its continuation might lead to increasing unemployment.

The number of unemployed persons was 2.3 million in May, down 250,000 over the month and about 4,000 over the year. Seasonally adjusted, the figure represented little change from April.

The unemployment rate for nonwhite workers was 6.5 percent in May, not significantly changed from April, and the rate for white workers was 3.1 percent, unchanged. Thus, the more than two-to-one jobless ratio of non-whites and whites continued.

Rates for adult men (2 percent), adult women (3.7 percent), teenagers (12.5 percent), and full-time workers (3.1 percent), also showed little change over the month after edging upward since February. All of the rates are at or near the levels of May 1968.

On the employment side, the slowest growth took place in the goods-producing sector, BLS said. Although jobs increased at a faster rate in the service sector, it added, there was some slowing down there, too.

Employment in contract construction showed a seasonally adjusted decline of 30,000 from April to under 3.4 million. The drop followed a decline of about 25,000 jobs in April and 60,000 in March.

Manufacturing employment at 20.1 million in May was up only 20,000, with the gain concentrated largely in the electrical equipment industry. Over two months, employment was actually down about 12,000.

May employment figures in other areas, seasonally adjusted, were:

Transportation and public utilities, 4.4 million, unchanged from April; wholesale and retail trade, 14.6 million, up 30,000; finance, insurance and real estate, 3.5 million, up 9,000; services, 10.9 million, up 26,000; and government, 12.6 million, up 44,000.

As for the civilian labor force, BLS noted that it has declined by 300,000 seasonally adjusted between February and May, after increasing by 1.6 million during the October-February period.

Stambler noted, however, that the labor force has a way of evening out and should increase by some 1.4 million during 1969.

In another area, the Labor Dept. reported that average hourly earnings of rank-and-file workers on non-farm payrolls rose 2 cents in May to $3.02, marking the first time the figure has exceeded the $3 mark. Average weekly earnings were up $1.05 over the month to $113.55.

The seasonally adjusted workweek in manufacturing, at 40.8 hours, remained at the same level it held in March and April. The figure is one-tenth of an hour above the 1968 average.

The average workweek for all rank-and-file workers on non-farm payrolls was down one-tenth of an hour to 37.7 hours in May.

Factory overtime edged up one-tenth of an hour in May to 3.7 hours seasonally adjusted.

Worldwide Jobs Effort Draws Meany's Support

op "the most promising avenues of unemployment and underemployment."

But he was critical of the report's "bias" in several areas, including its pointing to the failure of "market economies" to coordinate housebuilding and employment without a mention of "notoriously" poor housing in Communist nations.

The conference is rightly concerned about ensuring that there will be no element of forced labor in youth employment programs, Meany said, but it should be equally concerned with existing forced labor in Communist nations.

American labor is convinced that the ILO will be weakened in helping workers, "if it permits sensitivity to political criticism by totalitarian elements to blunt its crusade for freedom and social justice," he stated.

Unions in the United States "take pride in the role American labor has played in the ILO since its very inception," Meany said in recalling "that no individual did more to bring about its inception than Samuel Gompers."

The first president of the American Federation of Labor, he noted, was unanimously elected chairman of the Commission on International Labor Legislation at the 1918 Paris Peace Conference which recommended the ILO's establishment.

The American labor movement strongly favored U.S. affiliation with the ILO "right from the start" even though the U.S. did not become a member of the organization until 1934, Meany pointed out.

Gompers had the foresight to recognize that if the ILO could benefit workers in industrial nations, "it would have an even more significant mission in 'bringing light into the lives of workers' in what we now call developing nations," Meany said.

"And," he added, "that is what the ILO has been doing for half a century. It has been 'bringing light into the lives of workers' all over the world."

Meany took the occasion to congratulate Jean Moeri, the Swiss worker delegate to the ILO, on being elected president of the conference.

Moeri's election, Meany said, underscores "two cardinal principles": That the ILO is a tripartite organization in which three partners—governments, employers and workers—are equal, and that "above all else" the organization is dedicated to the welfare of workers.

ILO must maintain its structure and its dedication if it is to continue to better the lives of workers, Meany concluded.

Sets 'Reform' Goals:

Chamber Pushes Bid To Gut Labor Laws

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce has asked businessmen to use their "influence" with the Nixon Administration to "reform" the National Labor Relations Board so as "to protect the right of management to manage . . . without undue interference from union bosses."

The Chamber's top priority legislative goal for what it calls "labor law reform" is to strip the NLRB of all jurisdiction over unfair labor practices. It also wants to rewrite the basic federal labor law to eliminate all language "encouraging" collective bargaining.

Unfortunately—from the Chamber's viewpoint—the present Congress shows no signs of enacting union-busting legislation. So the Chamber is starting to beat the drums for the election of "reform-minded" congressmen and senators in the 1970 elections.

But the business federation isn't putting all its union-busting eggs in a single legislative basket.

It suggests in a new "NLRB Reform" pamphlet that "the least disruptive and most gradual approach" would be for the President to appoint people to the labor board who would bring about the changes that the Chamber of Commerce favors.

"The businessman has great influence" with Congress, the pamphlet notes. It then adds pointedly, "He sometimes may even have the confidence of key figures in the Administration, which today may afford the most immediate reform of the NLRB."

To further its twin goals of putting pressure on the Nixon Administration to pack the NLRB and trying to arouse public opinion for anti-labor legislation, the Chamber has stepped up its propaganda efforts.

As it did last year, it will take a traveling roadshow of anti-labor speakers to put on "labor law reform workshops" in cities throughout the nation.

The workshops, co-sponsored by state and local chambers of commerce, "are primarily intended to build grassroots business support" for the national organization's program, the Chamber's labor relations manager said.

The "NLRB Reform" pamphlet boasts that the Chamber's "massive promotional campaign" has "inspired" numerous articles in the press.

And for those who don't want to bother reading the three pages of solid type in the pamphlet, the Chamber has a cartoon booklet, entitled "What Is Pushing Up Prices and Holding Back Progress?"

It complains of NLRB decisions that have required companies to negotiate with unions before introducing "cost-reducing methods" and before closing "a factory that was losing money" and asserts that "freedom is limited" when the NLRB tells a company it can't warn its employes during an election campaign that "excessive union demands" can force a company to close down or lay off people.

"And on top of all this," a cartoon page emphasizes, "there is the burden of more and more strikes and slowdowns" causing "inconvenience and hardship" to businessmen.

And it is all "because the NLRB has been going too far."

The belief that collective bargaining contributes to industrial peace, the Chamber suggests, is one of those "naively utopian" concepts of the early 1930s. The experience, it concludes, has been "quite the contrary."

Nevertheless, the Chamber adds, "collective bargaining is a useful institution" even though Congress shouldn't "encourage" it.

Some of the Chamber's other announced goals for changing federal labor law include:

- A ban on union recognition by card check.
- Outlawing of informational picketing.
- Allowing employers to sue a union for damages.
- Removing all restriction on what an employer can tell his workers before a union representation election.
- Prohibiting unions from fining members who work during a strike.
- Limiting penalties that can be imposed by the NLRB.
- Compelling unions to take a secret ballot strike vote when requested by management.
- Returning "management rights" to employers.
- Changing rules for determining units to take into account management as well as union desires.

These and other changes, the Chamber said, are needed "to restore balance to labor-management relations."

'You With Me?'

Pentagon Purchases Crimp Grape Boycott

The grim battle of the California table grape workers for a union and decent living standards is being undercut by the Dept. of Defense (DOD) on a wholesale basis.

As the nationwide boycott of table grapes grows in effectiveness, DOD has stepped up its purchases of the fruit, reports Press Associates, Inc., the labor news service.

The revelation brought sharp criticism from Cesar Chavez, director of the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee.

"This is a blatant case of government sources subsidizing scab grapes," he said. "It calls for legal action and we intend to take it."

The spiraling of grape purchases was admitted by DOD in a fact sheet, titled "Use of Table Grapes," issued Mar. 28, 1969. It had an extremely limited distribution.

The fact sheet shows that DOD is purchasing California table grapes at a level almost triple the previous year. Statistically, DOD bought 6.9 million pounds of grapes in fiscal 1968 and more than 8 million pounds the first half of fiscal 1969.

Equally interesting, the growers have been selling their grapes to DOD in the last year at less than half the price of the previous year. In 1968, DOD paid $1,320,000 for 6.9 million pounds while in the first half of 1969 it paid only $1,260,000 for the 8 million pounds.

The largest part of the DOD grape purchase went to Viet Nam. The figure rose from 468,000 pounds in fiscal 1966-1967 to 555,000 pounds in fiscal 1967-1968 to 4.1 million pounds estimated by DOD for this fiscal year ending July 1.

In a parallel development, the fruit and vegetable division of the Foreign Agricultural Service has confirmed that civilian table grape shipments from the U.S. to South Viet Nam have risen almost seven times since 1966.

This could not have occurred without both DOD and Agriculture Dept. encouragement.

Officials of the Foreign Agricultural Service told Press Associates that shipment of table grapes from the U.S. to South Viet Nam was 122 tons in 1965-66; 299 tons 1966-67; 667 tons in 1967-68 and 1,641 tons the first ten months of fiscal 1969.

DOD's Defense

In an extremely defensive statement, DOD says of its own purchase policy:

"The Dept. of Defense does not purchase grapes merely because they have been made more available and less expensive due to the effect of the boycott.

"Grape purchases are made by the defense supply agency in response to requests from military services. These requisitions are based on planned menus which reflect numerous factors, among them troop receptability, nutritional requirements, variety and items of availability, perishability and cost."

Columnist Frank Mankiewicz had this interpretation:

"Congressional critics of the Pentagon should be pleased to know that at United States bases around the world our weapons systems may not be delivered on time, the new helicopters may never be operational and complaints persist about the M16 rifle, but the vaunted United States delivery capability works in one respect—there is no shortage (indeed near glut) of table grapes."

The DOD insists that in making its large grape purchases it is in conformity with its policy "to refrain from taking a position on the merits of any labor dispute."

Union observers point out, however, that DOD does become involved in a labor dispute when it so greatly increases its purchases of boycotted grapes.

Labor Protests Aid to Border Runaway Firms

The AFL-CIO has charged that federal funds are being used to encourage "runaway companies" along the Mexican border and the "erosion of U.S. jobs and wages."

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller strongly protested a $60,000 grant from the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development to help establish a bi-national planning commission for El Paso, Tex., and Juarez, Mexico.

He asked Rep. William A. Barrett (D-Pa.), chairman of the housing subcommittee of the House Banking Committee, to investigate the award which "is the second such grant" made by HUD along the Mexican border.

Exploiting Mexicans

The planning commissions are ostensibly set up to deal with common problems of water, sewer, housing and other facilities. But, Biemiller stressed, "the end result is that the U.S. government is helping to subsidize a growing abandonment of U.S. plants and workers and, in turn, to exploit Mexican workers for the sole benefit of U.S. corporate profits."

Biemiller noted that in Juarez, RCA is building a $7 million plant "which will employ 3,000 Mexican workers who will assemble electronic components for sale in the American market." He charged that "the sole purpose of the plant being in Juarez is to take advantage of its sanctuary from American standards." Other major firms are doing likewise.

"Despite the growing threat posed by this mass loss of jobs," Biemiller said, "HUD sees fit to financially assist areas whose problems are aggravated because workers are recruited throughout Mexico and brought to these border communities to work in plants at jobs that were recently held by Americans."

Biemiller asked the subcommittee to urge HUD to halt any further border community grants and suggested that the Housing Act be amended "to make clear the intent of Congress was not to encourage the loss of U.S. jobs or to undercut American standards in wages and working conditions."

Backpay Tops $35,000 for VA Employe

A member of the Service Employes who was fired after he had a heated argument with his immediate boss at a Veterans Administration Hospital was ordered reinstated with full backpay and benefits estimated at $35,000.

The victory for Frank A. Palumbo of SEIU Local 227 in Buffalo culminated a four-year fight by the union. The final decision was handed down by the U.S. Civil Service Commission Board of Appeals & Review.

Palumbo had been discharged in January 1965 after he was charged with making "certain disrespectful remarks" to his supervisor.

The appeals board found that Palumbo was in a work situation "inappropriate to his condition" and that the relationship between him and his supervisor was "unacceptably poor." It further noted that "these things constituted substantial provocation."

The backpay awarded to Palumbo amounted to nearly $29,000 and accumulated sick leave and annual leave brought the total to more than $35,000, Local 227 Pres. James E. Lindsay reported.

HEW Directs Charleston Hospital To End Bias, Reinstate 12 Workers

union, has been a major barrier to settlement of the dispute. No change in the state's attitude had been made clear after a week of "study" of the HEW findings and recommendations.

HEW's Office for Civil Rights interviewed the 12 discharged employes, along with hospital administrators and supervisors during an investigation of complaints that the Medical College was in violation of Executive Order 11246, which bans government contracts to employers engaging in racial discrimination in employment.

The investigation "established one basic fact," wrote Hugh A. Brimm, chief of HEW's contract compliance branch, in a letter to Dr. William McCord, college president. "The Medical College of South Carolina, together with its hospital facilities, is in noncompliance with the requirements" of the federal order, Brimm said.

"In order to continue as a government contractor, it will be necessary that the college develop an affirmative action program in equal employment opportunity. . . .

"This plan must insure that all employes, regardless of their race, will have equal opportunity for employment open to them," Brimm wrote McCord. "This would include qualifiable, as well as qualified persons."

The letter listed other requirements for compliance: opportunities for training and job progression must be open to all qualifiable persons; the college hospital must develop, recruit, or promote minority group persons into job categories where they are not now represented; the hospital must seek to insure compliance of all contractors and subcontractors now engaged in its building program.

"As a first step in the demonstration of an affirmative program," the letter continued, "it is our recommendation that the 12 employes who were fired Mar. 17 be reinstated without penalty, and with their pay retroactive to that date."

In May the AFL-CIO gave its full support to the hospital workers by establishing a strike fund, voting a $25,000 contribution, and urging all affiliated unions to contribute generously.

In Miami Beach, delegates to the 59th convention of the Longshoremen's South Atlantic and Gulf Coast district heard reports from AFL-CIO Organization Dir. William L. Kircher and RWDSU Sec.-Treas. Alvin E. Heaps and approved a cooperative program of strike support.

ILA and RWDSU officers will meet in Charleston the week of June 16 to implement support for both the 600 hospital strikers and 600 dock workers involved in a dispute with the Charleston Port Authority.

Alms for the OEO

FIVE YEARS AGO when the war on poverty was initiated, the Administration and Congress committed themselves "to eliminate the paradox of poverty in the midst of plenty in this nation by opening to everyone the opportunity for education and training, the opportunity to work, and the opportunity to live in decency and dignity."

The Economic Opportunity Act of 1964 was enacted and the Office of Economic Opportunity was created to give leadership to the war on poverty. Many new and creative programs were developed including Head Start, Legal Services, Comprehensive Health Services, Job Corps, Neighborhood Youth Corps, Upward Bound, among others. About 1,000 Community Action agencies were put into operation to coordinate and plan the anti-poverty effort at the community level.

Organized labor recognized that the fight against poverty was but another phase of its own long history of struggle to raise the standards of work and life of the working people of America.

Realistically we have had to recognize the limited character of the OEO's anti-poverty efforts. Poverty will not be eliminated unless the full spectrum of relevant government and private resources are committed to this effort. In the final analysis it is jobs, housing, education, health services, freedom from hunger, and freedom from discriminatory practices which will bring an end to poverty.

The OEO should be looked upon as a long-term investment from which dividends cannot be realized overnight. Certainly a program that has controlled something less than 8 percent of all federal anti-poverty funds expended during its life cannot, by itself, be expected to bring an end to poverty.

Many poor people have benefited from these programs. Many others could have received the benefits of these programs had the OEO been more adequately funded. Much has been learned in the past five years—both from the successes as well as the failures.

WE ARE CONVINCED that the anti-poverty effort has had a positive impact on the poor and that it deserves to be continued.

Unfortunately, in the past, OEO programs have been consistently underfunded. Even the most successful OEO programs have been able to reach only a small portion of their target populations. Many experts in the anti-poverty field initially urged that the funding for the anti-poverty programs should rise to $6 billion by fiscal year 1969 and $8 billion in fiscal 1970. As you know, the actual appropriation made by Congress for fiscal 1969 was slightly less than $2 billion, and the budget request for fiscal 1970 submitted by Pres. Nixon is for slightly over $2 billion. This amount must be substantially increased.

From its inception, OEO has had to live with a year-to-year authorization for funding. This has prevented OEO itself and particularly the community action agencies from doing effective planning and program development.

A two-year extension will improve the management of the program by allowing longer-range planning and making possible more orderly and efficient allocation of funds. But in looking realistically at the problem we must remember that the war on poverty will not be won in two years or even three years. If our national commitment to end poverty is real, we must be prepared to carry on the struggle until the job is done.

A Word Edgewise:

Bradley's Vote-Getting Ability Shown in Los Angeles Runoff

By John P. Roche

THOSE OF US who were rooting for Thomas Bradley to knock off Sam Yorty in the Los Angeles mayoralty election were deeply disappointed by the outcome. Although Yorty is nominally a Democrat, a number of people with long political memories will never forgive him for sticking the knife into John F. Kennedy in 1960, a dangerous defection in that fearfully close election.

And while Robert F. Kennedy was not my candidate for President, it is fair to say that Yorty was against him for all the wrong reasons. In late 1967 and early 1968, when efforts were underway in California to form a coalition of pro-Administration delegates to run in the primary, Yorty engaged in one act of sabotage after another. If he could not sit at the head of the table, there would be no meal.

His egocentric behavior led one eminent Democrat of my acquaintance to observe that "Sam's idea of morality is to sell his grandmother, but deliver somebody else's." Yet despite the fact that by liberal Democratic standards Yorty is a blight upon the California democracy, he has been reelected. That's the way it goes in a free country—you win some and lose some, depending on the views of the sovereign voters from whose decision there is no legitimate appeal.

Now we have had time to let the election results sink in. What makes it interesting—once one gets over his dismay at the outcome—is not that Yorty won, but that Tom Bradley did so spectacularly well. Less than 20 percent of the Los Angeles population is Negro and by comparison with whites the level of political participation in black areas is low. Thus I would estimate that a good half of Bradley's supporters were not Negroes.

Admittedly Yorty has been collecting enemies quite diligently over the last four years, but before rushing out to deplore "white racism" commentators might recall what happened in 1965. Yorty was not even pushed into a runoff. On the first round he got an absolute majority over seven candidates including Congressman James Roosevelt.

In other words, before the explosion of the cities (the Watts riot took place in August 1965) and the national polarization caused by anti-war and campus violence, the people of Los Angeles did not even give Franklin D. Roosevelt's son, who had a long record as a Democratic congressman from the city, the tribute of a runoff election. It might be added that Roosevelt represented a strongly Negro district in the House of Representatives and received vigorous support from Negro organizations.

TODAY, four years later, a Negro with no national reputation or presidential chromosomes not only forced Yorty into a runoff but wound up with 47 percent of the vote. Any guesses about voting behavior are risky at this stage because there have been no statistical studies, but I suspect that rather than suffering from backlash, Bradley was the beneficiary of "frontlash."

As in Massachusetts, where Sen. Edward Brooke beat the eminently decent Endicott Peabody in a state 97 percent white, a significant number of citizens of Los Angeles obviously went to the polls to vote against "white racism."

This is not to deny that a lot of people undoubtedly cast their ballots to forestall a Negro mayor. But the hard fact must be faced: Los Angeles is now a conservative city and California a conservative state. I am not happy about this, but there it is and the same people who rushed out to beat Bradley would have rushed out to beat me or any other liberal, white or black. They are indiscriminately anti-liberal.

To paraphrase St. Augustine, in this world you have to take your breaks where you find them. To get 47 percent in Los Angeles, after the conservative ice age has set in, is no mean accomplishment. Bradley, a fine natural leader, should not waste any time on self-pity but start after his next office. In a Democratic party full of corpses that no one had the decency to bury, his is a hopeful new face. I suggest he start on the trail of California's forgotten senator—George Kelly?

Study in Force and Violence:

Success of Protest Depends On Extensive Popular Support

The following is excerpted from the general conclusions of a report "Violence in America; Historical and Comparative Perspectives" made to the National Commission on the Causes and Prevention of Violence.

FORCE AND VIOLENCE are likely to be successful techniques of social control and persuasion when they have widespread popular support. If they do not, their advocacy and use are ultimately self-destructive, whether they are used as techniques of social control or of opposition.

Governmental uses of force are likely to be successful in quelling specific outbreaks of collective violence, except when the balance of force favors its opponents. But historical and comparative evidence also suggests that governmental violence often succeeds only in the short run.

Even if popularly supported, public force is likely only to contain specific outbreaks of violence, not to prevent its recurrence. If groups have severe and persisting discontents, they are likely to resort repeatedly to collective violence whether or not they are successful.

Labor violence persisted in the United States despite repeated military intervention so long as labor grievances were unremedied.

The long-range effectiveness of governmental force in maintaining civil peace depends upon three conditions:

1. Public belief that governmental use of force is legitimate.

2. Consistent use of that force.

3. Remedial action for the discontents that give rise to collective violence.

Illegitimate and inconsistent use of public force can so alienate a people that terrorist and revolutionary movements arise to challenge and overthrow the regime. This occurred in Cuba, 1956-1958.

Collective violence seldom succeeds as an instrument for accomplishing group objectives. It can succeed when one group so overpowers its opponents that they have no choice but to die or desist. But modern governments are much more likely to succeed in such contests than their opponents.

In the contemporary United States, attempts at revolution from the left are likely to invite massive repression from the right. The occurrence of violence in the context of protest activities is highly likely to alienate groups that are not fundamentally in sympathy with the protestors.

The chronicles of American labor conflict suggest that violence, when it occurred, was almost always ineffective for the workers involved. The more violent the conflict, the more disastrous the consequences for the workers.

Peaceful protest is likely to have positive effects if demonstrative protest is regarded as a legitimate way of expressing grievances, and if the grievances themselves are regarded as justified.

If public opinion is negative, demonstrative protest is likely to exacerbate popular hostility whatever its legality.

Labor strikes met this response during much of American history. Violent antiwar protest has similarly been unpopular during most of America's wars and at present, even though the Viet Nam war itself commands less popular support than any previous American international war.

Governments can respond to protest and outbreaks of collective violence in two general ways:

1. Systems of forceful social control can be strengthened.

2. Efforts can be made to alleviate the conditions leading to discontent.

CIVIL PEACE is most likely to be established through a judicious combination of social control and concessions by government, and institutional development among the aggrieved classes of society. Such a combination led to the resolution of widespread and violent working-class protest in 19th-century England.

Violent labor strife in the United States declined after the establishment of mediation procedures and recognition of labor organizations.

Some discontents are more easily remedied than others. Worker discontent in the United States could be met by single employers or industries. But if discontent gives rise to demands that impinge on privileges of wide sections of the community, those demands are apt to be met with greater opposition.

If discontented groups regard their social environment as completely overpowering and threatening, they are likely to withdraw defensively and to establish barriers that preserve their cultural identity by minimizing their relations with the larger society.

Such defensive withdrawals have been attempted in the United States, for instance, by the Mormons, the Amish, and the Black Muslims. But in Western historical experience, collective violence has usually declined when discontented groups developed effective means for satisfying their members' discontents and for participating in the economic and political affairs of the larger society.

As probably the most ethnically and culturally pluralistic nation in the world, the United States has functioned less as a nation of individuals than of groups.

The myth of the melting pot has obscured the great degree to which Americans have historically identified with their national citizenship through their myriad subnational affiliations. This has meant inevitable group competition, friction and conflict.

Nevertheless, our historical and comparative analysis confirms the wisdom of Benjamin Franklin, who sagely observed upon signing the Declaration of Independence, that "We must all hang together, or assuredly we shall all hang separately."

Union Specialist Warns:

Impending Job Corps Cutbacks Will Bleed Anti-Poverty Effort

THE JOB CORPS SLASH proposed by the Administration will "cut to the heart" of a badly-needed and effective part of the war on poverty, a labor specialist in job training warned.

"The final record on the merits of the Job Corps isn't in yet," said Reese Hammond, research and education director for the Operating Engineers, but "sharp-shooting" and criticism of its shortcomings have grown "out of perspective." He appeared on Labor News Conference, an AFL-CIO produced public affairs program broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m. EDT, on Mutual Radio.

The Operating Engineers sponsor Job Corps camps in Tennessee and Montana, and other centers are operated by the Marine Cooks & Stewards, the Carpenters and the Painters, all AFL-CIO affiliates.

Hammond said it takes "total human renewal" to fill the assignment Congress gave the Job Corps: "To prepare for the responsibilities of citizenship and to increase the employability of young men and young women, by providing them, in rural or urban resident centers, with education, vocational training, useful work experience—including work directed toward the conservation of natural resources."

The conservation centers have met that order "head-on—in a positive fashion," he asserted, adding that the union-sponsored camps and centers are proud of their job-placement records.

He explained that Operating Engineers graduates are dispatched to areas where work is available. They can either go to work at whatever skills they have "and make journeyman's wages," he said, or those who have passed their high school equavalency tests can apply for apprenticeship programs geared to making them "fully-rounded journeymen . . . the only guarantee that a youngster will have that he will be able, year after year, to make a good living."

Noting that the Administration's camp-closings will eliminate 8,500 Corpsmen slots for youngsters who most need the "total human renewal" the camps offer, Hammond said it is just not valid to assume that "there aren't 8,500 youngsters who need this kind of total rehabilitation."

By Press Associates, Inc.

CONGRESS, after long debate and study in recent years, finally has adopted a number of "truth" bills . . . truth-in-lending, truth-in-packaging, truth in a number of other areas.

But there is one "truth" that it has neglected seriously, that is "truth" in the official reporting of its own debates.

Under congressional regulations, congressmen are permitted to "correct" the stenographic record of what they said on either the House or Senate floor before their remarks are embodied in cold type to stand as an historical record for all eternity. This permits them to correct errors that might be embarrassing—errors in grammar, names, spelling, minor inaccuracies.

Yet, more than once, congressmen have deliberately corrected their remarks on the floor to give them the advantage of second thoughts. A recent example of this type of Record correction is that of a speech made by Rep. Mendel L. Rivers (D-S.C.), who rules the House Armed Services Committee with the proverbial iron hand.

Rivers blew his top when Rep. George Mahon (D-Tex.), chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, declared bluntly that the military wouldn't need such large appropriations if it could manage to make fewer wasteful mistakes.

"You are playing into the hands of the enemies of the military," and the "enemies of the military will love you for saying it," Rivers was heard by practically everybody to say. But you wouldn't know it by reading the Congressional Record the next day. Instead, Rivers had deleted his McCarthy-like charges.

"There was no point in our two committees fighting each other," Rivers explained with considerable hindsight. "That doesn't help anybody."

Yet, how are historians to tell the true story of our time if one of their major sources of information—the libel-proof Congressional Record—is used to pervert the facts?

The "editing" of history is no light matter for the college professor of the future who is trying to piece together a coherent and accurate account of what has happened in the past. It is doubly evil for people and organizations who have suffered over the years as a result of the falsification of history which affects them.

ORGANIZED LABOR has good cause to know this.

Only recently more than 350 trade unionists met in Chicago in Haymarket Square to "set the record straight" on the famous Haymarket "riot" that took place some 80 years ago. What had been a perfectly peaceful protest meeting against the slaying of four strikers at the nearby McCormick Harvester plant was turned into a holocaust when a bomb exploded, killing seven policemen and injuring 60 spectators.

To this day no one knows for certain who threw the bomb, yet eight union men were arrested and eventually four of them were hanged.

Most historians agree that the four were never proved guilty of the crime, but that they and their unions were the victims of public reaction against radicals.

American labor history is filled with similar examples of how the truth can be perverted and used against men and women who seek simple justice.

The great railroad strikes of the 1870s are prime examples of how the struggle of workers to earn decent livings for themselves and their families were painted as violent uprisings against society by a reactionary press.

The Homestead Lockout in the steel industry was marked by the publication of deliberate lies about the high wages that were being paid at the very time that the strikers were struggling along on the lowest kind of wage level. Even today, the farm corporations of the West publish extravagant claims of the high wages that agricultural workers can earn, claims that few newspapers stop to investigate.

The "corrections" in the Congressional Record made by senators and representatives may seem remote from the deliberate falsification of fact that is prevalent in some labor-management disputes. But it is a first and unworthy step at the highest possible governmental level toward fooling the future historian.

JOB CORPS SLASHES proposed by the Administration will "cut to the heart" of this badly-needed part of the war on poverty, Reese Hammond, center, research and education director of the Operating Engineers, said on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Roy McGhee, left, of United Press International and Alan Adams of Business Week magazine.

High Court Outlaws Garnishments Unless Worker First Gets Hearing

The Supreme Court ruled unconstitutional state laws permitting creditors to garnishee a worker's wages without first giving him a court hearing.

In a 7-to-1 decision, the high court struck down the Wisconsin wage garnishment law. About 40 states have some sort of prejudgment garnishment statutes and 17 of these states plus the District of Columbia have laws similar to Wisconsin's.

The ruling found that the garnishment law violates the "due process" clause of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution.

Justice William O. Douglas noted in writing the court's majority opinion that under Wisconsin law, all that it takes to require an employer to hold back about half of a worker's earnings is the issuance of a summons at the request of a creditor's lawyer.

The worker might get money later if the creditor's claim did not stand up in court, Douglas observed, but in the meantime, he could be deprived of his earnings "without any opportunity to be heard and to tender any defense he may have, whether it be fraud or otherwise."

Douglas went on to criticize the ancient rights of creditors that "would pass muster under a feudal 'regime' but that today have the capacity to drive a wage-earning family to the wall."

The case in question involved Mrs. Christine Sniadach, a $65-a-week assembly line worker at Miller Harris Instrument Co. in Milwaukee.

Family Finance Corp. of Bay View, Wis., claimed she owed $420 on a promissory note. It obtained a garnishment order in Wisconsin courts and served it on her and her employer.

The employer then withheld $31.59 from her weekly wages, half of her net earnings.

She appealed but lost her case in Wisconsin County Court, Milwaukee Circuit Court and the Wisconsin Supreme Court.

Her case was brought before the Supreme Court by lawyers of the NAACP Legal Defense & Educational Fund. They initiated a broad constitutional attack on the garnishment procedure, declaring that it permitted finance companies to put pressure on poor people to pay dubious debts by freezing up to half of a worker's pay without first proving that a valid debt really existed.

The AFL-CIO also has been campaigning for the abolition of wage garnishment and other harsh collection methods. At its 1967 convention, the federation noted in a resolution that hundreds of thousands of workers lose their jobs because of garnishment which also causes many cases of personal bankruptcy.

Observing that only three of the nation's states have anti-garnishment laws, the convention urged enactment of a federal law to protect workers' wages from "this vicious and too-long sanctioned evil."

Among the states with garnishment statutes similar to Wisconsin's are Alaska, Arkansas, Arizona, California, Idaho, Minnesota, Montana, New Hampshire, Oklahoma, Oregon, Rhode Island, Utah, Vermont, Washington and Wyoming.

In striking down the Wisconsin law, the court held in the majority opinion by Douglas that "where the taking of one's property is so obvious, it needs no extended argument to conclude that absent notice and a prior hearing . . . this prejudgment garnishment procedure violates the fundamental principles of due process."

The decision reinforces the recently enacted federal truth-in-lending law which makes it illegal for an employer to dismiss a worker because his wages are attached. Some employers have avoided the bookkeeping involved in making periodic garnishment deductions by having it known that any worker who had his wages attached and who did not discharge the debt would lose his job.

Justice Hugo L. Black dissented from the majority opinion, asserting that the decision is "a plain, judicial usurpation of state legislative power to decide what the state's laws shall be."

New Jersey AFL-CIO Steps Up COPE Action

Atlantic City—A program of expanded COPE activity in preparation for the gubernatorial and legislative elections this fall was outlined to the eighth annual convention of the New Jersey AFL-CIO here.

Sec.-Treas. Charles H. Marciante reported that work is already under way on voter registration and voter information, with particular emphasis on telephone campaigning on behalf of candidates judged friendly to labor.

Pres. Vincent J. Murphy recommended to the 2,000 delegates that they defer any consideration of endorsing either candidate for governor—Democrat Robert B. Meyner or Republican William T. Cahill—until a special one-day COPE convention is held in September. A resolution to that effect was adopted unanimously.

Murphy, who has headed the AFL and AFL-CIO in New Jersey since 1933, announced to the convention that he will step down as head of the 500,000-member federation when his present term expires next June.

He said that although he is recovering from a recent illness "time has taken its toll and we must look to younger leadership."

In a report to the convention, Murphy warned union members against supporting "backlash" movements in the wake of campus disorders and urban disturbances. Support for either the new left or far right will only weaken labor, he said.

Murphy called for "even-handed enforcement of laws—laws of decency as well as public laws" and an immediate and full effort "to correct the abuses and inequities suffered by minority groups."

The convention approved his recommendation for a study of the state federation's constitution, with special emphasis on expanding the executive board membership.

Speakers included Gov. Richard J. Hughes, U.S. Senators Clifford P. Case (R) and Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D); Joseph Rourke, deputy director of national COPE; Stanton Smith, AFL-CIO coordinator of state and local central bodies; Ruth Colombo, Eastern director of COPE Women's Activities; and Ted Silvey of the AFL-CIO Speakers Bureau.

The convention banquet honored two New Jersey natives—AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, who is retiring, and Thomas E. Boyle, who was recently elected president of the Chemical Workers.

Minton Re-elected:

Glass Bottle Union Drafts Expansion

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A blueprint for a major organizing drive was approved at the concluding session of the Glass Bottle Blowers 64th convention here.

The union, which has seen the shaping of glass transformed from a hand craft to a mass production industry, is expanding in the fast-growing fields of fiberglass and plastics.

To spur that expansion, the convention voted to establish for the first time a separate organizing department, headed by a full-time director and separate from the servicing activities of the international union staff.

Delegates wound up the quadrennial convention by re-electing Pres. Lee W. Minton and the entire slate of officers to new four-year terms.

Minton, who has been president of the GBBA since 1946, defeated Joseph Kuhnline of Alton, Ill., by a nearly 2-1 margin.

Other officers re-elected, most without contests, were Sec. Newton W. Black, Treas. Dale D. Cutter, Vice Presidents J. Belton Warren, Harry Tulley and James L. Crandall, and 11 executive board members.

The more than 900 delegates considered a number of proposed constitutional amendments, and rejected most of them.

Change Adopted

One change adopted eased a previous requirement that candidates for local union office must have attended 75 percent of union meetings for at least two years prior to the election. The courts have voided that provision as too restrictive and the convention voted to reduce the meeting attendance requirement to 50 percent, with a provision for excused absences for various causes. Delegates also voted to set the term of local union officers at three years; the pattern previously has been two-year terms.

The convention voted down changes opposed by the union administration which would have required referendum election of international union officers and election of area directors by region.

A committee recommendation to equalize the dues of men and women failed to carry after delegates sought unsuccessfully in several days of debate to reach a consensus. The GBBA currently has three dues levels.

The highest rate is paid by the skilled operators, whose locals receive greater convention representation. A lower rate is paid by production and maintenance members and women workers pay at the lowest rate. The committee proposal had been to raise the women's rate 50 cents to bring it up to the P&M men's rate. Supporters argued that the considerable overlapping of jobs in recent years resulted in a number of women members earning as much or more than men.

Salaries Increased

Delegates approved $2,500 salary increases for the union's secretary and vice presidents and a $1,500 raise for the treasurer. Minton had asked that there be no increase in the president's salary.

Delegates and convention speakers, including Rep. John H. Dent (D-Pa.) and Howard A. Chester, executive director of the seven-union Stone, Glass & Clay Coordinating Committee, expressed concern over loss of jobs from imports—including products manufactured abroad by American firms seeking low-wage labor.

Greetings to the convention included messages from both Pres. Nixon and former Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey.

Nixon urged cooperation of labor, management and government, declaring: "Let us turn back the inflation that robs us of just compensation for our labor. Let us protect all men and women from hazards at the place of work. Let us bring hope to the young and dignity to the old."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Lane Kirkland, who will become the federation's secretary-treasurer on July 1, praised the accomplishments of the GBBA and the personal contribution of Minton as a vice president of the AFL-CIO, in messages to the convention.

Minton's approach to problems, Meany said, has been "deliberate, thoughtful and determined" and his proposals "imaginative, solid and achievable."

Cheap Imports Termed Major Threat to Jobs

Chicago—"We're not against free trade; we are against Americans losing their jobs because of cheap foreign-made goods imported into this country," Rep. John H. Dent (D-Pa.) told 400 delegates to the 87th convention of the Flint Glass Workers.

Dent praised the union for its fight against cheap imports, noting that the glass industry was the first hit and still the most vulnerable in the "competition" against low-wage standards in other countries.

Pres. George M. Parker, Sec.-Treas. Rufus K. Ritchie, other top officers and incumbent international representatives were re-elected to new two-year terms. Two new international representatives were elected to fill vacancies.

In the closing days of the two-week convention, delegates were preparing to debate and vote on a union policy on the import question. The convention also focused on craft problems and setting of contract goals for the next two years.

Dent said the American public has begun to awaken to the dangers of cheap-made foreign imports. "Anything you can name—boots, shoes, clothing, food, steel and machinery—is brought into this country. . . . We no longer have the exclusive knowledge and ability to produce goods; any finger—white, black, Asian or European—can push a button and turn out products."

The Pennsylvania congressman called on the nation's leaders to count job balances, not dollar balances, when making trade agreements. He said the economics of foreign trade should be taken away from the Tariff Commission and given to the Labor Dept. When imports threaten American jobs, the flow of the goods into the country should be limited.

Dent also called for efforts to raise employment standards around the world so that workers are given the means to consume the goods produced in their own countries.

Nixon Proposal Called 'Token':

Senior Citizens Press Case For Social Security Boosts

Adequate increases in social security benefits and other measures to lift the elderly from poverty were called for by the eighth annual convention of the 2.5 million-member National Council of Senior Citizens in Washington.

The nearly 2,000 delegates—wearing three-inch "Senior Power" buttons—returned to their homes from the two-day meeting vowing to wage a national fight on behalf of their programs.

The convention, the largest in NCSC's history, elected Nelson H. Cruikshank, former director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, to his first full term as council president.

Cruikshank has been the acting president, having been named to the post by the council's top officers earlier this year to succeed John W. Edelman, who retired for reasons of health.

Sec.-Treas. Andrew W. L. Brown of Detroit was re-elected as were Vice Presidents Walter Newburgher, New York; Emerson O. Midyett, San Francisco; and David Miller, Detroit.

Matthew DeMore of Washington, D.C., soon to retire as secretary-treasurer of the Machinists, was elected vice president to succeed Mrs. Bessie Gottlieb of Chicago, who has retired from the post.

Main speakers at the convention included former Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Wilbur J. Cohen, Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.), John B. Martin, head of the U.S. Administration on Aging, and HEW Under Sec. John G. Veneman.

Existing social security benefits in the current period of spiraling prices and taxes "are wholly inadequate to meet the needs of our senior Americans," a convention resolution declared.

It voiced "unqualified opposition" to Pres. Nixon's proposed "token improvements in benefits" and urged benefit increases to guarantee individuals at least $150 a month and couples $250 a month.

As a first step toward this goal, the resolution asked for an increase in the minimum monthly benefit from the present $55 to $100, 50 percent increases in other monthly benefits over a two-year period and strengthened widow's benefits.

Other resolutions called for:

- Enactment of a bill to require that the price per unit be placed on consumer commodities, an effective code of credit regulation in each state, federal action to eliminate malnutrition and a wide range of steps to strengthen consumer protection.
- "Immediate passage of a major public service and training program for persons of all ages to increase job opportunities for every person who wants and needs work."
- A comprehensive National Health Insurance system to replace "present fragmented, costly, inefficient and inadequate health care arrangements" and assure all Americans of their "equal right" to high quality health services.
- Correction of "inequities and deficiencies" in Medicare and Medicaid, pending enactment of an NHI program, to include extended coverage and the inclusion of prescription drugs under Medicare.
- Election of the President and Vice President by direct popular vote, adequate funds for low and middle income housing, more nursing homes, free food stamps to families with incomes of less than $100 a month and elimination of "tax loopholes" that favor the wealthy.

Cohen, now dean of the University of Michigan's School of Education, spoke following receipt of the council's highest honor—the Aime J. Forand Award—for lifetime work on behalf of social security and his fight for Medicare.

The former HEW head emphasized the need for further improvements in social security, extension of Medicare to the disabled and strengthening of the federal-state Medicaid program for the poor.

Williams, the keynote speaker, received the council's Senior Citizens Award of merit for service in Congress on behalf of the poor, infirm and the elderly.

"But the greatest honor of all is being able to share in the work you do," Williams said.

The council's programs, he said, demonstrate a concern that goes beyond the elderly to persons of all ages. "There's no generation gap when it comes to issues that interest your organization," he noted.

Veneman said the Administration's first concern is inflation which hits hardest those living on fixed incomes.

Martin, declaring that "there is nothing more potent than Senior Power," urged the delegates to protest legally, petition and speak until "eight million low income elderly persons are brought into the mainstream of life."

Other council award recipients were: New Jersey State Sen. Richard J. Coffee for services to the elderly at the state level; Sidney Margolius for his newspaper columns and books on consumer services; Lucille M. Kinne for developing seniors' programs in Amherst, N.Y.; Samuel I. Klingman for outstanding service to the elderly in New York; and Mrs. Gottlieb for "tireless efforts" on behalf of the council.

SPECIAL AWARD for distinguished service to the National Council of Senior Citizens was presented to NCSC Pres.-emeritus John W. Edelman by the council's newly-elected president, Nelson H. Cruikshank, former director of the AFL-CIO's Dept. of Social Security. Presentation was made during the council's eighth annual convention in Washington.

Prompt Action Urged To Roll Back Interest

it "cannot continue to prosper under the blows of sharply rising interest rates of the past year" piled on a 16-year trend of increases.

The "monopolistic price-fixing action" by the big banks in upping prime interest rates means that the big corporation borrowers will simply pass along their cost of borrowing, Goldfinger pointed out.

The result, he said, will be an increase in the price of "everything we buy"—from food to TV sets, automobiles and houses. "The bankers cut the buying power of your pay," he added.

Further, he said that the rise in the prime rate—putting it up 31 percent above a year ago—will discourage businesses, particularly small ones, from expanding because it will make it harder for them to get money.

This failure to expand, he explained, means lost jobs and less work. And, he noted, "It's workers' jobs that are at stake, not the bankers'."

Goldfinger emphasized that high interest rates have already priced most American families out of the home-buying market and caused rents to "shoot up through the roof." The banks' action can only "make this situation worse," he said.

Goldfinger saw the banks themselves as the only beneficiaries. Their profits, which have been soaring, "will move up even faster," he said.

Chairman Wright Patman (D-Tex.) of the House Banking Committee also called on the Justice Dept. to investigate possible "antitrust conspiracy" among the banks.

He urged the Federal Reserve Board to halt its discount loans to the interest-raising banks and said the Treasury Dept. should remove the banks' income tax deposits. Banks pay no interest on these funds but loan them out at interest.

Rep. William B. Widnall (R-N.J.) ranking GOP member of the committee, said the increase was "completely unjustified." Representatives James M. Hanley (D-N.Y.) and Richard T. Hanna (D-Calif.), Democratic committee members, agreed.

A Wall Street Journal article quoted a number of businessmen to show how they will "pass on their higher borrowing costs in the form of price increases."

A New York retail executive said "this is just one more reason to raise prices." A California auto dealer admitted "we just pass along the higher cost of money to the consumer." An official of a consumer-finance company said his firm will up charges on its loans wherever possible.

A survey by the Dow-Jones News Service showed a number of business executives considering retrenchment in their expenditures for expansion as a result of the prime rate boost.

Crackdown on Job Bias Vowed by Labor Dept.

The Labor Dept. has promised to crack down on government contractors who practice racial discrimination in jobs.

In outlining the department's policy for guaranteeing equal employment opportunity, Assistant Sec. of Labor Arthur Fletcher said the compliance program must be "streamlined" and the Office of Federal Contract Compliance expanded.

Fletcher told contract officers from 26 federal departments and agencies that the rules and regulations of Executive Order 11246 will be enforced as an effective tool "to assure dignity in the job situation."

The executive order is one signed by former Pres. Johnson which permitted cancellation of government contracts for any employer who practices racial discrimination in hiring.

Fletcher noted that a three-month critical study of the federal contract compliance program showed that regulations on equal employment opportunities are not being adequately enforced.

He listed two plans of action for improving the enforcement of the executive order. The first includes:

- An order from Sec. of Labor George P. Shultz to agency heads defining their responsibilities in enforcement and citing cases where the agency failed to meet its responsibilities.
- The establishment of a high-level interagency committee to review the entire federal procurement procedure and to recommend more effective ways to implement the regulation.

The other plan, involving the "streamlining," includes:

- Reducing the number of agencies having administrative responsibilities for the order from 26 to 13 in the next 30 to 45 days.
- Expanding and reorganizing OFCC to increase its effectiveness.

Fletcher also stressed that the major thrust the OFCC must undertake is to give more specific guidance and direction in establishing government priorities and setting more specific standards of compliance.

Stereotypers Vote New Merger Step

The Stereotypers and the Printing Pressmen moved closer to merger of the two graphic arts unions.

In a referendum, the Stereotypers voted 6,364 to 2,039 for a constitutional convention to draft a new constitution and bylaws for a merged organization. The new constitution will then be submitted to the Stereotypers membership for final approval.

At the last Pressmen's convention the union's executive board was authorized to enter into merger talks with any other printing trades union.

The next step is expected this fall when each union will name nine to 12 representatives to draw up a proposal for a joint constitution. The Pressmen have 130,000 members and the Stereotypers have 14,000.

Appeals Court Upholds Coordinated Bargaining

an unfair labor practice if it refused to bargain with such a group.

The IUE was represented throughout the litigation by its general counsel, Irving Abramson, who personally argued the case before the appeals court.

In writing the 25-page ruling, Judge Wilfred Feinbert said:

"We do not think that the company has demonstrated the type of clear and present danger to the bargaining process that is required to overcome the burden on one who objects to the representatives selected by the other party."

"We hold that the IUE did have the right to include members of other unions on its negotiating committee and the company was not lawfully entitled to refuse to bargain with that committee so long as it sought to bargain solely on behalf of those employes represented by IUE."

The coordinated bargaining strategy of IUE and the other unions was initiated in 1965 after they had become frustrated in negotiations with GE. The unions said it was the only way in which the company's "divide and conquer" tactics could be overcome.

The Committee on Collective Bargaining was formed by the IUE and the other unions in 1966. The contracts negotiated locally and nationally that year by the various unions expire this fall.

Taking precise note that its ruling would have direct impact on the impending negotiations, the appeals court declared in its decision that "three years later, with national bargaining on a new contract about to begin, the basic issue is before us again."

Continued cooperation between IUE and the nine other unions has brought about the formation of the AFL-CIO Coordinated Bargaining Committee.

The CBC has drawn up a set of goals for the 1969 negotiations which are now being presented to GE and Westinghouse local union representatives at a series of "grass roots" meetings around the country.

AFL-CIO affiliates in the CBC, besides the IUE, are the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Machinists, Allied Industrial Workers, Sheet Metal Workers, Plumbers, Steelworkers, Technical Engineers, Flint Glass Workers and Carpenters.

University Honors Shoe Union Leader

Boston—John E. Mara, president and secretary-treasurer of the Boot & Shoe Workers, received an honorary doctor of humane letters degree at Boston University's centennial commencement exercises.

Mara, who has been president of the BSWU since 1960, was graduated from Boston University in 1943.

Labor Issues Warning:

Money, Land Costs Pose Housing Crisis

In the strongest possible language, the AFL-CIO warned Congress that the nation is facing a desperate housing crisis because soaring money and land costs have priced most Americans out of the housing market.

"As a nation we are not only falling short of the goals set forth in the 1968 Housing Act, but we are actually losing ground," AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller testified.

Biemiller called for new programs of direct government financing of essential housing. And he urged that rehabilitation of run-down housing be undertaken through large-scale operations involving thousands of units instead of costly small projects.

He told a House Banking subcommittee that the labor movement wants "as much quality housing as possible, built at the lowest possible price, to serve the most people." The subcommittee is currently reviewing the functioning of the 1968 housing law which set a target of a steadily increasing volume of home and apartment construction and rehabilitation.

Instead of rising, the rate of home construction is plunging, Biemiller said. In the past year, "the cost of money has moved from being a serious problem to that of a national disaster." For many Americans, the 36 percent jump in interest rates just since last December "represents the slamming of the bank door in their face, the end of their last hope for funds for adequate shelter."

The AFL-CIO warned of the danger of rising interest rates in its testimony last year, Biemiller noted, and "painfully" labor's warnings have been proved valid.

He urged that "if housing is to be the victim of our monetary policies, it must be given special consideration and shelter."

Instead of competing for housing money at the bank, home financing should have "access to the nation's credit," Biemiller said.

He suggested a $3 billion direct loan program to help government and non-profit groups finance low and moderate income housing.

New Fund Source

Some $5 billion in National Service Life Insurance Funds could be made available for veterans' mortgages at a below-market 6 percent rate that would still provide a higher return to the fund than it now realizes.

In addition, Biemiller urged, the Federal Reserve Board could be directed to purchase up to $5 billion in government-guaranteed mortgages, thus freeing substantial additional funds for housing loans.

He suggested new programs for land aquisition to curb the "strong upward price pressures" and greater emphasis on public transportation to open up low-cost land for government-assisted housing.

Public housing still "does the best overall job of answering the needs of low income families" and should be expanded, Biemiller said.

Above all, he stressed, housing needs can be met only by volume production. He assured the subcommittee that "the AFL-CIO and the building trades unions have readily accepted and adapted" to materials changes and methods "aimed at faster, more economical building."

Biemiller asked: "When do we really get started on meeting the unpostponable housing needs of America?"

MORE THAN 3,000 Delegates from Postal Clerks locals throughout the nation were on hand for the opening of a legislative conference in Washington. Banners in the hall express two of the union's key demands. One reads, "UFPC Wants Union Recognition by Law." The other, referring to the scheduled 4.1 percent pay raise for postal workers, declares "4.1 Percent Ain't Anywhere Near Enough." The conference is the latest of a series of legislative rallies sponsored by AFL-CIO unions representing federal and postal employes.

Strategic Role for OEO Urged in Poverty War

The AFL-CIO asked Congress to make a long-term commitment to the war on poverty and retain the Office of Economic Opportunity as the "command post."

At the same time, Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller said in Senate testimony, no one should be deluded that a single, underfinanced agency is going to wipe out poverty in America.

"In the final analysis it is jobs, housing, education, health services, freedom from hunger and freedom from discriminatory practices which will bring an end to poverty," Biemiller said.

But the OEO, he stressed, has mounted programs over the past five years which have had a meaningful impact. It has involved the poor themselves in community action programs and it stands "as a visible symbol to the poor, and to the country at large, of the national commitment to end poverty."

Because its programs have been "consistently underfunded," Biemiller said, even the most successful have been able to reach only a small portion of those they were intended to help.

"The OEO must be retained, strengthened and extended," Biemiller said, and its appropriations "substantially increased."

He welcomed the Nixon Administration's support for a two-year extension of OEO, rather than the single year that the President had earlier advocated. He urged that the agency be given an important role in the President's Urban Affairs Council "in order to function effectively in the broad national anti-poverty effort."

He reiterated labor's opposition to the closing of 59 Job Corps centers, declaring "We felt then and we feel now that this was an ill-advised move."

As for the shift of OEO programs to other agencies, Biemiller told the subcommittee:

"We in the AFL-CIO are not so much concerned with where the program is housed as we are with how the integrity of the program is retained. We feel that in each case the OEO and the Administration should take every precaution to insure that the program concept, focus and guidelines are retained."

He suggested that programs be delegated, rather than transferred outright as an initial step. And he endorsed a proposal by Sen. Gaylord Nelson (D-Wis.), the subcommittee chairman, that delegation of programs be handled in the same manner as reorganization plans—subject to rejection by either house of Congress within 60 days.

Biemiller also praised Nelson's proposal for advance funding of the OEO programs, noting that community action agencies particularly have been hampered by the uncertainty of funds.

John L. Lewis Dies—A Giant Of U.S. Labor

John L. Lewis, a giant of the American trade union movement in the eyes of friends and foes alike, died June 11 at the age of 89. Six years earlier, he had retired as president of the Mine Workers, the union he led for 40 years.

"Death has removed a strong pillar from the house of labor," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared.

Lewis "offered his strength to those who were weak," Meany said, and "inspired those who followed him to victory in the struggle for social justice. His entire life was a crusade for the rights of all workers."

During the 1930s and 1940s—as president of the CIO, in and out of the AFL, inspiring and financing the birth of new industrial unions which would grow to overshadow their parent—Lewis became one of the nation's most prominent public figures.

With his bushy eyebrows and flowing hair, he was a cartoonist's delight. The self-educated coal miner from Lucas, Ia., who went to work at 12, sent reporters scurrying to Shakespeare and the Bible to check the quotations that studded his oratory.

He broke dramatically with Pres. Roosevelt—and kept his pledge to resign as president of the CIO if workers refused to follow him to the camp of Republican Presidential Candidate Wendell Willkie. He led his Mine Workers back into the AFL — and out again. And the mine owners who once damned him ended up by hailing him as the salvation of the industry when he accepted mechanization in return for high wages and a pioneering health and welfare program for workers.

At the end, he was president emeritus of the Mine Workers and trustee of its health and welfare fund.

White House Pressure Builds to Keep Surtax

Top officials of the Nixon Administration sought to build up sagging support for extension of the 10 percent tax surcharge by issuing dire warnings of what might happen if Congress lets the tax expire June 30.

Treasury Sec. David M. Kennedy warned of "runaway inflation" followed by "a serious recession."

The Administration might have to consider wage-price controls, he said. Credit could be squeezed even tighter and government spending might have to be deeply slashed.

And Federal Reserve Board Chairman William McChesney Martin suggested that monetary policy "would be called upon to carry a larger share of the burden" of fighting inflation—a warning in effect of still higher interest rates.

The White House downplayed the wage-price control hint, issuing a statement that Pres. Nixon had no intention of asking Congress for such controls. Nevertheless the President and his top aides continued to hammer away in public and private for passage of the surtax bill.

A majority of the House Ways & Means Committee appeared ready to clear legislation extending the surtax and repealing the 7 percent investment tax credit—but without the major tax reforms which the AFL-CIO and a growing number of congressmen have insisted should be linked to any tax bill.

But a bill is unlikely to be brought to the House floor unless Committee Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.) can count a clear majority for the measure. Mills, a supporter of the surtax, has been ill and committee members were reluctant to move ahead in his absence.

Setting the stage for another budget battle, the Senate Appropriations Committee set a tight ceiling on the amount the government can spend during the coming fiscal year—with exemptions only for "uncontrollable" items such as interest on the national debt and Viet Nam military spending.

Committee sources described it as requiring "an iron-clad reduction of $1.9 billion" in Pres. Nixon's budget.

The House earlier had imposed a more flexible ceiling equal to the President's budget, subject to being raised or lowered if Congress increased or reduced the appropriations sought by the President.

Under the House plan, Congress would be determining how much the federal government would spend. Under the Senate plan, similar to the restrictions Congress imposed last year, the Administration couldn't spend more than the ceiling, even if Congress appropriated a larger amount.

The Senate rushed through a 74-3 confirmation of Warren E. Burger as Chief Justice, to succeed Earl Warren at the conclusion of the Supreme Court's current term this month. Opponents protested the haste in which the Judiciary Committee acted on the nomination.

Shell Boycott Still On Despite Company Ploy

Denver—Shell Oil Co. is attempting to confuse its credit card customers that its dispute with the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers has been settled, the union reports.

Meanwhile, the consumer boycott against Shell continues unabated, said OCAW Pres. A. F. Grospiron.

"Management is sending a clever form letter to each person who returns his gasoline credit card to the company," Grospiron noted, and this is confusing a few people into thinking that the dispute is resolved.

"It is not settled, and we continue to urge our friends to mail Shell credit cards to the company at P.O. Box 80, Tulsa, Okla., and refrain from buying Shell Products," he stressed.

Shell has developed trouble on other labor fronts in its worldwide operations, the union adds. The violent strike in Curacao, Netherlands West Indies, is against a Shell refinery. Another Shell refinery in Vancouver, B. C., is being struck.

Labor Scores Surtax Bill, Asks 'Meaningful' Reform

In Orders to Bargain:

NLRB Upheld On Cardcheck Rulings

By Eugene A. Kelly

The Supreme Court unanimously upheld the right of the National Labor Relations Board to order an employer to bargain on the basis of a cardcheck where he has unlawfully destroyed the union's majority.

The ruling struck down findings by the U.S. Court of Appeals at Richmond, Va., in three key cases, and affirmed an opinion of the U.S. appeals court at Boston in a fourth case. The Richmond decision, reversed by the high court, was that the NLRB has no power to order an employer to bargain except on the basis of a representation election among his workers.

The AFL-CIO, in a brief filed last March, had urged the Supreme Court to enforce the NLRB's orders to bargain. The four cases each involved an employer who refused to recognize a union which had obtained membership applications from a majority of employes. In each case, the company demanded a formal election, then smashed the union's majority by threats of shutdowns and firings and by promises of future favors.

When an employer engages in unfair practices during a union organizing campaign, the federation pointed out, "the union and its employe supporters have the right to expect an adequate remedy. The NLRB bargaining order meets this just expectation."

The order "is the only presently available remedy" to stem the "rising tide" of unlawful employer opposition to union organizing, the brief declared.

AFL-CIO Organization Dir. William L. Kircher said the decision upholding the NLRB "also vindi-

Ships Sail After Interim Agreement

New York — The Masters, Mates & Pilots reached tentative agreement on contract terms after a two-day strike against freighter and passenger-ship operators, then sought to win the same terms from tanker operators.

The union, which represents about 7,000 captains and deck officers on more than 500 ocean-going vessels in Atlantic and Gulf Coast service, withdrew pickets from docks and offices of the two groups of vessel operators but continued its strike against the tanker fleet.

The settlement is an "interim" one, subject to further negotiations, the union reported. It has the right to cancel the accord on 24-hour notice, it said.

Tentative terms include an extra 60 days of vacation, or the cash equivalent, for ship captains; improved vacations for other deck officers; a 6 percent across-the-board wage increase at yearly in-

Growers' Front Breaks:

Mediation Service Enters Grape Talks

Los Angeles—The Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service has agreed to help the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee and a group of Coachella Valley growers negotiate a settlement in the long grape strike and boycott.

J. Curtis Counts, director of the service, announced in Washington that the government would intervene as "a public service" to mediate the dispute at the request of both the growers and the AFL-CIO union headed by Cesar Chavez.

The first mediation session was set for June 20 at the Federal Building here with Edwin M. Scott and Joseph Vierra representing the government.

The announcement followed a major break in the solid front California table grape growers have thrown up against UFWOC in its three and one-half year effort to win union recognition and bargaining rights.

A group of 10 prominent growers, admitting for the first time that the strike and nationwide grape boycott is hurting them, offered to negotiate a contract and at the same time said they would seek the aid of federal mediators in talks aimed toward settlement of the dispute.

The union welcomed the growers' move and joined in the request for government mediation help.

The 10 growers produce about a third of the table grapes grown in the Coachella Valley and Arvin areas of California and about 15 percent of all table grapes produced in the state.

Lionel Steinberg, whose David Freeman Co. is one of the biggest grape producers in the valley, bluntly acknowledged: "We are

Spurs Drive To Defeat Extension

By David L. Perlman

Labor called for defeat of the surtax extension bill and urged quick passage of "meaningful tax reform."

"To continue the surtax for another year without any provision for tax reform is an injustice that cannot be tolerated," the AFL-CIO said.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller called on the federation's state and local labor councils to mount an emergency campaign of telegrams and letters urging the House to reject the legislation drawn up by the Ways & Means Committee.

Defeat of the bill in the House would put pressure on the Ways & Means Committee to come up with a loophole-closing tax justice package. But prospects for real tax reform would be "severely diminished" by passage of the committee bill, Biemiller stressed.

The committee bill, supported by the Administration and by both the Republican and Democratic leadership in the House, would extend the present 10 percent surtax for the remainder of this year. It would mean that individuals would pay more taxes this year than last year, since the 10 percent rate applied for only nine months of 1968. The committee also adopted the President's proposal to drop the rate to 5 percent for the first six months of 1970.

In an "attempt to snare votes," Biemiller reported, the House committee bill exempts persons with below-poverty incomes from taxation. It also would repeal the 7 percent investment tax credit, a move

Inner-City Health Units Urged under Hill-Burton

The big need for health facilities today is in the inner cities, the AFL-CIO emphasized in testimony urging the Senate to update the 23-year-old Hill-Burton hospital construction program.

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller said the program has enabled 3,700 communities to build hospitals and nursing homes to care for 400,000 patients.

It was "a tremendous achievement," he told the subcommittee on health of the Senate Labor Committee, and met the "health care gap for the people of our agricultural and rural areas."

But in crowded, poverty areas of cities, Biemiller told the subcommittee, too often there are no hospital facilities or else hospitals and clinics that are "overcrowded and outmoded." For the poor who are sick, "it means hours spent in going to and from the hospital in addition to the long delays in crowded clinic waiting rooms."

To redirect Hill-Burton to these needs, Biemiller urged the Senate to pass legislation based on a bill introduced by Sen. Ralph W, Yarborough (D-Tex.). It is clearly superior, he indicated, to a House-passed bill which merely extends the present Hill-Burton program with few changes.

'Instant Housing' Pact Signed by Carpenters

By John Oravec

The first national contract guaranteeing all union-built manufactured housing—from the assembly line to the construction site—was nailed down by the Carpenters.

The contract was announced jointly in Washington by the Carpenters and Stirling Homex Corp. of Avon, N.Y., a major producer of "instant housing" units. It covers building construction operations already under way in several locations and a number of others expected later.

A key section of the contract also establishes a tripartite arrangement with the Carpenters, Stirling and the National Urban League to set up training centers to prepare unskilled and jobless workers in the production techniques of manufactured housing.

Journeymen will be furnished by the union for the erection and completion of the Stirling "instant housing" projects anywhere in the nation.

Stirling also agreed not to subcontract any of its work to a con-

DELEGATES to the 31st annual convention of the Communications Workers in Kansas City, Mo., were told by CWA Pres. Joseph A. Some 2,500 delegates, alternates and guests were on hand.

Convention in Kansas City:

CWA Presses Bell System To Reopen Wage Bargaining

By Duane Emme

Kansas City, Mo.—The nation's prospering telephone industry has been notified that it must "act now to correct gross inequities" in wages of employes represented by the Communications Workers.

The union won't tolerate further stalls by management on negotiating a wage reopener called for in the 1968 three-year Bell System contracts, Pres. Joseph A. Beirne told CWA's 31st annual convention.

"We have told them privately, and do so now publicly," Beirne declared, "that neither they nor we can afford to wait until 1971 to correct these inequities."

Beirne's keynote address highlighted opening sessions of the five-day convention, attended by more than 2,500 delegates, alternates and visitors. It marked the sixth time the union has convened here.

Later sessions were to include action on a wide range of resolutions, consideration of a report on the union's $10-million defense fund and analysis of a collective bargaining study authorized by the 1968 convention.

The delegates re-elected Beirne, head of the union since 1943, over the challenge of Phil C. Padgett, president of Local 3290, Atlanta, Ga. The vote, based on representation of membership, was Beirne, 279,417; Padgett, 70,073.

Sec.-Treas. Glenn E. Watts was elected by acclamation to his first full term in office. Watts was named to the post earlier this year to succeed William A. Smallwood, who retired after holding the post since 1955.

Executive Vice Pres. James M. Massey defeated George V. Werner, the union's northern Louisiana director, 252,817 to 89,616. Executive Vice Presidents George E. Gill and Gus Cramer were elected by acclamation. Cramer, named by the board to succeed Watts, will be serving his first full term.

Re-elected were Vice Presidents George M. Miller, District 1; W. K. Edwards, District 2; R. B. Porch, District 3; Walter Schaar, District 4; Arthur B. LeFevre, District 5; D. L. McCowen, District 6; D. K. Gordon, District 7; John C. Carroll, District 8; Richard W. Hackler, District 9; and National Directors P. J. Morgan, Frank J. Novotny and J. Curtis Fletcher.

George Myerscough, president of Local 1150, New York, became the new national director for Long Lines, defeating incumbent Robert T. Minnery in a close election.

Beirne assailed telephone management for "ignoring its responsibility" to negotiate on wage reopeners for starting rates and certain schedules as specified in the 1968 Bell pacts.

Efforts by the union over the past nine months to get talks started, he said, have been to no avail, at least in securing national bargaining so as not to further aggravate geographical differentials.

The CWA president belittled the industry for stalling on correcting inequities "it clearly recognizes" while it pressures the Federal Communications Commission for a guaranteed 8.5 percent profit margin.

He also expressed shock at American Telephone & Telegraph's recent announcement that it is giving its top executives a savings plan in which the company will contribute up to 50 percent of what an executive puts into it.

Beirne scorned AT&T for "taking part of an idea" it had rejected for employes when proposed by CWA two years ago. The steal, he said, makes a reasonable man ask, "What the heck goes on here?" The union has now called for the plan for employes.

In other areas, Beirne reviewed the union's campaign for tax reform, its concern about international problems, the need for labor's political efforts and its determination to block anti-union legislation.

"Forces which would render our organization impotent are in earnest, well-financed and powerful," Beirne warned, "and they will succeed if we fall asleep on our responsibilities as citizens and members of this union."

The first resolution adopted by the delegates was one that praised the service given by Smallwood. It affirmed the title of secretary-treasurer emeritus conferred earlier by the union's executive board.

Through other resolutions, the convention:

- Opposed any extension of the federal surtax on incomes and petitioned the Administration and Congress "to produce more than 'show window' tax legislation" by enacting a "truly equitable tax law."
- Urged Congress to enact legislation that would expand the distribution of food stamps to the poor, including making them free for families with little or no income.
- Called for the correction of grievances and the elimination of inequities being suffered by minority groups in America, while rejecting violence as a method for achieving changes.
- Mourned the passing of John L. Lewis, "one of the outstanding figures in the history of American labor," recalling that he "walked our picket lines" in CWA's first national strike in 1947 and presented a contribution of $100,000 from the United Mine Workers.

3-Way Race Shapes Up For N.Y. Mayoral Post

New York—The nation's largest city faces a bruising three-way battle for mayor in November, with incumbent John V. Lindsay seeking re-election as a third party candidate.

Lindsay narrowly lost the Republican Party nomination to State Sen. John J. Marchi, who already had been designated the Conservative Party candidate. Lindsay had been given the Liberal Party nomination without a primary contest and will seek an additional line on the New York City ballot for a new party to bid for votes of Democrats and Republicans.

There were too many liberals seeking the Democratic nomination for mayor. The result was the nomination of City Controller Mario A. Procaccino, the most conservative of the candidates. He won with only 252,000 of the 769,000 votes cast.

Former Mayor Robert F. Wagner, who was supported by most of the city's unions, was second with 221,600 votes. Running a strong third was Herman Badillo, borough president of the Bronx, with 215,400 votes. Author Norman Mailer and Rep. James H. Scheuer (D-N.Y.) trailed far behind.

Both major party winners ran so-called "law-and-order" campaigns and their success was widely interpreted as evidence of the strength of the "backlash" in normally liberal New York. However, the total votes cast in both primaries for candidates campaigning as liberals was substantially higher than the total for the two conservatives.

Lindsay had alienated many of his former supporters during the city's long teachers' strike last year, and the mounting problems of a big city contributed to a significant "anti-Lindsay" vote which helped the little-known Marchi. The decisive factor in the GOP primary was the decision of a third candidate, who would have divided the conservative vote, to drop out and join Marchi's ticket.

To add to the confusion of next November, Lindsay's running mates for controller and city council president won the Republican primary and will be on both the GOP and Liberal Party tickets. Both declared their support of Lindsay in the November election.

Wagner, who had served as mayor for 12 years before declining to seek re-election four years ago, termed the primary "a sad day for the Democratic Party—for all parties."

One of Wagner's running mates, Rep. Hugh L. Carey (D-N.Y.), held an unofficial lead of less than 200 votes for nomination as president of the City Council—subject to a possible recount.

Abraham D. Beame won the Democratic nomination for controller, the job he held before running unsuccessfully for mayor against Lindsay four years ago. He was endorsed by Procaccino but ran an independent campaign.

Strike Closes 4 Breweries In Milwaukee

Milwaukee—A strike by 4,500 members of Brewery Workers' Local 9 against Schlitz, Pabst, Miller and Gettelman breweries here moved through its second week with no signs of a settlement.

The major issue in contract disputes is wages. The local's pacts expired May 31 and the members took to picket lines June 9, after approving a walkout by a 3,056-151 vote.

The companies' latest offers of 33 cents an hour pay hikes in each of two years were advanced June 14 and rejected the next day, 2,212-1,235.

The strike, the first here since 1953, does not involve any of the companies' breweries elsewhere. Schlitz has several branch breweries and Pabst and Miller each have one other small installation.

Meanwhile, the Teamsters are on strike at Anheuser-Busch plants from coast to coast. Some 1,200 members of the Brewery Workers' Bottlers Local 187 are respecting picket lines at the main brewery in St. Louis.

22 Shoe Companies Agree to Contracts

Manchester, N.H. — Nineteen shoe companies in Maine, New Hampshire and Vermont have agreed to contract improvements and initial agreements have been signed with three additional firms, the Shoe Workers reported.

First agreements with the State, Swanson and Manchester Die companies here each provide a general wage hike of 25 cents an hour as of Jan. 2 this year, and an additional 25 cents next year.

Under a wage reopening clause, 19 employers agreed to 15-cent hourly wage increases retroactive to Jan. 1, and another 15 cents next Jan. 1, additional employer contributions of 2 cents an hour to the union health and welfare fund, 4 cents an hour to a fund for higher pension benefits or severance pay, and one more paid holiday for a total of nine each year.

In addition, the companies agreed not to use imported uppers unless the union approves, said union Vice Pres. John Giderian.

Trouble With Taxes: Too Harsh For Poor—Too Low for Wealthy

Atlanta—The truth about taxes today is not just that they are too high, but that they "are too high for some and too low for others," AFL-CIO Economist Arnold Cantor declared here.

"In other words," he asserted, "our basic tax structures are unjust and therefore the costs of government are not being shared fairly."

Cantor analyzed local, state and federal tax systems in an address before a seminar jointly sponsored by the Atlanta and Georgia AFL-CIOs.

Such an analysis shows, Cantor said, that taxes are "much too harsh" on the poor who have no taxpaying ability and "much too easy" on those who have considerable wealth and ability-to-pay.

And, he added, the moderate- and middle-income groups "who can pay taxes and should pay taxes are paying more than their fair share" to make up for what corporations and the wealthy do not pay.

The major flaw in the federal tax system, Cantor said, is that it "falls far short of its goals of taxing income and, in the main, those who have privileged types of income."

He cited the examples of a married worker who receives $8,000 a year in wages, an individual who receives that gain from selling stock and a third person who garners $8,000 from interest on municipal bonds.

The worker, he noted, would pay $1,000 on a full $8,000 of taxable income; the stock seller would take a capital gain and pay $354 on $4,000 in taxable income; the beneficiary of the bonds could report zero income and pay no taxes.

Because of such inequities and others, Cantor told the seminar, the AFL-CIO has proposed reforms that would eliminate the poor from tax rolls, close major loopholes benefiting the rich and provide "a measure of tax relief for workers."

At the state and local level, Cantor said, "the best thing that could happen would be complete elimination of property and sales taxes and substitution of progressive income taxes."

Granting that it is "unrealistic" to believe this will happen, he said, states and localities should at least be moving toward increasing reliance upon income taxes and easing the impact of sales and property taxes on low, moderate and middle incomes.

In terms of sales taxes "the most important thing to do is eliminate from the tax those items that take a high proportion of the income of lower-income groups—particularly food," Cantor stated.

"Pennsylvania's 6 percent sales tax is really fairer than Georgia's 3 percent because food, most clothing, and prescription drugs are not taxed in Pennsylvania," he said.

The property tax can be made more equitable, Cantor suggested, by removing "inequities" in assessment practices and following the example of Minnesota and Wisconsin, which give elderly home-owners and renters with low incomes a special rebate.

Pledges Friendship:

Workers' ILO Role Hailed by Pope Paul

Geneva—Pope Paul VI told worker delegates to the 50th anniversary conference of the International Labor Organization that he wants to be "with the full measure" of his strength "a defender and a friend of the world of labor."

The Pope met privately with worker delegations to the ILO as well as addressing a general session of the government, worker and employer delegates to the 116-nation organization.

He told the worker delegates, leaders of the trade union movements throughout the world, that they represented in the ILO's tripartite structure "an element which is particularly precious in our eyes."

He said the direct participation of workers in the deliberations and decisions of the ILO assumes particular significance in light of "the stormy history of the working classes, of the incredible difficulties they encountered for so long a time in order to be heard in the higher circles."

At the general session, some 2,000 delegates and guests jammed the conference hall to hear the white-robed head of the Roman Catholic church proclaim:

"We have come here to give you our encouragement and our agreement, to invite you also to persevere tenaciously in your mission of justice and peace, to assure you of our humble but sincere fellowship."

After endorsing the basic ILO goal of promoting social justice by bringing together workers, employers and governments to seek agreed solutions, the Pope said:

"Labor conflicts cannot be remedied by artifically imposed dispositions which fraudently deprive the workers and the whole social community of their first and inalienable human prerogative, which is freedom."

The Pope praised the work accomplished by the ILO in its first 50 years, but he went on to warn:

"Do not think that your task is ended. On the contrary, it daily becomes more urgent. How many and what terrible evils, how many deficiencies, injustices, sufferings, laments, still rise up from the world of labor?"

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, who is attending the conference as one of the technical advisers on the U. S. worker delegation headed by Rudolph Faupl, later told reporters that Pope Paul had demonstrated a "great knowledge of both the work the ILO has done and the importance of that work."

Meany also commented that the Roman pontiff had outlined for the ILO a "program for the future."

The workers demonstrated in defense of trade union rights by boycotting a plenary session of the conference, the general assembly of the ILO's member states, during an address by Reubens San Sebastian, Argentina's secretary of labor.

When San Sebastian rose to speak, they walked out of the conference hall as a protest against the recent wholesale arrest of Argentinian workers who had protested against the government's dissolution of trade unions.

The worker delegates re-elected Faupl for his fourth consecutive three-year term as one of the 12 worker representatives on the ILO's Governing Body.

Jean Moeri of Switzerland, who became this year the first worker delegate to be elected conference president, and Joseph Morris, executive vice president of the Canadian Labor Congress, also were re-elected.

The Governing Body also includes 12 employer and 24 government delegates.

In a message to the conference, Pres. Nixon praised the ILO for its "half-century of dedicated service to humanity."

"Heartened by the past and encouraged by the promise it offers," the President said, "we rededicate ourselves to the ILO as an instrument toward the realization of lasting human peace through the attainment of economic and social justice for peoples everywhere."

The President's message was read to the conference by Sec. of Labor George P. Shultz.

The secretary told the conference that racial unrest had become more apparent in the United States because massive efforts to remedy its underlying causes were under way at "long last."

"But whatever the difficulties," he said, "we are completely determined to make equal opportunity for all a living reality."

FIFTY YEARS of effort by the International Labor Organization to lift workers above exploitation is noted by Pres. Louis Stulberg of the Ladies' Garment Workers at a ceremony marking the issuance of a United Nations commemorative stamp saluting the ILO. The ceremony was at the UN in New York.

POPE PAUL VI acknowledges the greetings of well-wishers as he leaves the Palais des Nations in Geneva following an address to the International Labor Organization. The pontiff expressed the church's concern for workers in his speech marking the 50th anniversary of the ILO.

Masters, Mates Win 'Interim' Strike Pact

tervals over a three-year term, plus an additional 10 percent increase for all officers serving in automated vessels.

The key to settlement of the strike was agreement by two groups of employers to give the ship masters "economic primacy" on the ship, the union said. That primacy will be spelled out in contract language, and any failure to assure such primacy could cause a breakoff in negotiations, its spokesman declared.

The interim settlement was reached with the Maritime Service Committee, representing eight companies that operate 220 freight and passenger vessels, and the American Maritime Association, representing operators of 189 general cargo vessels.

Negotiations with the Tanker Service Committee, representing operators of 107 tanker ships, were continuing as the AFL-CIO News went to press. So were talks at San Francisco with West Coast operators of some general cargo and tanker ships in Atlantic and Gulf service.

The operators who came to terms with MM&P agreed to other contract improvements, the union said. They will finance a professional advancement training program to "further raise the proficiency of officers" serving in "sophisticated new ships" that take advantage of satellite navigation, and of advanced electronic and automated techniques.

The employers offered substantial increases in the overtime rate of officers, and other boosts in owner contributions to the union's pension and welfare programs.

It was agreed that deck officers will get vacations at the improved rate of 10 vacation days for every 30 days of employment on vessels under contract to the union.

MM&P announced that military cargoes are not affected by the strike. They continued in service without interruption and will continue during the duration of the strike against tanker firms, the union said.

Three other maritime unions came to terms recently with ship operators on three-year agreements, subject to a membership vote. The unions are the National Maritime Union, the Marine Engineers and the American Radio Association. The unions put the value of the improved benefits at 33 percent above old contract terms.

Griffin, Schremp Join Steelworkers' Staff

Pittsburgh—James P. Griffin has been named assistant to Pres. I. W. Abel of the Steelworkers and Paul E. Schremp has been appointed director of the union's Dept. of Safety & Health.

Griffin, formerly director of USWA District 26 in Youngstown, Ohio, has been on the union's executive board more than 20 years. Schremp headed USWA District 28 in Cleveland for the past 12 years.

Interest Hikes Called Bar to Housing Goals

Ever-increasing interest rates are destroying the housing market for workers of moderate income, Joseph D. Keenan, secretary of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, told a House Banking & Currency subcommittee.

Testifying for the Urban Coalition Action Council, of which he is a member, Keenan cited accelerating housing costs as one major obstacle the United States faces in reaching its housing goals.

While agreeing that it is necessary to fight inflation, Keenan said that high interest rates are actually increasing inflation in the housing market.

Priced Out of Market

The present 7.5 percent FHA interest rate on home mortgages effectively excludes families earning less than $10,000 a year from the new housing market, Keenan said. At 8.5 percent, families earning more than $10,000 a year will be priced out of the market.

"Today, people with good, steady union jobs cannot afford unsubsidized housing," he said.

"A monetary squeeze restricting the availability of mortgage credit brutalizes the housing industry," he added. If the industry is unable to compete successfully with other forms of investment for long-term credit, fewer houses are started and large segments of the labor force are lost to other industries.

Keenan, who is chairman of the AFL-CIO Housing Committee, called on the Nixon Administration to commit itself to the housing goals adopted by Congress in 1968—6 million low- and moderate-cost housing units over the next 10 years.

Michigan Labor Moves To Streamline Structure

Grand Rapids, Mich.—The more than 500 delegates to the Michigan AFL-CIO convention gave the state labor body the tools to expand the organization and step up the effectiveness of its political action program.

In an action-packed convention, the delegates:

- Approved the use of data processing as an added weapon for the 1970 elections.
- Increased monthly per capita payments from 10 to 13 cents.
- Consolidated the organization's headquarters by authorizing its location in the state capital, Lansing.
- Reduced the number of full-time officers to two—President and Secretary-Treasurer.

The delegates, representing 300,000 AFL-CIO members in the state, acted favorably on recommendations of a finance committee set up by the officers following the disaffiliation of the Auto Workers and the loss of some 450,000 members.

Re-elected president for his final two-year term was August Scholle who has headed the state labor organization since 1940 with the exception of two years. Scholle will be leaving in 1971 under provisions of a constitutional change calling for mandatory retirement at age 65.

William C. Marshall was elected secretary-treasurer after serving as executive vice president since 1960. The position of executive vice president was eliminated at this convention.

Barney Hopkins, long-time secretary-treasurer, decided not to run for re-election as he closed out 25 years in the office for both the former Michigan CIO and the Michigan AFL-CIO. Hopkins has been a leader in the state organization's community services program. He was honored in a resolution adopted by the Michigan legislature.

In his keynote speech, Scholle hit out at proposed increases in home mortgage interest rates and the cost of small loans.

He charged that the banking industry is involved in a conspiracy, refusing to lend mortgage money in Michigan unless the legislature goes along with the demand for a whopping increase in the interest rate.

One proposal backed by the bankers would completely eliminate the present 7 percent limit on interest rates. Another plan would increase the maximum rate to 9 percent. "I don't know of a more outrageous group of hogs than the bankers are today," Scholle declared.

Scholle was also critical of the move to raise the maximum small loan from $1,000 to $3,500 and to increase the interest charge. "If that's a small loan I don't know how to figure money," Scholle said.

Nat Goldfinger, national AFL-CIO research director, was also critical of the push for higher interest rates. In a convention speech, Goldfinger called on congress and the Administration to take action to win a roll-back in the recent hike in the prime interest rate from 7.5 to 8.5 percent.

A BADGE as an honorary guest of the Pennsylvania AFL-CIO convention in Philadelphia is pinned on former Vice Pres. Hubert Humphrey by Pres. Harry Boyer of the state federation after Humphrey addressed the nearly 2,000 delegates.

Political Action Absorbs Pennsylvania AFL-CIO

Philadelphia—Nearly 2,000 delegates attending the 10th annual convention of the Pennsylvania AFL-CIO looked back to their past political efforts and then focused on strengthening them in the future.

The convention also bolstered the federation by increasing the per capita dues of affiliates from seven to 10 cents per member per month. An operating account and a defense fund will each get five of the 10 cents.

In another action, delegates approved officers' salary increases, the first granted since the state AFL-CIO's merger convention in 1960.

The increases were as follows: Pres. Harry Boyer, from $16,500 to $20,500; Executive Vice Pres. Michael Johnson, from $16,000 to $20,000; and Sec. Harry Block and Treas. Earl C. Bohr, each from $13,000 to $18,000.

The convention's top speaker was former Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey, who received a loud ovation when he told the delegates he came to thank Pennsylvania unions for helping carry the state for him in last year's election.

Humphrey emphasized the need for even stronger labor action in the 1970 elections to prevent a conservative take-over of Congress and statehouses all across the nation.

Turning to foreign affairs, Humphrey said he remains optimistic about chances for a cease-fire in Viet Nam. Of Pres. Nixon, he said, "I have no doubt that he wants peace as much as any American and I don't think he is approaching it from a partisan view any more than I am."

Humphrey said he believes that the people of North Viet Nam are "less interested in the war since we stopped bombing the north." Their morale "has sagged badly" and their government "cannot conceal it any longer," he declared.

The convention presented Bayard Rustin, executive director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, with its "Pennsylvania AFL-CIO Good Citizen Award" and a check for $1,000 for the Randolph Scholarship Fund.

In accepting the award, Rustin said the nation is suffering from strife because of past mistakes in handling racial issues and present apathy toward them in many areas of life.

He said that labor seeks the economic goal that would do the most toward alleviating race problems—full employment. If everyone had work, he added, "the whites would need not fear and the blacks would need not be enraged."

AFL-CIO COPE Dir. Al Barkan praised Pennsylvania labor's political action program and promised that national COPE would give it the fullest possible support, particularly in registration and get-out-the-vote drives.

Plate Printers Chart Growth, Training Plans

Ottawa, Ont.—Plans for accelerated organizing drives and new apprentice training programs were drawn up by delegates here to the biennial convention of the Plate Printers, Die Stampers & Engravers.

Wages and working conditions continue to improve, Pres. Constantine Trochanis told the delegates, but the union must increase its membership to overcome a decline caused by automation in the bank note industry.

The organization has 14 locals. 11 in the U.S. and three in Canada. This represents an increase of two—one in Mt. Vernon, N.Y., and the other in Chicago—since the union's 1967 convention.

Delegates from Washington, D.C., where the union has its largest local, reported that the Federal Bureau of Engraving & Printing has become so automated that it now produces the same volume of work with 122 men that it formerly did in 1952 with 600.

Sec.-Treas. Walter J. Smith reported on the need for apprentice programs—and the convention mapped training plans for its locals—in view of the fact that "a sizable percentage of membership is on the verge of reaching retirement age."

The convention re-elected Trochanis, Smith and Vice Pres. Keith Carley of Ottawa. James Donegan of Philadelphia was elected first vice president, succeeding Ben Mazza.

Delegates authorized the continuation of talks on a possible merger with the AFL-CIO Siderographers. Philadelphia was chosen as the 1971 convention city.

Condemns Merger Proposals:

Musicians Union Vows Fight To Keep Symphonies Alive

Las Vegas, Nev.—A vigorous fight against mergers of symphony orchestras, now under widening discussion as a means of meeting pressing budgetary problems, was pledged by delegates to the 72d convention of the Musicians here.

Not only would the number of jobs for professional musicians be cut, they said in a resolution, but "America needs more symphony orchestras" and can ill afford to lose artists "whose presence adds to the total social and cultural resources of the cities."

The standard had been heralded by Pres. Herman D. Kenin in his keynote address. Kenin cited suggestions he said had been made for amalgamation of the symphony orchestras in Rochester and Buffalo, N.Y., and those in Indianapolis and Cincinnati.

He conceded that the purveyors of serious music face a crisis he called paradoxical in view of the fact that the number of symphony orchestras in the United States has more than doubled in less than 15 years.

"The demands on them are greater every year," he said. "The sources of income traditionally available are becoming harder to channel. The average man who once supported his symphony now is pressed by greater demands on his resources. Government support has dwindled."

As a possible aid in reaching a solution, Kenin suggested "vigorous action" in petitioning government at all levels "to increase the piddling amounts of money earmarked for support of symphony orchestras."

The pool of money that might be available to help such orchestras could be enlarged, he said, if the AFL-CIO's "strong position" on income tax reform were to be realized. He promised that "we'll help in every way we can" to provide the support asked by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany.

There "must be better solutions" to financing the government than the present tax structure, he declared, adding that "I believe there are, and that the AFL-CIO has found them."

In reviewing the union's progress since the 1968 convention, Kenin said union rolls have jumped from 280,000 to 297,000 members. He reported that the Employers Pension & Welfare Fund, now 10 years old, covers 90,000 members, has a balance of $33.5 million, has paid more than $1.2 million in benefits and currently is providing pensions to 173 retired musicians.

Kenin called upon the union not to close its mind to "exploration of new areas and new ways of doing things," and said the convention would be asked to approve a "bold new program" to deal with "new idioms, new disciplines, new musical forms" and directed especially to young people.

"The purpose," he explained, "is to reach the young musicians not now familiar with the advantages of AFM membership; to protect them from the vicious exploitation now so prevalent in the field of rock 'n roll; to enter into an expanding dialogue with them and with their parents that will prepare them to be not only dues-paying members of our union, but members whose insights and exposure will offer a positive contribution to the federation and all its members, of every age."

Sen. Howard Cannon (D-Nev.), a dues-paying member of Tucson, Ariz., Local 771 who worked his way through college playing clarinet and sax with dance orchestras, urged the delegates to write their congressmen and senators in support of the AFL-CIO fight for income tax reform. He cited particularly elimination of the surtax and the closing of loopholes.

He outlined the progress the union has made in the conflict between "so-called practical men in business and dreamers" like musicians. Those who think of themselves as "purely practical" call themselves "realists," he added, but in view of the union's gains it may be that it's the artists and musicians who are the really practical ones.

Cannon expressed the hope that this year "we'll finally be able to bring the bloody mess in Viet Nam to a conclusion" and that a tax cut may follow.

The delegates heard from Rep. Robert N. Giaimo (D-Conn.) that there is "pitifully little to report" on the arts-federal government relationship, and that the little is "not encouraging." Giaimo called for the development of priorities in utilizing the "limited amount" of federal funds to be available.

Giaimo saw a "ray of hope" for congressional modernization of "antiquated copyright laws." A result could be, he indicated, the opening of the door to payment of royalties for members of recording orchestras.

Kenin, Sec.-Treas. Stanley Ballard and J. Alan Wood, vice president for Canada, were re-elected without opposition. Contests for vice president, executive board members and AFL-CIO convention delegates were to be decided in later balloting.

Other speakers included AFM Pres.-Emeritus James C. Petrillo, State Labor Commissioner Stanley P. Jones of Nevada, and Pres. Albert Robinson and Gen. Sec. Don Thompson of the Professional Musicians Union of Australia.

Thompson urged closer cooperation between the two unions to assure maximum employment and wage opportunities for the musicians of both nations.

Father Norman J. O'Connor of New York, noted authority on jazz and star of the CBS television program "Dial M for Music," staged a jazz concert with running commentary.

Labor Asks Extension Of Voting Rights Law

The 1965 Voting Rights Act, which bans literacy tests in states that had sought to keep Negroes from voting, should be extended an additional five years, the AFL-CIO told Congress.

Thomas E. Harris, the federation's associate general counsel, urged the House Judiciary Committee to extend the present law first and then consider various proposals for more extensive voting rights legislation.

Otherwise, he warned, there is a real danger that some states and counties will reinstitute discriminatory practices and extensive court battles will be necessary to undo the damage.

The day before Harris testified, Attorney Gen. John N. Mitchell for the fifth time cancelled a scheduled appearance before the committee to testify on the issue.

There were some reports that the Administration plans to propose a major revision of the law, extending the literacy test ban nationwide but dropping the provision for federal registrars to be used where local officials put obstacles in the way of Negroes seeking to register or vote.

Harris said the AFL-CIO "ultimately would like to see all literacy tests abolished everywhere."

But it is particularly important to keep the existing restrictions in effect, he said, because some areas of the South continue to show "ingenuity" in seeking means of keeping Negroes from voting and in trying to nullify the effect of their votes.

If southern states reinstituted literacy tests, Harris noted, the actions could be challenged under a Supreme Court ruling that such tests cannot be reinstituted in an area where inferior education available to Negroes resulted in their having a higher illiteracy rate than whites.

But "a simple five-year extension of the present ban on literacy tests, in the areas covered by the 1965 act, would be preferable to this sort of circuitous litigation," he suggested.

The once-huge gap between Negro and white registration in the six states fully covered by the law has been considerably reduced as the result of the 1965 legislation, Harris noted. But he said there is still a lag, ranging from 8.6 percent in Virginia to 33 percent in Mississippi, with even greater disparities in certain counties.

Air Line Pilots Win Northwest, Pan Am Pacts

The Air Line Pilots won substantial contract improvement for 2,800 pilots at Pan American World Airways and 1,600 at Northwest Airlines—the latter after a six-hour strike, the first in 43 years.

The Pan Am settlement was reached after eight months of negotiation. It provides wage increases totaling 17.5 percent over a two-year period. Other gains include a reduction in pilots' daily on-duty periods and monthly flight limitations; improved working conditions and rules, and gains in pensions, insurance and other benefits, the union said.

ALPA and Northwest representatives reached agreement in an all-night final session after pilots walked off the job. They returned when the settlement was announced by Chairman Leverett Edwards of the National Mediation Board and union negotiators.

Besides improvements in pay scales retroactive to May 1968 and hospitalization insurance, Northwest pilots will get a reduction in hours, one of their major goals. The new schedule of hours will be 82.5 a month until June 1970, dropping after that to 80.

Contract language still is being worked out by union and management representatives, ALPA said.

'Settlement' Withdrawn:

Hospital Workers Resume Picketing

Charleston, S.C.—Striking hospital workers went back to picketing and marching here when an offer to settle their dispute was withdrawn at the last minute by Dr. William McCord, director of the struck Medical College Hospital of South Carolina.

McCord was reported suffering from "heat exhaustion" at his summer home near here and could not be reached for an explanation. But strike leaders charged the settlement was torpedoed by two potent Carolina politicians, Sen. Strom Thurmond (R) and Rep. L. Mendel Rivers (D).

Spokesmen for the striking union—Local 1199B of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union—met June 5 with hospital trustees and later reached an agreement involving rehiring of 12 aides the hospital fired last Mar. 17, when the strike began.

On June 10, Gov. Robert E. McNair approved the terms, and the strikers began adjusting themselves to the role of victors in the battle for union recognition, and perhaps even an eventual contract.

June 12 the unionists gathered for a meeting with McCord or his representatives, and were advised by telephone to postpone the meeting. Within the hour, this letter arrived from McCord:

"Please be advised that the offer to employ the 12 discharged workers made on June 9, 1969, is now withdrawn as of Thursday June 12 at 5 p.m."

Knew Nothing

The trustees and the governor, and even a McCord assistant, said they knew nothing about the switch in position.

Reports received at union headquarters here were that Thurmond and Rivers had contacted Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Robert H. Finch.

Thurmond let it be known, the union said, that Finch had assured him no federal funds would be withheld from the Medical College Hospital until Finch had made a personal investigation of an HEW notice to the hospital to conform to federal law. No further word on Finch's alleged intervention in the case has since been received, and the settlement is still off, the union said.

HEW's contract compliance branch earlier had directed the state-owned hospital to end its discriminatory hiring and employment practices or lose more than $12 million in federal grants for construction and research.

McCord was advised in a letter from Hugh A. Brimm, chief of the contract compliance branch, that an investigation showed the hospital was in violation of Executive Order 11246, which bans government contracts to employers who engage in racial discrimination in hiring.

In Non-Compliance

Brimm notified McCord that the hospital was "in noncompliance with the requirements" of the federal order, and must "develop an affirmative program in equal employment opportunity."

As a "first step," Brimm's letter said, "it is our recommendation that the 12 employes who were fired Mar. 17 be reinstated without penalty, and with their pay retroactive to that date."

Publication of the letter led to the agreement which McCord later repudiated. HEW's compliance division said nothing has changed, that the hospital still is not in compliance with the laws governing federal contractors and still is in danger of losing $12 million in funds.

The union announced it would resume a series of public marches in Charleston. City and state police said no marches would be permitted; Police Chief John Conroy has forbidden them.

Police details have watched strike headquarters closely. The details were intensified when union members marched to the homes of Rivers and Sen. Ernest Hollings (D).

Nixon Action Sought

Meanwhile 50 members of the Concerned Clergy Committee petitioned Pres. Nixon to intervene in the strike to meet the just needs of the hospital workers. Besides the state hospital workers, the strikers include nurses' aides and other low-paid employes at Charleston County Hospital.

The strike has the strong support of the AFL-CIO, which contributed $25,000 to launch a strike fund and called on all affiliated unions to lend their aid. Also enlisted on the side of the strikers are church and civil rights groups from many parts of the nation.

HOSPITAL STRIKERS of Charleston, S.C., received a pledge of $2,000 from the New York City Central Labor Council at its civil rights conference. Announcing the pledge is council Sec. Morris Iushewitz. From left are Louis Simon, chairman of the civil rights committee; Iushewitz; Pres. Mary Moultrie of striking hospital workers Local 1199B of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, and council Treas. William H. Bowe.

Group Health Plans Seek HEW Support

New York—The federal government was urged by Group Health Association of America to take steps to "vigorously promote" the development of group practice prepayment health plans.

The GHAA, at its 10th annual meeting here, also called on labor unions as "the largest of the groups of organized consumers" to intensify their efforts on behalf of such plans.

In another action, representatives of the 8-million member association endorsed the principles of a National Health Insurance system, with incentives to expedite improvements in medical care.

A resolution urged the government, through the Health, Education & Welfare Dept., to make available technical consultant services and grants for seed money to start new group practice programs. It also urged grants for programs in early development.

Further, the meeting asked HEW to make available technical assistance to support efforts to remove restrictions on group practice in state and local laws, and aid in framing corrective legislation.

The GHAA pointed out that "almost half of the states have laws on their books which restrict or prevent the organization of consumer-sponsored medical care plans."

Call to Unions

The resolution asked unions to seek provisions in health-and-welfare bargaining which will give their members the choice between traditional indemnity insurance and prepaid group practice in communities where it is available.

In endorsing National Health Insurance, the meeting observed that adequate health care is "recognized to be a human right" which is not sufficiently available to U.S. citizens.

It noted that 60 nations already have some form of national health insurance or national health service and the United States lags "substantially behind" many of these nations "by the major indices which measure a nation's health."

The NHI resolution also emphasized that the nation's present system of voluntary health insurance does not cover the needy and rarely offers comprehensive care.

At the same time, it observed, "the costs of medical care in this country continue to escalate at a rate more than twice as rapidly as increases in the cost of living."

The resolution concluded by pledging the association's support of the efforts being made to obtain NHI by the AFL-CIO and other organizations.

Among speakers addressing the meeting was Richard Shoemaker, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security.

Court Affirms PublicEmploye Right to Strike

San Diego—A California state judge ruled that public employes have a constitutional right to strike in the absence of any law specifically prohibiting it.

The decision, if upheld by higher courts, breaks new legal ground in affirming the basic rights of city, state and county workers.

Superior Court Judge Hugo Fisher dissolved a temporary restraining order that prohibited a strike called by a State, County & Municipal Employes local representing nearly 1,000 San Diego city workers.

The city had asked for a permanent injunction, contending that all strikes by public employes were illegal.

The union's attorney, Loren R. Rothschild, argued that a 1966 California Supreme Court decision established the fact that public employes have the same constitutional rights as other citizens.

The right to strike, he contended, is one of these rights.

If the mere fact of public employment precluded a strike, the union added, it would have been unnecessary for the state legislature to have passed laws banning strikes by fire fighters and law enforcement officers.

Upholding the union case, the court said the city had not demonstrated any "imperative necessity" which could justify prohibiting the strike.

Although legally free to strike, the union said the city has now entered into "negotiations in good faith" and the workers will stay on the job in the expectation of negotiating a settlement.

Randolph Paid Tribute By New England Labor

Boston—The labor movement of Massachusetts and Rhode Island pledged continued support of the cause of A. Philip Randolph—"the cause of freedom," as AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Matthew Guinan put it.

Speaking at a dinner marking the 80th birthday of the long-time leader of the Sleeping Car Porters, Guinan noted Randolph's efforts to build an alliance between labor and the Negroes.

"He has had the political wisdom to understand that black people will be poor until all people in this country — black and white — are lifted out of poverty," Guinan said.

Randolph has seen, Guinan observed, that organized labor has been the home of the working man and the dispossessed and that there would be no substantial progress for Negroes "if the labor movement were not a strong ally of their struggle."

Guinan, who heads the Transport Workers, further suggested that Randolph's Freedom Budget for All Americans "is the best answer to the racial and urban problems of this country."

He said "It is a call to rebuild our cities, to provide full and dignified employment for all of our citizens and quality education for all of our children, and to insure that each person will have adequate medical care, a decent home and enough to eat."

Pres. Salvatore Camelio of the Massachusetts State Labor Council and Pres. Thomas Poliscastro of the Rhode Island AFL-CIO reaffirmed their backing of the All Boston Labor Committee which sponsored the dinner and which works with the A. Philip Randolph Institute.

Among the committee's objectives are:

- To rally community backing for legislative programs that will aid black neighborhoods economically, politically and socially.
- To help black youths obtain jobs and training through Apprenticeship Outreach programs.
- To support legislation affecting the Negro-labor alliance through lobbies and petitions.

Bayard Rustin, director of the Randolph Institute, represented Randolph at the dinner. He urged the labor movement to get more deeply involved in the struggle for justice, noting that platonic support achieves little.

Fire Fighters Hail Bargaining Ruling

Fire Fighters Pres. William H. McClennan has hailed as a "tremendous victory for New Jersey's fire fighters" a court decision upholding the constitutionality of the state's Public Employment Relations Commission.

Superior Court Judge Robert A. Matthews, in upholding the law, also certified the election of IAFF Local 1066 as bargaining agent for fire fighters in Jersey City. The union won a PERC-ordered election by 399-17 vote.

The law setting up PERC, Matthews said, was in accord with a state constitutional provision giving public employes the right to choose their representatives in making known grievances. The provision was meant to protect the workers from "company unions," he added.

McClennan said the decision "clearly sets forth the principle that public employes have the right to choose real labor unions as their bargaining representatives."

Defeat the Surtax

"THE AFL-CIO will not support any extension of the surtax until it is combined with immediate, substantial and equitable reform of the federal income tax structure."

That's what the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared at its May 14 meeting. That's what the federation formally told the House Ways & Means Committee on May 22. And that's what we reiterate now, in the strongest possible terms, as the House prepares to vote on a surtax extension bill that does not include urgently-needed tax reforms.

The vast majority of Americans who are taxed in full on their wages and salaries are willing to pay their fair share of whatever is needed to defend our country and meet its needs.

But when wealthy individuals and profit-gorged corporations are able to escape full taxation through loopholes in the law, a surtax merely compounds injustice. There is no surtax on income that is not taxed in the first place.

The tax justice program advanced by the AFL-CIO would provide the revenue to meet the nation's most pressing needs and still have enough left over to provide needed tax relief for families with low and moderate incomes.

The decision congressmen will face in the next few days is whether to vote to perpetuate injustice—or to insist on tax justice.

Our position is clear. The present surtax bill should be defeated.

We've Been Warned

EMPLOYER GROUPS seeking to destroy the trade union movement know that the American people won't support union-busting when it is called by its right name.

So some years ago they dreamed up the outrageously misleading "right-to-work" slogan to describe efforts to outlaw the union shop. And now we find the U.S. Chamber of Commerce is beating the drums for what it calls "labor law reform."

Reform is a good word. But the Chamber's idea of reform is to repeal the National Labor Relations Act to eliminate what it considers the "naively utopian" concept that the government should "encourage" collective bargaining.

The Chamber wants to strip the National Labor Relations Board of virtually all its functions. It would write into law a virtual blank check for management and severe restrictions on unions.

As a first step, the Chamber has asked its businessmen members to use their "influence" with the Nixon Administration to get pro-management members appointed to the NLRB.

Its big goal, though, is the election of "reform-minded" candidates in the 1970 congressional election. By "reform-minded," the Chamber means congressmen and senators who will vote for anti-labor laws.

Let no one say we haven't been warned.

Southeast Asia Domino Theory Revived with New Creditability

By John P. Roche

OVER THE LAST FOUR YEARS, the domino theory has fallen into disrepute. At the present time, if anyone in our loftier intellectual circles suggests that the fall of South Viet Nam would have any consequences on neighboring states—that it would be the first in a chain reaction of falling dominoes which would leave the Communists dominating mainland Southeast Asia—he is greeted with cackles of derision. To say that someone accepts the "domino theory" is rather like accusing him of believing the world is flat.

In all fairness, the domino analogy has been overworked. John Foster Dulles, as Secretary of State, pushed it fairly hard, but unquestionably the greatest master of the game was Pres. John Kennedy. To him, Laos was the first piece and on one occasion he had the fall of that obscure nation triggering off a Red takeover all the way to the Middle East. Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., was somewhat less enthusiastic, but he still felt that "if Laos was not precisely a dagger pointed at the heart of Kansas, it was very plainly a gateway to Southeast Asia."

Now this was clearly an exaggeration. After the Laos agreement in Geneva in July, 1962—designed to protect that country's "neutrality and independence"—Hanoi simply continued to consolidate its hold on Laotian real estate until today on any realistic map we must paint a good two-thirds of it red.

In other words, there is no domino standing in Laos and it is doubtful if there ever was. Similarly, Burma is not an erect domino but an equilibrium of about seven insurgencies. Cambodia also exists because Hanoi has been too busy in South Viet Nam to dispose of Prince Sihanouk's trivial power.

Yet in its essentials the domino theory made sense in its assertion that if Communist imperialism was not checked in Viet Nam, it would overrun the whole area and shortly threaten the standing dominoes in Thailand and Malaysia. Thus the outcome of the war in Viet Nam must have a profound impact on the strategic balance in Asia.

The logic of our commitment was that the United States has a long-run interest in this balance, that—in another of John Kennedy's phrases—we want to help make the "world free for diversity." Not because we wish to run around the world playing cop, and certainly not because we hope to impose any particular economic system on mankind; the issue with Hanoi is that the North Vietnamese have been dispensing rockets and grenades, not copies of the "Communist Manifesto."

Our concern and action are founded on the admittedly unverifiable premise that stability in Asia is a vital component of American national interest.

Interestingly enough, this sophisticated version of the domino theory has recently received strong support from two widely separated but equally serious sources. The first is the Institute of Strategic Studies in London, a private research organization which has over the years developed an enviable reputation for the quality and objectivity of its analyses. While the institute has sponsored trenchant criticism of American tactics in Viet Nam, on the strategic level its recent study suggests that an American withdrawal would have disastrous consequences for the whole region.

THE SECOND BRIEF in support of modified dominoes comes from the New Yorker magazine's sensitive, experienced, and talented Asian correspondent, Bob Shaplen. Shaplen, who has spent the better part of the last 20 years in Asia, is incredibly knowledgeable.

In 1966, when I was working on Cambodia, I found an article of his in the New Yorker far more informative than all the highly classified documents gathered for me. (I created a bit of a bureaucratic tangle by stamping "Top Secret" on copies of this New Yorker and sending them around town in the requisite double envelopes.)

Shaplen has brought together his views in "Time Out of Hand: Revolution and Reaction in Southeast Asia" and—although no one can accuse him of blindly supporting our intervention—his position will bring no cheers from those who yap about the "vile and useless war."

While deploring our tactics, Shaplen thoroughly documents the thesis that we have bought precious time for the free development of other nations in Southeast Asia, for new ideas which "have been brought to life there and are now beginning to find mature expression." This is testimony that cannot be howled out of court.

Economics Downgraded:

Coalition's Stress on Esthetics Leaves Basic Needs Unsolved

The following is excerpted from an article by Gus Tyler, assistant president of the ILGWU, in the June 9, 1969, issue of The New Leader. The article, "Coalition of the Comfortable," is one of a series on the outlook for political liberalism.

THE TOPSY-TURVY sociopolitics that transforms the rich into liberals and the workers (especially blue collar) into conservatives, flows from an earlier theory which asserts that the struggle for riches in America has been replaced by a new conflict over spiritual goodies. Before the ADA Roosevelt Day Dinner in January 1967, Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., put it with his usual clarity. "The issues are no longer social and economic so much as they are cultural and moral," declared the distinguished historian and involved liberal. Then he went on to explain why:

"The New Deal program tackled the elemental tasks of the American people—a job, a suit of clothing, three meals a day, a roof over one's head and a measure of security for old age. Because the New Deal secured the basis of life for so many, contemporary liberalism has been able to move on to qualitative tasks—to measures, in other words, designed to improve the quality of life in an industrial society. These are the issues of civil rights, of civil liberties, of education, of urban planning, of the state of the arts and the beauty of the environment."

Schlesinger's historic premise is, of course, both accurate and pertinent. In the mid-30's, one-third the nation was "ill-fed, ill-clothed, and ill-housed." Thanks to the work of Roosevelt and Truman, these traditional "ills" plague only one-eighth the nation. But does this really mean the "issues are no longer economic"?

To begin with, the one-eighth thanks to population growth, is almost as numerous as the old one-third. And because millions of poor have in recent decades moved off the soil into the overpressurized cities, they are more discontented than the oppressed of 30 years ago. On top of that, the woes of the bottom, especially in the cities, are tinged with black and hence doubly incendiary.

But it would be a mistake to assume that the problems of poverty are restricted to the urban Negro. About three out of four of those officially listed as poor are in the "dominant" white community. In New York City (which is not part of Appalachia), white indigents outnumber black by three to two. And the whites who have moved out of poverty, thanks to the New Deal, would now like to live like the affluent—house with a backyard, kids in college, a few extra bucks for that bankrupting hospital bill.

Their expectations—like the expectations of the blacks after the passage of civil rights legislation—have risen. Indeed, in both races the desire is to get the green stuff needed for the good life.

None of this should come as any surprise to liberals—particularly if they come out of the radical tradition. Radicoliberalism was always more than a politicized Lady Bountiful, lifting bums off the floor and forgetting them once they learned how to stand erect.

A progressive movement with long-range social objectives does not count on losing its mass base once the worst is over, it assumes a steady drive until all enjoy both ease and income. Only in this post-economic utopia will men turn their prime attention to "the state of the arts," the "beauty of the environment," and the cultivation of culture.

TO SUGGEST that America has already reached this state of grace is to exaggerate the accomplishments of the New Deal and to understate the plight of some 80 percent of the population. It must be granted, of course, that since the 1930s, a fairly numerous new class of incomed intellectuals has developed, part of which draws spiritual and material sustenance from a primary involvement in the arts, the environment, education, urban planning, and other quality items. In their tight circle, public talk is more about beauty than the buck.

But as vocal and vital as this stratum may be, it is only a slight sliver of the nation. Most people—including the very rich—are profoundly concerned about money and social status that it often confers.

What has happened to some progressive ideologues in the last three decades is that, as they moved from radicalism to liberalism, they moved also from the Marxian to the anti-Marxian view of man. To Marx, man the political animal was, first of all, man the economic being. The new theories rest on man's etherial attributes. Hence, proponents of the "New Politics" end up with "movements" based not on class interest but on the literary inventions of the pundit.

The truth is that in shifting focus from economics to esthetics (though I personally prefer the latter to the former), the basic and burning need to redistribute the wealth of America is forgotten. Yet it is precisely this continuing maldistribution of income and wealth that has weakened the liberal coalition: turning workers against the taxes of the welfare state; poor against near poor; white against black; blacks against one another. To solve all this by substituting esthetics for economics is in effect telling the nation that if it lacks bread it should eat crepe suzettes.

The old coalition did and does make sense, because it rested on an ancient verity: the need to earn a living. The program of this coalition, of course, must be updated; its philosophy needs restating; its organization needs an infusion of new blood.

In that process, the liberal intellectual can play a role.

'The Union Is Going to Stay':

Hospital Strikers Determined To Win Battle for Recognition

THE CHARLESTON, S.C., hospital strike will go on until state officials agree to a settlement that will let the workers "live like decent human beings," a spokesman for the strikers declared.

"Someplace—somewhere—this has to end," said Sec.-Treas. Alvin E. Heaps of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, and the union is going to stay until it does, regardless of how long that may be. Heaps appeared on Labor News Conference, an AFL-CIO produced public affairs interview broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EDT, on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

He said that the state's hard-line refusal to grant the union recognition and the massive use of National Guard and state troopers have drawn national attention to what would otherwise have been a minor local dispute. He said that as many as 1,000 National Guardsmen have been called out at various times and that hundreds of state law enforcement officers have been assigned to the strike.

"It's costing the state a fortune just to deny these workers the right to union recognition," Heaps asserted. He said that the state's costs so far may have run as high as $750,000. The three-month dispute involves 600 union members at two Charleston hospitals whose average hourly wage is only $1.30. The strikers are members of RWDSU Local 1199 B.

HEAPS SAID that in addition to the direct expenditures on the strike, the union's boycott against Charleston merchants, which is supported by the "Negro community as a whole," is having a "devastating effect."

He noted that the hospitals are able to operate at only about half their bed capacity and that medical school graduates who would have interned in Charleston hospitals are taking posts outside the area.

Reporters questioning Heaps were Robert Walters of the Washington Evening Star and Stanley Levey of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

SINCE MOST AMERICAN citizens rely heavily on the postal service to maintain essential contacts with family, friends and in business, most of us have a vested interest in proposals to replace the Post Office Dept. with an autonomous, self-supporting government corporation.

Pres. Nixon has officially endorsed such an operation.

Most Americans have two basic concerns relative to the postal service: will it be a reliable, efficient service and what will be the cost.

The U.S. postal system has always been a federal service. The Continental Congress established postal services which replaced a colonial system set up by the British prior to the Revolutionary War.

And when the federal union was established a postal service was authorized in the Constitution with the single sentence: "The Congress shall have power . . . to establish post office and post roads."

Behind these actions a fundamental controversy arose: should the post office be a service for the American people or should it be a revenue-making, profit-making enterprise.

Some Federalists, particularly Secretary of the Treasury Alexander Hamilton, conceived that the post office would be a revenue-producing agency which each year would turn over to the Treasury a good proportion of its profits.

The Jeffersonians challenged this view. Their idea of a postal service was that any surplus should be used to extend the service and make it more efficient and better serve the people.

Jefferson and his supporters believed that the more profitable eastern routes would serve to support mail service in the frontier regions.

The postal service also played an important role in our highway system. The Constitution said that it was the federal responsibility to construct post roads. In 1801 there were 20,000 miles of post roads. By 1812 there were some 50,000 miles. It continued to zoom.

Over the years postal subsidies have assisted various forms of transportation—shipping, stage coach, waterways, railroads and airlines.

From the days of Benjamin Franklin, though, the prevailing American concept of a postal system was one which made possible distribution of the printed word, whether it be letter, newspaper, magazine or book. In a free society, it was felt, low-cost communications was essential in uniting the people.

Around the late 1830s the postal service ran into difficulties. It was costly and its efficiency left much to be desired. The railroads started skimming the cream off the top with private service.

THROUGH THE YEARS new services were provided the American people: free city delivery in 1863; special delivery in 1885; rural free delivery in 1896; postal savings in 1911 and air mail in 1918.

First class and later air mail pretty well paid for itself. Some of the other classes of mail—such as newspapers—performed essential services. And certainly business was being subsidized by third class mail.

During this period the Post Office Dept. went deeper and deeper in the hole. The American people were using the services of the department more than ever.

Few question the fact that the Post Office Dept. needs basic reform. Today the service is far below the standards of the past. The question that is facing the American people, though, is whether they should junk the entire system and institute a self-supporting postal corporation. It could well become a costly venture for the American people.

And it comes back to the basic issues fought out by the Jeffersonians and the Hamiltonians—should the postal system be a service for the people or a profit-making venture?

CHARLESTON'S hospital workers' strike won't end until state officials agree to a settlement that lets the workers "live like decent human beings," Alvin E. Heaps (center), secretary-treasurer of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, declared on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Robert Walters (left) of the Washington Evening Star and Stanley Levey of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers.

How to Buy:

Astute Shopping Needed Even With Truth-in-Lending Law

By Sidney Margolius

THE NEW TRUTH-IN-LENDING LAW, effective July 1, is probably the most important ever passed for your protection as a buyer. It finally ends the nationwide deception by which virtually all lenders and sellers made their finance charges sound lower than they really are, and misled many families into paying high credit fees.

That is, the new law will end this deception for you if you make it work for you. It will end this deception in your locality generally only if local authorities, labor unions, credit unions, co-ops and other community groups, and you yourself, help police it.

A survey by Robert Pullen for the Boston Federal Reserve Bank found most consumers were surprised at the amount of the true annual interest rate when it was brought to their attention. But they appeared to be satisfied when lenders and sellers explained that they paid the same amount in dollars as before.

Our advice is: Be surprised. Gasp. But don't be satisfied. The main value of the new national "truth" law is that for the first time you now have a simple yardstick to compare finance charges.

Up to now, different lenders and sellers stated their charges in different ways. A bank might say it was charging you $7 a year per $100 of the original amount of a loan. A credit union would say it charged 1 percent a month on the declining balance; a loan company, 3 percent a month; a department store, 1.5 percent a month. A furniture, appliance, or used car dealer might say he was charging $12 or $15 a year per $100 of your original balance.

Now here is how these different rates and ways of stating them translate into true annual rates:

- The 1 percent a month on the declining balance is the equivalent of a true annual interest rate of 12 percent. (The actual dollar charge would be $6.50 per $100.)
- The $7 per $100 is the equivalent of a true annual rate of about 14 percent.
- The 3 percent a month is a true annual 36 percent. (The dollar charge would be $19.50 per $100.)
- The department store's 1.5 percent a month on revolving charge accounts is a true 18 percent. (The dollar charge would be $9.75 per $100.)
- The installment or used car dealer's $12 or $15 per $100 on the original balance are approximately 24 and 30 percent true annual rates.
- The unscrupulous dealer's "1 percent a month" charged as 12 percent of the original amount, is really a true rate of about 24 percent. (The dollar charge would be $12 per $100.)

Now that the new law requires all lenders and sellers to tell you the true annual rate without any arithmetic on your part, it's easy to know who charges you the least. In the above examples, obviously it is cheaper to borrow the cash from a credit union and bank.

YOU CAN PAY anywhere from $32.50 to $81 in finance charges on a $500 loan or installment debt to be repaid in 12 months, depending on where you arrange it. On a larger purchase like a used car you can save hundreds of dollars on finance charge.

For example, if you buy a late model used car, and have a balance of $1,500, you may pay a dealer a finance charge of $10 per $100 of debt. If you take three years to repay, your total finance charge is $450. But if you borrow the cash for the car from a credit union or bank, your cost will be in the neighborhood of $6.50 per $100, or a total of $292 for the three years.

If you undertake to repay in two years, your finance charge, at the $6.50 charge, totals $195. Thus if you went to the lower-rate source, and increased your monthly payments by $16 to pay off in two years, you would save a cool $250.

One loophole we want to warn you about. The Federal Reserve Board regulations for truth in lending, which could be a little better than they are, require dealers and lenders to include in the annual rate any charges for credit life insurance or other insurance if this is a condition for giving you the credit.

But some loan companies and installment sellers press you to buy such insurance without saying openly that they won't grant the loan otherwise. If they do, go elsewhere.

Also watch out for other extras such as late payment charges, fees for preparation of a deed, high charge for a credit report, and high closing fees for a mortgage.

Mushroom Farm Local Files Sex Bias Charge

West Winfield, Pa.—A directly-affiliated AFL-CIO local union has charged the Butler County Mushroom Farms with illegally discriminating against women workers.

The union filed a formal complaint with the federal Equal Employment Opportunity Commission after the company refused to promote Nancy J. Hopper to a higher-paid job for which she was qualified. The job went to a man with less seniority.

The company based its action on a dual seniority system which the union said kept all 548 women workers in the lowest pay grades and limited higher-grade jobs to the 238 men workers.

When Nancy Hopper bid for the job, the grievance committee of Mushroom Growers Local 21954 backed her up.

The union's officers and AFL-CIO Field Rep. Victor A. Mills obtained an opinion from Thomas E. Harris, the AFL-CIO's associate general counsel, that the dual seniority provision discriminated on the basis of sex in violation of the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

After the company refused to act on the grievance and to negotiate changes in the contract, the union filed the complaint with EEOC.

Safety Council Course:

Enrollments Grow In Defensive Driving

THE NATIONAL SAFETY COUNCIL'S nationwide Defensive Driving Course, designed to curb the traffic death and injury toll, is currently at its highest levels.

By the end of 1967, 600,000 drivers had been through the course and more were being graduated at a rate equivalent to a million per year.

The training course in defensive driving is a capsulized version of the professional driver training programs the council's Motor Transportation Dept. has developed for motor fleet operators.

Drivers in fleets that are council members last year had an average accident rate that was approximately half that of all drivers in the country.

The Defensive Driving Course usually consists of four two-hour sessions. They are taught by instructors trained and qualified by the NSC.

The course is designed for the average motorist who wishes to improve his driving. The only prerequisite is a driver's license.

The sessions concentrate on the six situations that can cause a two-car crash. In 1966, two-car crashes accounted for 42 percent of all traffic fatalities, 68 percent of all disabling injuries, and 78 percent of all property damage accidents. This type of accident also accounted for 72 percent of total motor vehicle accident costs and involved 87 percent of the drivers who were in accidents.

Over the years, the council's Motor Transportation members have made sharp reductions in two-vehicle crashes. It is estimated that, if their rates could be achieved by all drivers, the two-car crash would decline by 40 percent.

The motor fleet operators' chief method of attacking this problem has been built around the question of whether the accident could have been prevented by the company's own driver. If he could have prevented it and didn't, he is held accountable even though he may have been legally "in the right."

DRIVERS ARE TRAINED to reach their destinations safely despite mistakes of other drivers or adverse road, weather, light, traffic or driver conditions. This concept, called defensive driving, is the heart of the council course.

The sessions are being presented across the country in small groups under the sponsorship of church organizations, labor unions, service clubs, employers and military installations.

Volunteer instructors—trained by the council—present the course, utilizing films, visual aids, and training techniques provided by the council. Understanding of defensive driving principles is built up as students analyze actual accidents.

Soup to Nonsense:

Jury Duty Brings Out Decency In People Despite Prejudices

By Jane Goodsell

I WALKED DOWN the steps of the courthouse, noting with some surprise that I felt nostalgic. My term as a juror was over, and I didn't want it to be. I was leaving regretfully the world I had entered so hesitantly four weeks ago. It had seemed then as strange and intimidating as a new school.

Now, a month later, it had become my world. I had learned its language, and become intrigued with its procedures. I could speak with the authority of a connoisseur, comparing lawyers' performances and rating judges. I had picked up, and passed on, gossip and rumors. I had been an insider, but no more. Today was my last day.

Jurors are not expected to be extraordinarily perceptive, wise and knowledgeable. They are, after all, amateurs at their task—"12 persons of average ignorance" as they have been called. They are merely expected to listen attentively, and to exercise intelligence, sound judgment and complete impartiality.

Something happens to people when they find themselves on a jury that makes them fairer and more intelligent than they really are. They develop a heightened sense of decency, of doing as they'd want to be done by. It is partly the conditioning process which takes place during the questioning of jurors when they are asked to search their souls for prejudices and past experiences which might influence them in judging the case.

It is also a desire to look good to one's fellow jurors. Nobody wants to be thought a dimwit or a bigot, even if he is one.

ALL OF WHICH is not to say that juries don't make mistakes. I've no doubt that some of the verdicts with which I agreed were miscarriages of justice. It didn't happen because we were unfair or malicious or stupid, but because we didn't know better. I believe this is most true in awarding damages.

Still, if we made mistakes, we did not make them rashly but conscientiously. Not a one of the seven juries I sat on rushed to a verdict.

If you ever get a chance to serve on a jury, jump at it. Not only because it's your duty as a citizen, but because you owe it to yourself not to miss it. You'll learn a little about law, quite a lot about people, and not so incidentally, a few things you may not have realized about yourself.

Illegal Union-Busting:

J.P. Stevens Rapped In 7th NLRB Ruling

J. P. Stevens & Co. has, for the seventh time, been found guilty of violating the legal rights of employes to join or form a union of their own choosing.

The latest finding against the big textile firm—a major government contractor—was by Robert E. Mullin, trial examiner for the National Labor Relations Board. Mullin found after five days of hearings that officials "at every level" of Stevens' Gulistan plant at Statesboro, Ga., joined in a campaign of threats and firings to defeat the Textile Workers Union of America.

He recommended that Stevens be ordered to bargain with the union on the basis of cards signed by a majority of employes, and also because management illegally smashed the union's majority and caused it to lose an election.

The examiner ruled, subject to NLRB review, that Stevens must reinstate three fired union supporters with full backpay to the date of their discharge; employ a woman whose job application it rejected because her brother and brother-in-law were union members, and pay her for all lost time. The company also would be directed to:

- Mail a copy of the NLRB order to every plant employe.
- Post copies in conspicuous places for 60 consecutive days.
- Read the order to all employes during working time, by departments and shifts, or let a board agent do so.
- Give the union and its representatives reasonable access to bulletin boards for a one-year period.

TWUA Pres. William Pollock said that Stevens has unsuccessfully fought every examiner's decision in the seven litigated cases, every NLRB order and every decision that has reached the courts. It has been compelled in addition to pay nearly $1 million to date to workers it has fired in violation of the law.

The latest findings against Stevens stem from charges of anti-union actions during a TWUA organizing campaign at Statesboro 17 months ago.

The union applied for recognition on the basis of signed cards in February 1968 and was turned down. It applied again in March, after more employes had been signed, and again its request for recognition was refused. Stevens insisted on an election, whose result was later set aside by the NLRB regional director because the company refused to provide an employe name-and-address list, as it was legally required to do.

Said the examiner in his ruling: ". . . from the outset of the organizational campaign until after the election, every level of the [company's] supervisory hierarchy was involved in numerous . . . acts of interference, restraint and coercion."

The company's insistence on a board election, the examiner ruled, was motivated "not by a good faith doubt" of the union's majority but rather by a desire "to gain time within which to destroy the union's majority."

The NLRB's right to issue a bargaining order in such circumstances has been upheld by the Supreme Court in four other cases. (See story, Page 1).

In April, the NLRB asked that Stevens be cited for contempt of court for refusing to comply with two previous orders of a federal appeals court to stop interfering with employe rights at other plants. A decision has not been announced.

TRADE UNIONIST STUDENTS join in "The Hymn of the Americas," a patriotic salute to all the Latin American nations, to celebrate graduation from the American Institute for Free Labor Development's 26th training course at Front Royal, Va. Graduates will enter the education field in their respective unions in 17 Latin countries.

AIFLD Graduates Face Challenge Of Job Crisis in Latin America

The graduating class of the American Institute for Free Labor Development's 26th training program was exhorted by AFL-CIO Inter-American Rep. Andrew McLellan to use their talents to meet the challenges of unemployment in their own countries.

In Latin America the employment situation is crucial, he said, because 50 percent of the total population lives outside of the money economy, mainly in rural areas.

"We are living in a period of upheaval, of tremendous social and economic problems—but there are solutions," McLellan told the 27 Latin American trade unionist graduates.

As an example of positive problem-solving, he cited the success of Colombia in offsetting the job deficit caused by 195,000 people each year entering a labor force that can absorb only 8,000 to 10,000 into jobs. In-depth economic studies performed through a coordinated effort by labor, business and government leaders resulted in new jobs and an upgrading of skills.

Certificates of graduation were presented to unionists who came from 17 Latin countries to spend six weeks in the Advanced Teacher Training Course at AIFLD's Front Royal, Va., Institute.

They also took field trips to Cuernavaca, Mexico, to West Virginia, New York, Cleveland, Pittsburgh, and Williamsburg, Va.

Class Valedictorian Javier Cruz Ruiz of the Textile Workers' Union of Mexico, cautioned that "we workers cannot allow ourselves the luxury of ignoring the innovations of modern technology. Similarly, labor education has undergone changes and it is necessary to be familiar with new methods and their application in order to bring about better communication between trade union leaders and their local organizations."

Ruiz exhorted his classmates to use the new skills learned through AIFLD to "bring about a raising of the standard of living, solidarity, and harmony among the peoples of America" to attain liberty, peace and work.

These goals were echoed by AIFLD Executive Director William C. Doherty, Jr., recently returned from Geneva where he explained the AIFLD to delegates at the 50th anniversary conference of the International Labor Organization.

In bringing AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany's greetings to the graduation luncheon audience, Doherty recalled the AIFLD's formation in 1962 with the purpose of creating "a bond of solidarity and friendship between the two Americas, North and South," in order to eliminate poverty and suffering from our hemisphere.

Through self-help projects in such fields as cooperatives and housing and through its educational work in trade unions, Doherty noted, the AIFLD has since served as the "operating arm of the workers." It has, he said, shared the AFL-CIO's goals of "strengthening the free trade union movement voice" and solving the "great problems of poverty, racial discrimination" and the emerging ones as we enter "a great technological age."

Osvaldo Troppoli, Argentinian graduate, presented to the AIFLD faculty "living memorials" to the common goals of the workers of the two Americas. These are two Chinese holly trees, newly planted by the 1969 graduates on the Front Royal campus.

Foreign dignitaries in attendance included Romulo Marinho, labor adviser to the minister of labor of Brazil, and Richard Ishmael, senior vice president of the Guyana Trades Union Council.

Students in the class came from Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, El Salvador, Honduras, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama, Peru, Puerto Rico, Uruguay, and Venezuela.

In eight years the AIFLD program has trained more than 100,000 trade unionists in 20 countries of Latin America, with more than 700 labor leaders graduating from the Front Royal Institute.

Carpenters Sign Landmark Contract On Factory-to-Site 'Instant Housing'

tractor who does not hold a working arrangement with the Carpenters.

Pres. M. A. Hutcheson of the Carpenters said: "This contract represents a major step forward in the challenge of meeting our tremendous housing needs. It is a real beginning of business and labor joining hands to provide the mighty weapon of private enterprise to help resolve the housing crisis."

Housing & Urban Development Sec. George Romney voiced similar comments as he appeared for the announcement of the contract signing.

The contract covers specifically the jurisdiction of the Carpenters, who handle about 25 percent of the work at the Stirling on-site construction projects. Members of other building craft unions perform the remainder of the on-site work.

Hutcheson said that the Carpenters do not expect any jurisdictional problems with other trade unions. Although there is no national agreement with the other crafts, union labor is maintained throughout, reported Theodore W. Kheel, New York-based mediator and a director of Stirling. Kheel was instrumental in the contract negotiations.

The company is prepared to negotiate a national contract with other crafts for the on-site work if needed, Kheel added.

The new contract supplements a three-year industrial pact the Carpenters signed last September to cover assembly line workers at Stirling's Avon factory which mass-produces the "instant housing" modules.

Similar pacts are expected for module factories that Stirling plans to build in Akron, Ohio, and in New England.

The Carpenters also hold industrial contracts with about 150 other companies that manufacture prefabricated components for the home building industries.

Although they are members of the Carpenters union, the assembly line workers do not qualify as journeymen because of their semi-skilled status.

The "instant housing" concept employed by Stirling translates assembly line techniques into the manufacture of housing components. The modules are built from the floor up, with wiring, plumbing, windows and even carpeting included.

Erection of the housing units on the sites involves several building crafts, which ready the site and lay foundations. The modules containing the completely finished rooms are fitted into place and the plumbing and wiring are connected.

About 200 manhours of work are needed to completely erect a housing unit with the modules, substantially less than in conventional home construction.

Building costs employing the modular construction concept normally run about 20 percent less than conventional construction, according to Stirling.

The first of the training centers to be set up under the contract will be opened within six months near Rochester, N.Y., it was announced by Hutcheson and David Stirling, Jr., president of the company.

The firm currently employs 150 production line workers but expects to enlarge its workforce to 1,000 as demand increases.

In Akron, where the company has already built 400 units in a $28 million project for the Akron Metropolitan Housing Authority, several hundred workers will be hired for the planned module factory. The Akron Metropolitan project will total 1,500 units when completed.

Red Cross Board Elects Keenan

Atlanta—Sec. Joseph D. Keenan of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers was elected a member at large of the American Red Cross board of governors at the organization's convention here.

Keenan, also an AFL-CIO vice president, is the latest in a succession of union officials to serve on Red Cross national boards going back to 1923 when Samuel Gompers was a member of the organization's board of incorporators.

In recent years, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler and Clothing Workers Pres. Jacob Potofsky have served terms on the board.

Glass Workers Vow to Resist Cheap Imports

Chicago—A pledge to continue efforts to resist the importation of cheap handmade glassware and unfair competitive prices was made by the 400 delegates to the 87th convention of the Flint Glass Workers here.

The resolution on imports noted that each year finds fewer people employed in the handmade glassware industry, and that "it is necessary to find thousands of new jobs each year to maintain the high economic standards to which we are accustomed. . . ."

Rep. John Dent (D-Pa.) earlier said that the glassware industry was the first hit by foreign imports and is still the most vulnerable. He said, "Anybody can make glass."

Another resolution called for elimination of loopholes in the federal tax structure and urged cooperation with the AFL-CIO in its drive to win tax reform in Congress.

The convention also featured regional and craft division meetings to set contract goals and work on other craft problems.

Health Hazard Cited at Struck Vaccine Plant

Denver—The Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers have appealed to the Health, Education & Welfare Dept. to withdraw a license to manufacture Rubella vaccine issued to a strikebound Merck, Sharp & Dohme Corp. plant at West Point, Pa.

The union struck the Pennsylvania plant and other plants of the company several months ago after it was unable to negotiate an agreement to provide improved working conditions.

This is so, Grospiron pointed out, because plant operation is being carried on by "inexperienced white collar employes" since experienced quality control workers are on the picket line.

Noting that it is possible for "improperly prepared" drugs to slip out under even ideal conditions, the OCAW president added that "it should be obvious that no struck plant should manufacture and market a sensitive vaccine."

The union, Grospiron said, was "appalled" to learn that more than 650,000 doses of the vaccine had left the struck plant. He also deplored the fact that HEW has failed "to consult our union in these circumstances."

Massachusetts Social Workers Choose SEIU

Boston—The Service Employes won bargaining rights among 2,200 Massachusetts state social workers in an election conducted by the state Labor Relations Board. The vote was 1,171 for SEIU Local 509, no union 44, three other unions 327 and challenged, 147.

SEIU's election victory, by a 70 percent margin, climaxed a long organizing campaign including a march on the State House. More than 1,000 social workers petitioned Gov. Francis W. Sargent (R) for correction of grievances.

The governor's aides conferred with a marchers' group headed by Local 509 Pres. Paul Quirk. The workers had not been paid for travel expenses and overtime for months, and frequent requests for an election had been shunted aside, they said.

The governor later approved steps to meet the backpay obligation and agreed to a June election.

Hotel Union Grant Fights Leukemia

Patients suffering from acute leukemia will benefit from an $8,000 contribution by the Hotel & Restaurant Employes Union to the Hematology Research Laboratory of the University of Cincinnati College of Medicine.

This is the third year the union has aided in the treatment of patients through grants to the university. Since treatment was initiated through the union funds, the number of patients surviving for longer periods has been doubled, the research laboratory reported.

The patients benefiting from the research are adults with advanced acute leukemia. Most of these patients would not live more than two or three months without the treatment, the university said.

REJECTION of a bill to give antitrust exemption to newspapers that merge their advertising, circulation and business departments was called for by Executive Vice Pres. William J. Farson of the Newspaper Guild in testimony before the Senate Antitrust & Monopoly Subcommittee. With him is James Cesnik, left, ANG's assistant director of research and information.

Dailies Opposed in Bid To Escape Trust Laws

Newspaper publishers are using "myths" and "erroneous" premises in seeking antitrust exemption for papers with merged advertising, circulation and business departments, the executive vice president of the Newspaper Guild told Congress.

William J. Farson, testifying in Senate Antitrust & Monopoly subcommittee hearings on the Newspaper Preservation bill, said the claim is "erroneous" that failure to grant the antitrust immunity will make it impossible for more than one newspaper to survive in 23 U.S. cities.

Farson called for rejection of the "broad and unnecessary" antitrust exemption embodied in the bill. He cited the growth of the newspapers' market areas since they began the joint publishing arrangements—by as much as 1,153 percent—and publishers' statements that the greatest economies come from sharing a common printing plant.

Farson noted that the Supreme Court in March upheld a lower court order that a joint publishing arrangement in Tucson be restructured to eliminate profit pooling, price fixing and market splitting. The Guild leader pointed out, however, that joint publishing ventures restricted to printing and distribution facilities have not been banned.

The Knight newspaper chain is in a joint operation with the Cox chain in Miami, Pulitzer with Newhouse in St. Louis and Hearst is a joint operator with the Chronicle in San Francisco, Farson told the Senate hearing.

"Which one of these chains," he asked, "could with a straight face plead the failing enterprise defense?"

"We fail to find documentation," he said, "that these (23) joint operations were undertaken only when there was no other means of sustaining publication of more than one newspaper in these cities."

Another myth, Farson said, is the claim that publishers have agreed not to compete for circulation and the advertising dollar and to share their profits only because they want to maintain separate editorial voices in their cities.

Yet, he pointed out, jointly operating publishers own and operate broadcasting stations in 12 of those 23 cities, television stations in eight. If they are really interested in a diversity of voices, they ought to sell these stations, he suggested.

Farson also cited agreements between jointly operating publishers specifying that one paper "won't be printing more news than the other."

The bill under consideration is a slightly amended version of one called the Failing Newspaper bill which failed to pass the 90th Congress. It would grant antitrust exemptions to partial newspaper mergers involving a paper which, "regardless of its ownership or affiliations, appears unlikely to remain or become a financially sound publication."

Scheduled to testify at later hearings are Thomas E. Harris, AFL-CIO associate general counsel; John J. Pilch, president of the Typographical Union; and Richard W. McLaren, chief of the Justice Department's Antitrust Division.

In Orders to Bargain:

cates the AFL-CIO's organizational position" in recent years stressing the authorization card as a "substantive part of the organizing process."

Chief Justice Earl Warren wrote the unanimous Supreme Court decision affirming the Boston court ruling and returning the Richmond cases to the latter court for further proceedings.

Four Cases Settled

The three Richmond cases concerned Meat Cutters Local 347 and the Gissel Packing Co. plant at Huntington, W.Va.; Heck's Inc., warehouses in Charleston, W.Va., its retail store in Ashland, Ky., and the same Meat Cutters local along with Teamsters Local 175; and the Upholsterers at High Point, N.C., for employes of the General Steel Products, Inc.

The fourth case involved two wire weaving plants of the Sinclair Co. in Holyoke, Mass., and Teamsters Local 404.

Warren wrote that, while "the most commonly traveled route for a union to obtain recognition" is through an election, and while it is also "from the board's point of view the preferred route," a union is not limited to an NLRB election.

Almost from the inception of the Wagner Act, the opinion noted, "it was recognized that a union did not have to be certified as the winner of a board election" to win bargaining rights. It could "establish majority status by other means—by showing convincing support, for instance, by a union-called strike or strike vote, or as here, by possession of cards signed by a majority of the employes authorizing the union to represent them for collective bargaining purposes."

"We have consistently accepted this interpretation of the Wagner Act and the present act, particularly as to the use of authorization cards," the opinion continued.

In each of the three Richmond cases, the union got signed authorization cards from a majority of the employes and asked for recognition as the legal bargaining agent. All three employers refused to bargain, the court related, "on the ground that authorization cards were inherently unreliable indicators of employe desires; and they either embarked on, or continued, vigorous anti-union campaigns that gave rise to numerous unfair labor practice charges."

In each case, the NLRB's response was an order to the employers to bargain, and a finding that the employer's refusal to bargain was motivated "not by a good faith doubt of the union's majority status, but by a desire to gain time to dissipate that status."

Warren added that, in each case, the board found all three employers had engaged in restraint and coercion of employes—"in Gissel, for coercively interrogating employes about union activities, threatening them with discharge and promising them benefits; in Heck's, for coercively interrogating employes, threatening reprisals, creating the appearance of surveillance, and offering benefits for opposing the union; in General Steel, for coercive interrogation and threats of reprisal, including discharge."

In the Holyoke case, the board found the company president's appeals to reject the union were unlawful and caused the union to lose the election. Also it ruled that the company had no good-faith doubt of the union's majority, based on application cards, and campaigned to break that majority by unfair tactics.

Employers Rebutted

Refuting employer arguments that they cannot win any cardcheck dispute under present NLRB rules, the court said "an employer is not obligated to accept a cardcheck as proof of majority status, under the board's current practice." Reasonable polling of his employes is allowed, it noted.

"If an employer has succeeded in undermining a union's strength and destroying the laboratory conditions necessary for a fair election," need to violate a cease-and-desist order by further unlawful activity. The damage will have been done, and perhaps the only fair way to effectuate employe rights is to reestablish the conditions as they existed before the employer's unlawful campaign."

The Chief Justice wrote "there is, after all, nothing permanent in a bargaining order, and if, after the effects of the employer's acts have worn off, the employes clearly desire to disavow the union, they can do so by filing a decertification petition."

An employer is free, Warren declared, "to communicate to his employes any of his views about unionism . . . or a particular union so long as the communications do not contain a threat of reprisal or force or promise of benefits."

The employer "can easily make his views known without engaging in 'brinkmanship.' At the least he can avoid coercive speech simply by avoiding conscious overstatements he has reason to believe will mislead his employes."

Lumber Unions Reach Contracts for 80,000

Portland, Ore.—Unions representing 80,000 Northwest lumber workers agreed on terms of new and improved three-year contracts and sent out mail ballots for a ratification vote ending June 30.

Negotiators for the Woodworkers and the Lumber & Sawmill Workers, affiliated with the Carpenters, called the settlement "the best ever reached in the forest products industry." They negotiated jointly with individual employers and associations for a set of identical goals adopted by conventions of the two union groups last winter.

The settlements, if approved, provide an immediate classification wage increase of 5 cents to 40 cents an hour for experienced workers; general increases on top of the formula increases; raises in differentials, woods travel pay and jury duty pay; one more paid holiday—Dec. 24—in 1970, and new vacation provisions with a top of four weeks after 20 years' service.

The unions and the employers agreed also that 10 cents an hour will be added to the health and welfare fund next Nov. 1, with another 5-cent raise on Sept. 1, 1970.

The general increases take effect in three steps: 30 cents an hour retroactive to June 1, and two more raises of 6 percent each next June 1 and June 1, 1971.

Classification adjustments start at 5 cents an hour for those earning at least $3.15 an hour and rise to 40 cents for those at $3.90 an hour and up—a formula applying to most of the covered employes, the unions said.

By June 1, 1971, the top rate for skilled woodsmen will be $5.17 an hour, they reported.

The terms have been agreed to by the Timber Operators Council, the Northwest Forest Products Association, and major employers including Weyerhaeuser, Crown-Zellerbach, Georgia-Pacific, International Paper, Potlatch Forest, U.S. Plywood-Champion, St. Regis Paper, and Rayonniere-ITT. Similar terms are being offered nearly 200 other employers in Oregon, Washington, Idaho and Northern California, according to the unions.

City Workers Gain 5% in Baltimore

Baltimore—Blue collar employes of the city of Baltimore voted overwhelmingly to accept their first contract with the city government. It provides an increase of 15 cents an hour, or 5 percent of salary—whichever is greater—and other gains for 15,000 municipal employes.

The new one-year pact was negotiated by Local 44 of the State, County & Municipal Employes. Its terms were accepted also by the Classified Municipal Employes Association and the Maryland Nurses Association.

The wage hike, effective next Sept. 1, is the second 15-cent hike negotiated by Local 44 within a year.

Growers' Front Breaks:

definitely hurting. It is costing us more to produce and sell our grapes than we are getting for them. We do want to work out this situation in a fair and equitable manner."

Steinberg and another large grower, John Kovacevich, are co-chairmen of the group offering to negotiate with the union.

While hailing the offer, union officials said that the strike and boycott will be lifted only when the contracts are signed.

At a press conference here, Larry Itliong, assistant director of UFWOC, declared:

"We stand ready to meet immediately. We intend to bend every effort in the very best of good faith to reach a quick agreement.

"We commend these growers for their action in finally recognizing their responsibilities in dealing with their workers. They have demonstrated courage, because they will be subject to scorn from certain fellow growers who are determined to destroy the union at all costs."

The breakaway group had scarcely made its bargaining offer public when it was confronted with heavy pressure from other growers to get back into line.

E. Alan Mills, vice president of the California Grape & Tree Fruit League, set the tone with the declaration that "The rest of the growers remain absolutely determined never to submit to Chavez's outrageous demands. . . . We are united in seeking an equitable national legislative solution to the problem."

Martin Zaninovich, president of the South Central Farmers Committee representing most Kern County growers, declared: "Every solid agricultural organization in California remains against demands of a committee which does not represent the true grape-picker and never has been able to call a strike."

Grower organizations have persistently claimed that farm workers don't want or need a union, despite the fact that in the few representation elections that have been held workers voted overwhelmingly for the Farm Workers union.

UFWOC's Pete Velasco, coordinator of the "second front" strike in the Coachella Valley reported that 1,000 new members had left their jobs and certified that they were on strike since the current grape season opened.

In announcing the offer to bargain, Steinberg noted that growers generally have viewed Chavez and the union as "social revolutionaries" out to break the farmers. He said, however, that he and his associates believe that direct talks are essential.

In an apparent attempt to head off negotiations, Allan Grant, head of the California Farm Bureau Federation, flew to the Coachella Valley to rally opposition to the union. And on another front, Charles B. Shuman, president of the American Farm Bureau Federation, said in Chicago that he has asked U.S. Atty. Gen. John N. Mitchell to investigate the grape boycott to determine whether the union is engaged in a "conspiracy in restraint of trade."

Meanwhile, the big publicity firm of Whitaker and Baxter—retained by the growers to wage a propaganda war against the union—charged that a "spread of terror tactics" had hit the valley.

UFWOC insists, however, that the "terror tactics" are being directed against its members, three of whom were arrested when they refused to vacate their beds in the farm labor camps. The union said the camps are surrounded by 24-hour guards and workers are virtually under "house arrest."

AFL-CIO FARM WORKERS announced at a Los Angeles press conference that 10 major California growers of table grapes have agreed to negotiate with them. From the left, Vice Pres. Dolores Huerta, Assistant Dir. Larry Itliong and Counsel Jerome Cohen of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee; AFL-CIO Organization Dir. William L. Kircher and Irwin DeShetler, the federation's farm organizing coordinator.

'Twin Plants' on Mexican Border Displace Thousands of U.S. Jobs

A program supported by the U.S. government has displaced tens of thousands of U.S. workers by moving their jobs across the Mexican border where a man's labor comes as cheap as 35 cents an hour.

An AFL-CIO organizer, David T. Lopez, tells what this has meant in terms of perpetuating poverty on both sides of the border.

Writing in the June issue of the AFL-CIO's magazine, the American Federationist, Lopez documents the steadily increasing flood of runaway plants.

Under the so-called Border Industrialization Program, American firms receive special tax and tariff concessions when they set up a plant in a zone 12.5 miles deep along the Mexican border. "Twin" plants on the U.S. side of the border are supposed to "finish" the products, thus qualifying them for reduced tariffs.

Lopez writes that "finishing could mean little more than pasting on a label. Many plants on the U.S. side hire Mexican residents anyway. Attempts to organize are met by threats to move the rest of the operation to Mexico. And for every job supposedly established on the American side, at least 10 jobs are being set up in Mexico and often at the direct expense of American workers."

He gives some examples:

- The "twin" plants of Transitron employ about 75 workers on Laredo, Tex., and some 1,500 in Nuevo Laredo, on the Mexican side of the border.

And when Transitron opened its plant in Nuevo Laredo, a similar operation of the same company in Kansas City, Mo., lost about 45 percent of its work force.

- The Rubber Workers represent employes at two Los Angeles area plants of the Mattel toy company. But since Mattel opened a toy plant in Mexicali in 1967, some 820 union workers at the City of Industry plant lost their jobs and the Hawthorne plant has also cut its work force heavily.

- Two shrimp processing plants organized by the Meat Cutters in Texas have laid off more than 1,000 workers since similar processing plants opened just across the border.

Lopez notes that products made in large part across the border "not only are not labeled, but often are hard to trace."

He cites as an example television sets sold by Sears Roebuck which are bought from Warwick Electronics in Chicago, which initially subcontracted the work to a Tijuana, Mexico, plant.

He points out that Kayser-Roth has its Catalina-brand sportswear cut at two small plants in California and Arizona—but the sewing is done at a larger operation in Mexicali.

U.S. electronic firms operating in Tijuana include Litton Industries, Control Data Corp., and Fairchild Camera. In all, some 48,000 U.S. jobs in the manufacture of radio and television sets and components were lost from 1966 to 1968.

Lopez notes one estimate that eventually some 300,000 workers will be employed by the border industries, with production of $1 billion of goods a year.

A curtain of secrecy helps shroud the border operations from public exposure.

The plants set up across the border "are as easy to inspect as the Chinese Communist atomic plants," Lopez comments. He reports that photographers seeking to take in-plant pictures have been denied permission to enter the plants and chased away by guards.

A query from the Texas State AFL-CIO to the chairman of the U.S. section of the border development commission was answered by the State Dept. some five months later.

"Unfortunately," the reply went, "most of the information you requested is unavailable to us."

Despite the low wages, Lopez writes, "the promise of new jobs acts like a magnet to attract thousands of families from the Mexican interior to the already overcrowded Mexican border cities."

What jobs are available are mostly for women—who are estimated to make up at least 75 percent of the workers at the runaway plants. "Now you see many wives working while their husbands are unemployed."

Legally and illegally, the poverty-driven stream of workers continues. And wherever there are workers struggling to better their lot, to use the tool of organization to improve their wages and conditions, there are the others, just a little hungrier, available for exploitation.

Labor's Goals Stressed In Virginia Campaign

Norfolk, Va.—Delegates to the Virginia State AFL-CIO convention here spelled out a legislative program and called for an all-out political effort to elect candidates who will support labor's goals.

The convention, speaking for 70,000 union members in the state, put a high priority on passage of a minimum wage law for workers not covered by the federal wage-hour legislation. Large numbers of "willing and able workers," the convention said, are unable to earn a decent living "because of the low wages they receive."

Another resolution called for state legislation establishing the right of public employes to collective bargaining.

Delegates gave a cheering, standing ovation to State Sen. Henry E. Howell, Jr., the labor-endorsed candidate for governor in the Democratic primary next month.

Howell, leader of the liberal bloc in the state legislature, told the convention that collective bargaining is the only "civilized way" to improve conditions of workers. He pledged efforts to bring "quality jobs, paying quality wages" into Virginia instead of low-wage employers seeking cheap labor to exploit.

Delegates extended for an additional five-year the State AFL-CIO's Program of Progress, which includes a dues assessment dedicated to legislative, voter registration and political education activities.

They heard Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.) call for continued efforts to remove all barriers to participation in American government.

O'Hara urged direct election of the President and urged extension and strengthening of the federal Voting Rights Act "until the last vestiges of racial discrimination in voting have been eradicated."

A resolution adopted by the convention called on Congress and the legislature to put an end to tax loopholes and repeal "unjust tax laws which ultimately place the burden on those who can least afford to pay."

Pres. Julian F. Carper and Sec.-Treas. Brewster Snow were both re-elected without opposition and delegates voted each a $1,000 salary increase to bring them up to $11,500 a year.

A three-way contest for the non-paying post of vice president was won by Marvin W. Wallace of American Bakery & Confectionery Workers Local 358 in the Portsmouth-Norfolk area. The office had been vacant since the death of Fred R. Conner.

The convention voted labor endorsements for 18 candidates for the state legislature and for Andrew J. Miller, running for state attorney general, in addition to Howell.

Court Overrules House In Unseating Powell

The Supreme Court ruled that the House violated the Constitution by refusing to seat Adam C. Powell in the 90th Congress.

In a 7-1 decision, the court said Powell should have been allowed to take his seat because he met the only requirements set down in the Constitution—age, citizenship and residency.

Congress has the constitutional right to expel a member, the Supreme Court noted. But it said there is a distinction between expulsion, which can only come after a member is seated, and exclusion.

Left open for lower courts to decide is the issue of whether Powell is entitled to back pay for two years he was denied his seat.

The New York Democrat, who had been chairman of the House Education & Labor Committee, was seated this year after agreeing to pay a $25,000 fine levied by the House. He had originally been denied his seat on charges he had misused committee funds and had reflected discredit on Congress by defying court orders in New York.

The Supreme Court ruling set the stage for a possible confrontation between the judicial and legislative branches of government—if at some stage there is a court order instructing the House or its staff to take some specific action such as back pay or restoration of seniority.

Attorneys for the House had argued that, since the Constitution makes each house of Congress the judge of the qualifications of its members, the courts had no power to intervene.

At the federal appellate court level, Judge Warren E. Burger upheld the House argument and ruled against Powell. Burger, who will soon succeed Earl Warren as Chief Justice, was overruled by the court over which he will preside.

The issue of Powell's seniority would not directly affect the question of his lost committee chairmanship, since it is only custom that assigns the chairmanship to the senior member of the majority party.

The actual decision is made by the party caucus, which even before Powell's exclusion had voted to strip him. Rep. Carl D. Perkins (D-Ky.) is the current chairman. Powell is a member of the committee at the bottom of the Democratic seniority list.

Asks 'Meaningful' Reform:

Labor Spurs Drive To Kill Surtax Bill

that had been strongly urged by the AFL-CIO.

Despite these features, labor is opposing the bill because it "makes no attempt to close any of the loopholes by which many millionaires and other wealthy people completely escape taxation."

It continues "a surtax which has been layered onto an inequitable tax system that is badly in need of overhaul."

Nothing in the committee bill attacks "the inequities of oil and mineral depletion allowances, capital gains, real estate double depreciation, tax-exempt bonds and other tax-avoidance devices."

Those who benefit by tax loopholes won't be paying any surtax on their exempt income. Workers whose income comes from wages will be paying at a higher tax rate than last year, but there won't be any percentage increase for "corporations which have enjoyed record-shattering profits."

Union members are as "fiscally responsible" as anyone else, Biemiller noted, and ask only that the burden of taxes not rest disproportionately on wage-earners while the wealthy escape their fair share.

"Repeatedly," over the past months, the AFL-CIO "asked Congress to consider extending the surtax only if it were accompanied by meaningful tax reform."

But "at the end of four months of hearings and closed-door deliberations, the House Ways & Means Committee has produced nothing more than a tax increase and has severely diminished the likelihood of tax reform."

Because of this failure, Biemiller said, "it is the AFL-CIO position that this bill be defeated."

Normally, tax bills come to the House floor under a "no amendment" rule, with one recommittal motion allowed to a ranking minority member of the committee.

Opponents of the committee bill have indicated that they will seek to persuade the Rules Committee to allow them to introduce a substitute bill or make the recommittal motion.

Top Administration officials, from the President down, have tried to build support for the tax extension by portraying it as the key element in the fight against inflation.

While the Administration has also proposed some token tax reforms, it made clear its belief that tax reform should be put on a back burner and top priority given to extension of the surtax.

Unless Congress should enact either a long-term or a temporary extension, the surtax will expire on June 30. It could, of course, be reinstated retroactively. Supporters of tax reform on the Ways & Means Committee had urged a short-term extension to permit the committee to develop a comprehensive package that would include major loophole-closing provisions.

In other congressional developments:

- The Senate voted its own budget-cutting rider on a House-passed appropriations bill. After assorted exemptions, no one seemed very sure of how it would work but the intent appeared to be to force a cut of $1.9 billion in the President's budget.

Included in the bill, however, is a repeal of the freeze on government employment enacted by Congress last year. A convincing argument was made that the freeze cost more than it saved by requiring heavy overtime payments and through taxes that went uncollected because of a shortage of tax-collectors.

- The House overwhelmingly approved a three-year extension of the Older Americans Act, with increased federal financing authorized for an assortment of services and programs to help persons over 65. It also would provide expense reimbursement for elderly volunteers who contribute their time to community service projects.
- The House approved a committee bill slightly strengthening the health hazard warning required on cigarette packages—but extending for another six years a prohibition against stiffer action affecting cigarette advertising by federal or state regulatory agencies.

'Bring It Back Down!'

States Urged to Affirm Public Employe Rights

State laws should firmly establish the right of public employes to union representation and meaningful collective bargaining, the AFL-CIO told the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations.

The commission, made up of federal, state, city and county officials and private citizens, is considering a staff report which poses an assortment of alternative approaches to state legislation.

The alternatives range from a mandatory commitment to collective bargaining in the public sector to a toothless grant of "permission" for local governments "to meet and confer with employe organizations."

AFL-CIO Legislative Representatives Clinton Fair and Kenneth A. Meiklejohn said the bargaining procedures should be flexible enough to permit unions and public employers to work out solutions to complex problems. It should offer a variety of approaches to avoid strikes—but affirm the right to strike when all procedures have been exhausted.

Similar views were expressed in testimony before the commission by Thomas R. Donahue, executive secretary of the Service Employes, and in a statement from Pres. Jerry Wurf of the State, County & Municipal Employes.

Some of the most bitter struggles in public employment have been fought to establish the right of public workers to union recognition and collective bargaining, Wurf noted. "Disputes over recognition are responsible for more strikes in public employment than any other single issue," he said.

Donahue urged the commission members not to "take the path of least resistance" and recommended that public employes be barred from striking.

"The right to strike is what brings reality to negotiations," he said. "It is that right which turns conversations into discussions, and discussions into bargaining, and bargaining into agreements with which parties can live in harmony for a number of years at a time."

The basic AFL-CIO testimony stressed that labor does not object to requiring a series of steps to seek a settlement before a strike can take place, including mediation, fact-finding and the offer of voluntary binding arbitration.

But only in the case of law enforcement officers, the AFL-CIO said, should there be a flat ban on striking as a last resort.

The AFL-CIO suggested that a state law establish a single labor-relations agency for public employes, comparable to the National Labor Relations Board and separate from mediation and fact-finding activities.

Dues Checkoff Urged

Public employers and unions should be permitted to negotiate union security provisions as well as a dues checkoff, the federation said. And where a union has exclusive bargaining rights because it represents a majority of employes in the unit, "that organization alone should have the exclusive right of dues checkoff."

The labor witnesses stressed that it is appropriate and desirable to have state and federal minimum standards dealing with wages and working conditions in public employment, with the parties free to improve on those minimums through negotiations, just as unions and employers do in the private sector of the economy.

Fair, who presented the AFL-CIO testimony, cited the hospital workers' strike in Charleston, S.C., and the highway workers' dispute in West Virginia as evidence of the bitter antagonism to union organization by many public employers.

Neither of these strikes would have been necessary, he noted, if there had been effective union recognition and collective bargaining legislation in those states.

Federal Aid Urged for City Health Units

The Yarborough bill, he said, is in line with an AFL-CIO Executive Council statement urging that the Hill-Burton program provide federal assistance "for the development of complete health services and not just health facilities."

The Yarborough bill would increase the amount of grants for construction and modernization of health facilities—including neighborhood health centers and outpatient facilities. Outpatient funds should be raised even more, Biemiller suggested, to $100 million annually rather than $40 million. The present level, and the amount proposed in the House-passed bill, is only $20 million.

A key change in the Yarborough bill is the addition of priorities for low-income areas and other criteria to enable urban areas to compete more successfully with rural sections for hospital funds.

The legislation also would raise the federal share of construction costs for projects that offer the likelihood of reduced health costs through shared facilities among hospitals and health centers.

In federal health subsidies, Biemiller suggested, "Congress should put the hospitals on notice that they may no longer expect public funds in support of inefficient operations. We see no reason why inefficient hospitals should expand."

Biemiller cited a report of the National Advisory Commission on Health Manpower noting huge differences in costs among hospitals of similar size and quality.

Nixon Issues Directive Hiking Federal Pay

Pres. Nixon has ordered pay raises for 2.3 million white collar classified and postal employes of the federal government. The increases, effective July 1, average 9.1 percent for the white collar workers and 4.1 percent for postal workers.

Nixon set the pay boosts in an executive order issued as the final step under the 1967 Pay Reform Act, passed by Congress with the intent of bringing federal salaries in line with those paid in private industry.

Under the law, the Bureau of Labor Statistics surveyed private industry wages and sent the data to the Civil Service Commission and the Budget Bureau. These agencies then made their recommendations to the President.

The President's authority to change pay rates by executive order expires with this pay increase. He has asked Congress for legislation to extend the authority indefinitely.

Under the new pay scale, white collar employes under civil service will receive from $3,889 a year (for a beginning file clerk or messenger) to $33.495 a year (for a top-rank official heading a government office or bureau.)

Letter carriers and postal clerks —who constitute three-fourths of the Post Office Dept.'s 600,000 employes—will be getting an average salary of $6,794 a year.

Along with an across-the-board increase of 12.5 percent in military pay, also set by Nixon, it was estimated that the annual payroll costs of the government would be increased by $2.8 billion by the new pay schedules.

A number of federal employe unions look upon the increases as inadequate. They contend that the BLS data is more than a year old, and does not sufficiently take into account private industry pay raises, nor higher living costs.

The AFL-CIO Government Employes Council, made up of 34 unions, charged that the pay raises "fall miserably short" of congressional intent of achieving comparability with private industry rates.

The council cited specific grades in which workers would still not receive wages commensurate with those paid by private firms. It pledged to seek congressional action "to remedy the Executive Branch's failure to meet legislative policy."

Ads Running Dry In Hearst Paper

Los Angeles—Seagram and Calvert distillers announced plans to shut off the Hearst Herald-Examiner—to the cheers of 2,000 striking and locked-out newspaper unionists.

The two distillers said they will discontinue advertising in the Hearst paper when scattered ads still pending under contracts have run, reported William J. Farson, executive vice president of the Newspaper Guild.

Farson said negotiations continue with five other advertisers to pull out of the Herald-Examiner, which has been publishing with the aid of professional strikebreakers for 18 months.

Rail Unions Back Plan for Pensions at 60

A bill to provide full pensions for male railroad workers at 60 after 30 years service has received the backing of rail labor. At present, female railroad employes may retire under these conditions.

Pres. C. L. Dennis of the Railway & Airline Clerks, who also is chairman of the retirement committee of the Railway Labor Executives Association, called upon workers to "rally behind" the amendment to the Railroad Retirement Act.

He described the legislation, introduced by Rep. Dominick Daniels (D-N.J.) as a step in "our continuing efforts" to improve the benefit payments of the railroad retirement system. These efforts, he added, must lead to other badly needed improvements.

"There is no logical reason why men should be denied retirement benefits now provided in the law for women workers," Dennis said. "To fail to equalize this situation is to extend an unfair discrimination against the male sex."

Showdown Set on Surtax, Reform Pressure Mounts

Food Stamp Aid Doubled By Senate

The Senate took a big first step to expand the food stamp program so that more needy families can escape hunger and malnutrition.

It voted to more than double the amount of money authorized for the program—a rise from the $340 million ceiling in the present law to $750 million for the fiscal year starting July 1.

Of at least equal importance, the Senate Appropriations Committee added the full $750 million to an Agriculture Dept. money bill. Senate Agriculture Committee Chairman Allen J. Ellender (D-La.) had urged that this be done, even though the Nixon Administration's budget request was only $610 million.

The Agriculture Committee still has before it legislation to expand and reform the food stamp program, making it available under less stringent rules to poor people throughout the nation — not just in the counties that choose to participate.

Ellender's announced reason for moving ahead with the higher food stamp money authorization bill is to have increased funds available for use by the time Congress completes action on food stamp reform.

Some observers saw another motive also in the two-bill technique. It seems that Ellender's counterpart in the House, Agriculture Committee Chairman W. R. Poage (D-Tex.), has been doing some worrying about where the votes are coming from to continue the present farm subsidy program.

He told a back-home farm audience recently that congressmen from city districts just "don't understand" farm problems.

Poage is expected to combine food stamp legislation with a farm subsidy extension as a vote-catching maneuver in the House.

On another farm issue, the Senate faces a controversial vote on whether to go along with the House and impose a $20,000 limit on the amount of subsidy that could be paid to any single farmer or corporate farm. It tacked the limit on an Agriculture Dept. appropriation bill.

The Senate Appropriations Committee deleted that provision. But an effort to restore it is likely to be made on the Senate floor.

The House "economized" on a multi-billion dollar appropriations bill by cutting more than $384 million from Pres. Nixon's budget request for the model cities and urban renewal programs. The slash was

Price Climb Continues at Slower Pace

Consumer prices climbed less sharply last month, but the real spendable earnings of workers continued to lag below levels of a year ago.

The Consumer Price Index rose three-tenths of 1 percent in May, considerably less than in the previous two months, although enough to put it 5.4 percent above May 1968.

Real spendable earnings—take-home pay adjusted to take account of price increases since the 1957-59 base period—averaged $78.23 for the worker with three dependents in May. This was five-tenths of 1 percent above April, but three-tenths of 1 percent below a year ago.

The Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics reported that the May Consumer Price Index was at 126.8 of the 1957-59 base period.

Higher costs of food, clothing and consumer services of all kinds were reflected in the May index rise, the bureau said.

Mortgage interest charges continued to climb, but at a slower rate. Home repairs and housekeeping services cost more and rents continued a steady increase. Charges for medical care services also were up again, but less sharply than in recent months, the Labor Dept. economists noted.

Food costs were boosted by higher prices of meats and several fresh vegetables. Seasonally adjusted, food prices have climbed nearly 2 percent in the last three months—with meats, poultry and fish up 4.5 percent.

Apparel prices continued their surge, increasing eight-tenths of 1 percent in May. Women's clothing

Extension Foes Force Vote Delay

By David L. Perlman

Demands for loophole-closing tax reform mounted in Congress as House leaders and the Administration prepared for a new try to push through a bill continuing the 10 percent surtax.

A liberal revolt, encouraged by a nationwide labor campaign for tax justice, forced House leaders to abandon their timetable for a June 25 vote on the surtax extension bill.

A head count by party leaders found they didn't have the votes.

The first announcement was that the vote would be put off until after the July 4th holiday recess. But then the White House prodded House Republican Leader Gerald R. Ford to bring recalcitrant GOP congressmen into line. After a closed door Republican caucus, Ford promised to deliver 170 votes for the bill and a vote was scheduled for June 30th.

A Democratic supporter of the surtax, Rep. Hale Boggs (D-La.), suggested another reason for holding the vote before the recess. If congressmen go back to their home districts for the holiday, he was quoted as saying, "they're not going to see many people who are going to urge them to vote for it. We'll be better off getting over this hump."

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller immediately wired the federation's affiliated unions and central bodies urging them to counter the pressure being brought on congressmen to go along with the surtax bill.

While House Democratic leaders were allied with the Administration on the issue, the Senate Democratic Policy Committee unanimously called for adoption of "meaningful tax reforms."

The policy committee declared that "any proposal to extend the income tax surcharge" should "be

Roll-Back Urged:

Interest Rate Boost Called Threat to Jobs

The "public be damned" interest-rate hike imposed by the nation's biggest banks threatens to spin the United States into a recession, the AFL-CIO warned.

"High interest rates mean lost jobs," AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nathaniel Goldfinger told the House Banking Committee. "They hit construction first and hardest, but the effects spread."

The price rise forced by the higher cost of money gets passed along to the consumer and pushes up "the price of everything we buy."

Even before the latest sharp rise to 8.5 percent in the interest the banks charge their biggest and best customers, most families had been priced out of the home-buying market. And, Goldfinger added, with interest rates shooting up rents as well, "decent housing is being put out of the reach of even middle-income working people."

He urged the Administration and Congress to "take every possible action to seek a roll-back of the prime interest rate."

And he called on the Justice Dept. to probe the "monopolistic price-fixing action" of the big banks in almost simultaneously raising interest rates to determine if the anti-trust laws have been violated.

Goldfinger stressed that the rise in the prime interest rate from 7.5 to 8.5 percent—the highest level in the nation's history and the biggest single increase ever imposed—was not a one-time action.

It was the fifth interest-rate increase since last December—a 31 percent rise in the cost of money in less than a year. And already, he noted, "there is talk of another rise in the prime rate."

New York Teachers Reach Early Accord

New York—The United Federation of Teachers, AFL-CIO, reached contract agreement with New York City on a package of improved benefits and sent the terms to a referendum vote among 55,000 classroom employes on the last day of school.

The tentative settlement was reached more than two months before expiration of the present agreement.

It is a three-year pact, on which the city and union came to terms without discord. Roadblocks in the way of settlement were removed when the state legislature passed a new school decentralization bill and Mayor Lindsay restored cuts he had previously scheduled in the school budget.

The city school system has 1.1 million pupils. Its new contract with the teachers, if ratified, goes into effect Sept. 8, first day of the fall school term.

Terms of the tentative pact were announced on the steps of Gracie Mansion, the mayor's residence, by Lindsay, Pres. Albert Shanker of the union—Local 2 of the American Federation of Teachers—and Board of Education Pres. Joseph Monserrat. It provides:

- Raises of $2,650 to $2,800 a year over the term of the contract.
- Retirement on pension at age 45 after 20 years of service at an actuarially reduced benefit. The current contract permits early retirement at 55 after 25 years.

Federal Workers Open Drive for Labor Law

AFL-CIO unions representing more than 1 million government workers opened a drive for a Federal Employe Labor-Management law that would provide collective bargaining machinery and an independent board to arbitrate disputes.

The legislation has been introduced in the House and Senate at the request of the AFL-CIO. It was drafted by a committee of six unions and departments in cooperation with the AFL-CIO Dept. of Legislation.

It "represents the unanimous view of the AFL-CIO unions in the federal government field," AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller said in letters to the chairmen of the House and Senate Post Office & Civil Service Committees.

The drafting committee included representatives of the Government Employes, Letter Carriers, Postal Clerks, AFL-

'GOOD GUYS' IN WHITE HATS from Communications Workers Local 6222 in Houston tool through the streets of Kansas City in their "Little Red Car." Aboard the restored 1930 Model A Ford is CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, who is being taxied to Kansas City Convention Hall for a session of the 31st annual CWA convention.

Based on Year-Long Study:

CWA Adopts Uniform Code To Govern Contract Votes

Kansas City, Mo.—Adoption of a new, uniform code governing contract presentation and ratification marked the windup of the Communications Workers annual convention here.

The action came in acceptance of a report following a year-long study by a rank-and-file committee of 18 members, two from each of CWA's nine geographic districts. The study, ordered by last year's CWA convention, focused on the problem of getting adequate information to members across the country in time for them to vote on proposed agreements.

Another highlight of the week-long convention was the delegates' vote to reject a proposed separate fund for organizing. The proposal would have established the fund through a 50-cent monthly per capita increase beginning Jan. 1, 1970, with 15 of the 50 cents earmarked for return to each local engaging in external organizing projects.

The issue of contract presentation and ratification takes on special significance for CWA when the bargaining unit involved is the pace-setter in the union's system of pattern bargaining with the Bell Telephone System.

One constitutional amendment was necessary when the convention accepted the committee's recommendation of a secret ballot for ratification votes, regardless of whether the vote is conducted by mail or at local meetings.

While mail balloting was called adequate for non-strike situations, the committee judged the minimum time necessary for a mail vote to be three weeks. Thus recommendations were made on voting in local meetings to speed the balloting in strike situations.

In that connection, each member in the affected bargaining unit is to be mailed a copy of the final bargaining report besides the one available at the local meeting.

In other areas of contract presentation and ratification, the committee recommended a news blackout during negotiations but not after a tentative agreement has been reached; retention of the executive board's authority to determine when the national pattern has been set; postponement of strike action when tentative agreement is reached hours before a strike deadline, but continuation of a strike until ratification if it is already in progress at the time of agreement.

The committee's report rejected a separate membership ballot on local critical items over and above the national pattern.

The convention also heard a report of another record for CWA in its contributions to COPE for the 14th consecutive year.

For the six months of 1969 prior to the convention, COPE contributions totaled $163,289, or $34,305 more than in the same period last year. Also, 355 CWA locals were honored at the convention for attaining 100 percent of their quotas of $1 per member, compared to 280 a year ago.

The COPE record was achieved even though 1969 is an "off" year lacking the political excitement of 1968. Several CWA districts made a renewed effort, however, with a COPE drive dedicated to William A. Smallwood, who retired this spring as CWA secretary-treasurer after a 13-year term in which he directed the union's COPE drives.

In the competition for COPE leadership among CWA districts, Vice Pres. Arthur B. LeFevre was honored for the 71.2 percent of quota fulfilled by District 5 (Illinois, Indiana, Wisconsin). That barely edged the 71 percent collected in District 8 (Rocky Mountain states), which had won the award for six straight years.

A convention resolution in support of the efforts of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee was accompanied by a passing of the "Huelga Hat" among CWA delegates, which netted $2,604 for the farm workers and the grape boycott.

Other convention resolutions called for:

- Improvement in automobile insurance, specifically the elimination of the costly and time-consuming process of proving "fault."
- Organization of CWA Retired Members Clubs and their affiliation with the National Council of Senior Citizens to strengthen legislative and other activities on behalf of senior citizens.
- Continuation of Operation South America, through which each CWA district contributes to a specific Latin American project.
- Uniform national voting laws, including the vote for 18-year-olds and removal of restrictive and conflicting registration laws that vary from state to state.
- Replacement of the electoral college with direct, popular election of the President and Vice President of the United States.
- Adoption of a national education policy to guarantee every citizen, without cost, all the education he has the ability to absorb and perseverance to pursue.
- Expanded consumer protections, including rejection of the Uniform Consumer Credit Code in its present form.

N. Y. Teachers Reach Tentative 3-Year Pact

- Reduction of the salary progression schedule from 14 years to eight; and a new supermaximum of $16,950 a year for experienced teachers with extra educational credits.
- Establishment of 10 more schools in the union-sponsored More Effective Schools program, raising the total to 21 schools where intensive services and smaller classes are provided for disadvantaged children.

The city agreed to a union proposal to establish "early childhood centers" at 50 or more schools for children aged 2.5 to 5. The centers would serve residents of poverty areas, and the children of teachers who the union hopes will return to teaching a few years after maternity.

The UFT is asking members, in voting on the proposed terms, to waive any claim on an extra $10 million of possible contract benefits so the schools may use the funds for more effective schools in deprived neighborhoods and for the early childhood centers.

Lindsay called the settlement "historic" in that agreement was reached before the close of the school year—an achievement the union long has sought.

Monserrat said a "vital factor" in reaching agreement was the city's restoration of $86 million to the school budget. This was made possible, all parties agreed, by the cooperation of city, school, state and federal authorities in easing the city's financing problems.

Beginning salaries will go from the present $6,750 a year to $7,950 in the first year of the new contract, to $8,450 in the second year and to $9,400 in the third.

Top salaries will be raised from the present $11,150 after 14 years of service to $12,500, $13,000 and $13,950 at yearly intervals, the latter figure to be reached after eight years of service.

Two years ago, union members stayed away from schools for 14 days to win an acceptable contract. Last year its members withheld their services for 36 days until Lindsay and school officials agreed to enforce the contract to protect teachers against groups of militants invading their classrooms in so-called decentralized schools.

The local has paid a high price for insisting on its members' rights against punitive measures allowed under the state's Taylor Act, which prohibits strikes of public employes. Last year the union was fined $220,000 and its president was sentenced to pay $250 and serve 15 days in jail for refusing to work until grievances were adjusted.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council set up a special fund in February to demonstrate labor's support for the union and launched a nationwide fund drive with a contribution of $100,000 toward the fine.

Douglas Prize Supports Summer Training Aides

The Joint Apprenticeship Program of the Workers Defense League and the A. Philip Randolph Educational Fund is putting to use $1,000 of the 1969 Murray-Green Award funds to aid ghetto youngsters.

The program was designated by former Sen. Paul H. Douglas—recipient of the $5,000 AFL-CIO award—for a portion of the prize money.

The money will be used to hire two Negro college students to gain experience this summer in the workings of the labor movement and in the operation of apprenticeship training programs.

Douglas will be kept abreast of the progress in the new project associated with the training program that is bringing about a positive change in the lives of many ghetto youngsters, the joint committee reported.

Three other groups designated by Douglas to receive the Murray-Green funds are the Hyde Park Neighborhood Club of Chicago, $1,000; the Lakeshore Trust Fund, $2,000, and the Consumers' Federation of America, $1,000.

The Murray-Green Award is presented by the AFL-CIO in memory of William Green, who was president of the AFL, and Philip Murray, who led the CIO.

Exploitation of Child Labor Lingers Despite Federal Compliance Effort

A 14-year-old nurse's aide worked up to 12.5 hours a day in a nursing home.
Busboys 13 to 15 years old toiled in a restaurant as much as 58.5 hours a week.
A lumber company employed boys as young as 9 years old to do clean-up work in a mill.
A 15-year-old girl worked from 10 p.m. to to 7 a.m. as a dry cleaning plant assembler.

These are not selections from labor history in the 19th Century. They are documented abuses as recent as a year ago from a study by the Wage & Hour and Public Contracts Divisions of the Labor Dept. They are violations of child labor regulations under the Fair Labor Standards Act.

The study reported that in 77,000 investigations during fiscal 1968, a total of 14,117 minors were illegally employed. This, however, marked an improvement from a year earlier when 60,000 investigations uncovered 18,536 abuses.

Some of the violations come under the 1966 amendments to the FLSA which extended coverage of the law and included types of industries where youths are often employed, such as restaurants, hotels, laundries and hospitals.

The same amendments provide the Secretary of Labor with authority to declare certain occupations hazardous to minors under 16.

But violations in agriculture dropped to 1,555 in fiscal 1968 from 4,201 the year before, the Labor Dept. notes in the pamphlet "Working Children—A Report on Child Labor—1967 and 1968."

Violations of the child labor provisions under FLSA fall into three major categories:

- Minors under 16 working in occupations for which a 16- or 18-year minimum age has been established; working in excess of the hours permitted for children of that age, or working at times not permitted.
- Minors 16 and 17 working in nonagricultural occupations declared hazardous by the Secretary of Labor, for which an 18-year minimum age is declared.
- Minors under 16 working in agriculture during school hours or in hazardous agricultural jobs for which a 16-year minimum age applies.

The report observes: The child labor standards provided in the Fair Labor Standards Act and state child labor laws do not prohibit the employment of 14- and 15-year-olds, but are an attempt to safeguard children—too young to speak for themselves—from being employed in occupations detrimental to their health and well-being and which interfere with their opportunities to obtain an education.

The study found that 7,719 youngsters were employed in violation of the 17 hazardous occupation orders in effect in nonagricultural jobs in fiscal 1968. There were 10,547 violations in the same areas a year earlier.

These include regulations prohibiting children under 16 from being truck drivers, freight elevator operators, roofers' helpers and from operating power saws or meat grinders.

Accident reports reveal the danger of children operating power equipment. Here are a few:

- A 16-year-old had his arm amputated by a meat grinder.
- A 13-year-old was killed when his head was crushed by an elevator he was operating.
- 14-year-old was maimed while working on a milk truck.

From a list of farm accident reports, 27 children in one year were injured by tractors in one state. Eleven of these injuries were fatal.

Other farm accidents affecting children included an 8-year-old boy who was suffocated under a load of wheat in a grain bin; two 6-year-old boys who were injured—possibly permanently—when their hands were caught in a harvester, and a 15-year-old who bled to death when his arm was torn off by a grain auger.

In efforts to gain compliance with child labor laws, the Labor Dept. filed legal actions in 130 cases in 1967 and 99 in 1968.

Cites New Procedures:

U Thant Praises ILO On Rights Protection

Geneva—United Nations Sec. Gen. U Thant applauded the International Labor Organization on the occasion of its 50th anniversary for having devised "new procedures for the protection of fundamental human rights."

Its "unique composition" of workers, employers and governments has enabled the ILO "to pioneer in formulating human rights, including such fundamental rights as freedom from forced labor, freedom of association and freedom from discrimination," Thant said.

The Secretary General's address was the highlight of day-long ceremonies formally marking the 121-nation ILO's establishment by the peace treaty ending World War I.

After the second world war the ILO became affiliated to the UN as one of its specialized agencies. The link was to make the ILO a "source of strength to the whole UN system," Thant told the nearly 2,000 persons in the assembly hall of Geneva's Palace of Nations.

The UN leader had special praise for the ILO's tripartite structure because it enables the labor agency to "make a special contribution to the process of bringing society as a whole into the momentum of organized international cooperation."

Lord Collison, a British labor peer, stressed the key role played by Samuel Gompers, first president of the American Federation of Labor, in the establishment of the ILO.

Speaking for the worker delegates to the golden jubilee conference, Collison recalled at the ceremonial sitting that it was under the chairmanship of that "great American trade union leader" that a special commission at the peace treaty negotiations drafted the ILO constitution.

David A. Morse, ILO director general similarly underscored Gompers' historic role by saluting AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany at the banquet that concluded the day's celebration as the "direct descendant of our founder." Meany is attending the three-week session at the head of a team of advisers to U.S. Worker Delegate Rudolph Faupl, a Machinists international representative.

During his speech Collison also stressed the tripartism built into the ILO by Gompers and the other far-sighted labor leaders who helped found the organization with its goal of social justice everywhere.

The workers, he said, were determined to have this tripartism extended to the ILO's new program for expanding employment opportunities.

"We want to make sure," Collison explained, "that in both the planning of projects and their implementation employer and worker representatives are consulted by governments at all levels."

The watch-dog role of ILO worker delegates in the defense of human and trade union rights was illustrated when Collison rose during one of the conference's regular plenary meetings to denounce the Moroccan government.

Referring to the sentencing to a year's imprisonment of Abdelkader Awab for a speech he made as Moroccan worker delegate to last year's conference, Collison said: "We can only look upon such behavior with disgust and contempt."

Collison, a veteran of ILO meetings, had the assignment of speaking for the worker delegates as a group because Swiss trade union leader Jean Moeri, their titular chairman, was presiding over the session as the first worker conference president in ILO history.

Meanwhile, the conference pushed ahead with its regular business by voting a $61.5 million budget spanning the years 1970-71. It is the first two-year budget to be adopted by the ILO under a new long-range planning program. For 1969 alone last year's conference approved a budget of $27.5 million.

Work was also completed on the drafting of international standards for labor inspection in agriculture that member governments will be called upon to observe in accordance with their ILO obligations.

Prepared by a committee on which Peter Fosco, president of the Laborers, upheld U.S. labor's views, the standards demand the establishment of a corps of independent labor inspectors wherever such a body does not already exist for agriculture.

The inspectors' assignment would be to make certain that farm workers fully enjoy all the rights granted them by law regarding working conditions, pay, vacations and related questions.

Federal Mediators Press Grape Talks

Los Angeles—A top team of three federal mediators continued to seek a contract breakthrough in the California table grape strike and boycott.

Meeting almost daily in the Federal Building here with representatives of the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee and 10 prominent growers, the mediators reported "some progress" toward a settlement of the 3½-year-old dispute.

Dolores Huerta, UFWOC vice president, said she "was hopeful and optimistic" that a contract would be signed soon.

The group of 10 growers from the strike-locked Coachella Valley and Arvin areas of the state, meantime, were under increasingly heavy pressure from virtually all the big agro-business interests to break off the peace talks with the union headed by Cesar Chavez.

Sen. George Murphy (R-Calif.), an outspoken foe of Chavez and the boycott, almost succeeded in breaking up the peace talks before they even got started June 20.

He charged that the 10 growers were "in collusion" with the union and demanded that the Federal Mediation Service investigate.

Murphy fired off his "collusion" charge after the group of growers announced its decision to negotiate with the workers despite bitter protests from the bulk of the farm owners.

But Edwin Scott, western regional director of the Mediation Service, quickly refuted the senator's charge, declaring:

"Based on information given us, there is no evidence of any collusion. In fact there are many serious problems to be resolved before a settlement could possibly be reached."

The 10 growers, who produce about 15 percent of all California table grapes, were the first to admit that the boycott was hurting, and that it was time to sit down and negotiate a contract.

Other farm leaders, though, continue to scoff at the boycott as a failure and vow they'll never yield to what they call "Chavez's outrageous demands."

Mike Bozich, president of the Desert Grape Growers League, told Mrs. Huerta that he would do everything in his power to "break up" the grower committee that has agreed to negotiate.

Gov. Ronald Reagan, meanwhile, lashed out at attempts by the union to gain recognition from the growers as "immoral" and "attempted blackmail."

Reagan supports the same kind of federal legislation proposed by Murphy to cover farm workers. It would ban strikes at harvest time and prohibit any boycott of farm products.

Other federal mediators involved in the unprecedented talks are Gilbert Seldin, troubleshooter for the agency from Washington as a personal representative of Director J. Curtis Counts, and Joseph Vierra, a Los Angeles-based mediator.

Meantime, more than 1,000 grape pickers continued on strike in the Coachella Valley with more walking out of the fields every day, the union reported.

Labor Urges Environmental Quality Agency

The AFL-CIO urged Congress to establish by law a federal agency to deal with problems of natural resources and the quality of the environment.

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller told the Senate Interior Committee that Cabinet-level Environmental Quality Council set up by Pres. Nixon is a commendable effort to deal with the problem.

But he questioned whether such a part-time group would be able to find the time to develop the programs and safeguards needed to prevent "irreversible" destruction, pollution and waste.

CLC Reaffirms Boycott Support

Ottawa, Ont.—The executive council of the Canadian Labor Congress reaffirmed its support of the farm workers' strike for union recognition. The council advised CLC's 1.6 million members that the boycott of California grapes should be "not only maintained but intensified."

The council acted, it said at a meeting here, because of the high-pressure public relations campaign by employers to cause confusion. It said "there is absolutely no reason why these employes" of the growers "should not be accorded the same rights" as any other employes.

Price Increase Slows, But No Trend Is Seen

—especially skirts, dresses and bathing suits—showed the biggest increases. Men's suits, shoes and shirts also were marked up.

The only significant decline in prices last month was a 3.5 percent drop in used car prices, BLS said. But used cars had been marked up sharply earlier in the year.

In the past three months, the report said, the CPI has risen at a 7.2 percent annual rate, slightly less than the three-month average advance of 7.6 percent recorded a month earlier.

Although the consumer price indicators rose slower in May than in previous months, assistant BLS commissioner Arnold Chase cautioned that this does not make a trend.

"There is still pressure on prices," he added.

Preliminary estimates by BLS show wholesale prices increasing four-tenths of 1 percent in June, bringing the index to 113.2. In April, wholesale prices rose two-tenths of 1 percent.

Gross weekly earnings increased to $113.55 in May, a gain of $1.50 from the April level and $6.86 from the year-ago month. The advance was attributed to a 2-cent rise in hourly earnings and a gain of one-tenth hour in the workweek.

About 173,000 workers will receive cost-of-living pay increases based on the May Consumer Price Index, the BLS reported.

They include some 73,000 meat packing workers who will receive 8 cents an hour more because of changes in the national index between November 1968 and May 1969.

Approximately 27,000 aerospace workers will receive an increase of 5 cents an hour and 20,000 tobacco workers will get a 2-cent increase based on a quarterly review and the national CPI.

Mass Arrests Follow Hospital Strike Curfew

Charleston, S.C.—New arrests of striking hospital workers and their supporters followed state action in reimposing a dawn-to-dusk curfew on this port city of 75,000 persons.

More than 1,000 pickets have been arrested since the Medical College Hospital fired 12 employes last Mar. 17 and 500 others walked out in protest there and at Charleston County Hospital. State and county officials have balked ever since at negotiating with the strikers' union, Local 1199B of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union.

Reimposition of the curfew led to renewal of protest marches by the strikers and their supporters, and mass arrests by city police, state troopers and National Guardsmen.

More than 80 of the protesters are in jail on charges of marching without a permit. They have refused bail and food to emphasize their objection to the state's interference with the right of peaceful picketing and orderly assembly.

Leading the group is the Rev. Ralph D. Abernathy, head of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, one of many church and civil rights organizations supporting the battle of the hospital workers for union recognition and a contract agreement.

Abernathy was charged with inciting to riot and held in $50,000 bail.

Strike leaders have urged the community here to protest peacefully and to keep pressing hospital leaders and state officials to end their refusal to meet with the union.

A prospective settlement of the dispute fell apart when Dr. William McCord, director of the Medical College Hospital, withdrew an offer to settle and won the backing of hospital trustees for his reversal.

Strike leaders charged the settlement was torpedoed by the intervention of Sen. Strom Thurmond (R) and Rep. L. Mendel Rivers (D). They were reported to have asked Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Robert H. Finch to impose no penalties on the hospital until after a personal investigation by Finch into its compliance with federal law.

An HEW official previously had notified McCord that the hospital is in violation of the equal employment opportunity provisions of the law applying to federal contractors, and may lose $12 million in federal grants and contracts unless it develops an "affirmative program" of hiring and training employes.

As a first step, McCord was advised to reinstate the 12 fired employes without penalty, and with their pay restored.

Sen. Walter F. Mondale (D-Minn.) took note in Washington of Finch's reported part in the controversy. Finch did not, Mondale said, repudiate the statement that he had been the object of political pressure. The statement "changed an encouraging situation into one which is now rapidly deterioerating," he said.

If HEW intends to relax its pressure, Mondale continued, "its reasons for doing so are plainly, overtly and shamefully political. For the record clearly shows that the hospital has failed to comply" with the requirements.

AFL-CIO Organization Dir. William L. Kircher told a press conference in Charleston that the federation will continue to support the strikers until they win a just settlement.

Kircher announced that the Longshoremen and other maritime unions have offered their full backing to the strikers. While they are reluctant to take action that would halt shipping in the port, Kircher said, he warned that strike action may be taken unless a settlement is reached without further roadblocks.

ILA members struck the Charleston Port Authority last Mar. 3 and were enjoined by the courts from effective picketing. A local daily reported June 23 that the Chamber of Commerce credits the Port Authority with saving private shippers $5 million in wages and other costs since the state took over port longshore duties.

John Collins Dies at 73, Retired Field Staffer

Brockton, Mass.—John Collins, who retired in 1963 as an AFL-CIO field representative, died at 73 following a brief illness and was buried after services in St. Patrick's Church.

Born in Ireland and a retired officer of the Irish Republican Army, Collins was a Brockton resident since 1927. He was a past president of the Gas Workers Union and the Field Representatives Federation.

Collins became an organizer for the CIO in 1942 and remained on the AFL-CIO staff after merger.

Aimed Toward Youth:

Musicians Move to Develop Broad Apprenticeship Plan

Las Vegas, Nev.—The development of an apprenticeship program on a nationwide scale was authorized by the 72nd convention of the Musicians as a step in a broad plan to extend union membership into areas largely left untouched in the past.

The delegates accepted a proposal that international officers be empowered to draw up such a program based on the successful elements of local programs already in effect.

The action came after a report by Victor Fuentealba, president of Baltimore Local 40-543 and a member of the international executive board, who headed a committee that had explored the possibilities of a uniform plan. Fuentealba emphasized that it would be aimed to appeal to young musicians and their parents, and would seek to curb entrepreneurs who have often victimized newcomers to the entertainment field. AFM Pres. Herman D. Kenin had stressed these points in his report to the convention.

In a companion step, the delegates authorized the board to permit locals to pay the initiation fees of members participating in approved youth programs.

Kenin said that many forward-thinking locals have adopted programs for young members that will be considered in formulating the national program. He cited specifically Local 5, Detroit; Local 47, Los Angeles, which he said has done much to combat "exploitation of young musicians by unscrupulous managers and agents"; Local 124, Olympia, Wash.; Local 424, Richmond, Calif.; Local 207, Salina, Kan.; Local 1, Cincinnati; Local 174, New Orleans; Local 149, Toronto, and the host Local 369, Las Vegas.

Comedian Jack Benny, an AFM member appearing at a Las Vegas Hotel, presented a special plaque to Kenin in appreciation of the union's help in raising funds for the Muscular Dystrophy Associations of America. Benny acted in behalf of the organization's national chairman, Jerry Lewis.

In accepting the honor, Kenin reminded the delegates that Benny has been instrumental in raising more than $4 million in behalf of symphony orchestras and their members in the U.S. and many foreign countries. The AFM president is an MDAA vice president.

Kenin presented Benny with an honorary life membership card, his second, and reminded him that it was made of "pure gold."

"One more and I'll melt 'em down," Benny cracked.

Sen. Gale McGee (D-Wyo.) warned of a trend toward conservatism he said is sweeping Congress.

"Emerging conservatism is on the move—an effort to turn back time," he declared. "It means you, too, are going to be the object of attack, your rights imperilled as working people."

McGee devoted most of his talk to a defense of the majority of college students he said are in revolt against "the system" but want to change it rather than destroy it. He condemned the "tiny, tiny group" which he said has "mastered the technique of exploiting this sentiment" and which seeks to destroy the system, including the education system.

Campus disorders, he maintained, are responsible for "a mood in Congress which is dangerously in favor of cracking down on the militants."

"Some want to legislate an idea out of existence," he said in defending the right to dissent. "The only way to beat an idea is to come up with a better one."

McGee urged the delegates to work for the re-election next year of the Senate's class of '58, the hard core of liberals in the upper house. Vested interest groups have already begun to "target in" on its members, he said, including some Republicans. With so much to be done in the way of social legislation, he said, "this is not time to falter."

A call to political action also was sounded by Ernie Hoffman, Tucson, Ariz., Local 771, in his report as chairman of the Tempo committee, the union's political action arm.

Many of the union's friends in Congress, especially those who aided in the fight to lift the cabaret tax and open up new avenues of employment, will need the help Tempo and union members can give them in 1970, he said, noting that contributions to Tempo more than doubled over the past year.

In additional actions, the convention:

- Called on officers to meet with representatives of other entertainment unions to seek agreements whereby AFM members would not be required to join another union to perform on radio or TV "in the normal and traditional manner of all musical groups."
- Urged use of the AFM label on all records produced by union musicians.
- Referred to the executive board, for a report to next year's convention, a proposal to revise the definition of a symphony orchestra.
- Asked the Hall of Fame National Foundation to consider as a candidate for honors John Philip Sousa, leader of the Marine Band and composer of many of America's favorite marches, who died 37 years ago.
- Proposed legislation stiffening penalties for employers who hire aliens not duly admitted to the United States. The resolution said that AFM members in border areas lose job opportunities each year to illegal entrants.

Other speakers included Henry Kaiser, AFM general counsel; Vice Pres. Arthur Nolan of the Union Labor Life Insurance Co. Mayor Clyde E. Fant of Shreveport, La., site of last year's convention; Pres. Oswaldo Pde-Lyra of the Rio De Janeiro Musicians Union; and Treas.-Emeritus George Clancy.

Re-elected in contests were Vice Pres. Hal C. Davis, Pittsburgh, and the five members of the executive board: Fuentealba; J. Martin Emerson, Washington; John V. Tranchitella, Los Angeles; A. A. Tomei, Philadelphia, and David Winstein, New Orleans.

The delegates picked Portland, Ore., as the site of the 1971 convention. The 1970 conclave will be held in Houston, Tex.

Salary Hikes, Bonuses, Stock Deals Help Corporate Brass Stay Ahead

The top executives of America's biggest corporations may deplore what they call "inflationary" wage demands by unions.

But a survey by Business Week magazine found that most of them were able to keep a big step ahead of the rise in living costs last year through fatter pay checks, bigger bonuses and a growing assortment of other forms of compensation.

The nation's biggest corporation, General Motors, did well by its board chairman. His pay went up nearly $42,000 to $225,000. In appreciation of his services, his annual bonus was raised $33,750 to $427,500. And on top of that, there were various stock credits that brought his total compensation to $795,000. Two other GM officials also topped the $700,000 mark.

Textile workers may be towards the bottom of industrial pay scales. But the chairman of Burlington Industries earned a pay hike of $65,000 to bring his base salary up to $225,000—plus an extra $12,467 in a profit-sharing plan. Four other Burlington executives were over the $100,000 mark in salary alone.

There was no wage freeze at the E. I. du Pont headquarters. Not only did its president get a $62,000 pay raise to $193,300 and a $32,000 increase in his bonus to $117,000, but he also received something called "dividend units" which were valued at $68,000. That's $13,000 more than the previous year.

The top man in International Telephone & Telegraph picked up a $50,000 pay hike and an additional $25,000 in bonus for a total compensation of $559,820. But the chairman of American Telephone & Telegraph had to settle for a $50,000 salary increase, to $295,833. And Republic Steel's chairman practically was in a rut with only a $7,500 salary increase to $322,500.

Things were better in the dime store business, though, with the F. W. Woolworth chairman earning a $31,000 raise to $333,000. And in the soap field, Procter & Gamble's president stayed ahead of rising living costs with a $100,000 pay raise to $425,000. The company also set aside $60,000 for him in something called a profit sharing trust. That's more than $12,000 above what they put in the previous year.

Business Week reports that companies are coming up with new varieties of stock option plans, including something called "phantom stock." This is intended to save an executive from paying for stock out of his own pocket to take advantage of a stock option. The company just "makes believe" he bought the stock and five or 10 years later pays him his "profit" in cash.

At a General Motors stockholders' meeting, some killjoys proposed limiting bonuses to executives to 100 percent of base pay. GM's bonus and salary committee indignantly retorted that setting such a limit on compensation would discourage executives from making a maximum effort.

To Meet Hearst Challenge:

Guild Leaders Cite Defense Fund Needs

San Antonio, Tex.—Increased assessment income is necessary if the Newspaper Guild is to meet the challenge posed by Hearst's anti-union assault in Los Angeles and critical bargaining elsewhere, ANG Sec.-Treas. Charles A. Perlik, Jr., told the Guild's annual convention.

Reduced income resulting from the rescinding of a new assessment schedule in referendum last December has brought the Guild's defense fund close to "the end of its usable assets," Perlik reported.

The Guild, he disclosed, has had to borrow $100,000 from the AFL-CIO "to tide us over" pending a decision by the convention on the assessment problem.

The Guild's international executive board has recommended adoption of an assessment schedule based on monthly payments of 4 percent of a member's weekly earnings. The schedule overturned in last year's referendum provided for a 5 percent schedule.

At the same time, the board has proposed to reduce defense fund outgo by eliminating benefits during the first week of a strike and by offsetting any vacation pay and unemployment compensation against benefits.

"Crises we knew about last year have been joined by others," Perlik told the convention, "none of them more demanding or more grueling than the continuing 18-month struggle to turn aside Hearst's heartless assault on unionism at his Los Angeles paper in particular and on unionism in Southern California in general.

"If the newspaper publishing industry has not demonstrated to us by now that we must mend our defense fund machinery, it never will. The time for studying, the time for vacillating, the time for hesitation are all past us."

ANG Pres. James B. Woods cited significant gains in the newspaper unions' campaign against Hearst's Los Angeles Herald-Examiner, where boycott campaigns have cut advertising down by more than 14 million lines and daily circulation by 425,000 copies to approximately 300,000.

"But the pressure must continue and it must grow," Woods declared. "We must win this fight, and a coordinated labor movement will win. Already we have shown other publishers who would like to be intransigent that we are determined and united. Let them take warning."

Executive Vice Pres. William J. Farson, who is retiring in October after 14 years at the Guild's helm, reported that preliminary talks with the Communications Workers and the Typographical Union have not solved "major structural changes" entailed in possible mergers.

But leaders of the Guild and four other newspaper unions have moved toward closer cooperation by recommending the establishment of a joint legislative office in Washington, he reported.

The office, if approved by the unions' executive boards, would be "a watchdog operation" aimed at keeping the unions informed of pending legislation and activities of federal regulatory agencies affecting industry employes and the industry itself, he stated.

Farson said that changes brought about by such developments as photoelectric editing, facsimile transmission and computers make it likely that "the logical and final merger will of necessity be one covering all communications unions." "However," he added, "that will take some time and a bit of doing."

Perlik, who has been secretary-treasurer during the 14 years that Farson has been executive vice president, has announced his candidacy to succeed Farson. He is being opposed by Brian Flores, administrative officer of the Washington-Baltimore Guild.

Robert Crocker, a former president of the Wire Service Guild, is running for secretary-treasurer on a ticket with Perlik and Woods, while John (Ned) Sweet, secretary of the San Antonio Guild, is running for that post in association with Flores.

The convention has before it an international executive board recommendation to change the title of executive vice president to president and that of president to chairman to conform to general trade union practice under which a union's top executive officer is the president.

Woods, in endorsing the proposed change in his address to the convention, noted that the title of president was originally bestowed in deference to Heywood Broun, the crusading columnist who founded the Guild in 1933 and held the presidency while continuing as a working newspaperman.

"I do not equate myself with him," Woods said, adding that "neither do I equate any of my predecessors with him—nor do I expect to equate any of our successors."

Newspaper 'Pool' Bill Seen Enriching Dailies

The public interest would suffer if newspapers were to be given a special exemption from antitrust laws, the AFL-CIO told a Senate Judiciary subcommittee.

Thomas E. Harris, AFL-CIO associate general counsel, said the so-called newspaper preservation bill being considered by the subcommittee "would be more aptly described as a newspaper enrichment bill."

It would enable any newspaper which "appears unlikely to remain or become a financially sound publication" to enter into a profit-pooling and price-fixing deal with a competitor.

It is "conceivable," Harris said, "that papers which fix prices, divide the market and pool profits may nevertheless vary in their news content and editorial approach." But in practice, he suggested, "the lubricant of profit pooling is likely to mute ideological clash."

He noted that newspapers can presently pool printing and distribution facilities without violating antitrust laws. Anything beyond that, he said, would act to freeze out competition and diversity.

Federation affiliates representing newspaper workers are opposed to the bill and the 1967 AFL-CIO convention adopted a resolution strongly rejecting a similar measure.

Influential newspaper publishers are supporting the legislation, but opponents were heartened when the Justice Dept. took a strong stand against it.

Richard W. McLaren, chief of the department's antitrust division, told the subcommittee that the legislation "would flout the basic principles of free enterprise."

He criticized publishers for seeking special exemptions from the antitrust laws, declaring: "I do not personally believe that, in the long run, government promotes newspaper independence by granting newspapers special favors."

Sen. Philip A. Hart, chairman of the antitrust subcommittee and a foe of the legislation, praised McLaren's testimony. While the subcommittee is expected to approve the measure, the Administration's opposition significantly diminishes its chances of passage.

Humphrey Joins Newspaper Guild

Hubert H. Humphrey, who is now writing a column for the Register and Tribune Syndicate, has become a Newspaper Guild member-at-large.

The former vice president sent in a membership application card at the invitation of ANG Sec.-Treas. Charles A. Perlik, Jr. He said he was "pleased and honored" to join the union.

Perlik wrote that "we in the Newspaper Guild did everything we could to help you reach a different objective"— the U.S. presidency —and "having failed, we have the next best alternative to offer"—Guild membership.

NLRB Backs Upholsterers in Texas Walkout

The National Labor Relations Board ruled that the Economy Furniture Co. of Austin, Tex., refused to abide by the results of a 1968 election won by the Upholsterers and forced its employes into an unfair labor practice strike which still is continuing.

The company was ordered to end its defiance of the law, bargain with the union and offer all strikers "immediate and full reinstatement to their former or substantially equivalent positions," dismissing if necessary any persons hired after Nov. 27, 1968, the date the strike started.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council called for full labor support of the union's Local 456 in a statement in April charging that management not only refused to bargain in good faith, but also "engaged in name-calling with particular emphasis on the Mexican-American ethnic background" of many employes.

Economy makes wooden and upholstered furniture for Montgomery Ward & Co., White Discount Stores and other outlets. It uses the labels Smithtowne Maple, Western Provincial and Built-Rite. The company is on the "do not patronize" list of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept.

The NLRB upheld the examiner's findings against the firm. He rejected the company's claim that the board's decision in the election case was "contrary to law and incorrect." Management had produced no new evidence and its charges added up to "an unwarranted and gratuitous insult to the board and the regional director," Examiner Paul E. Weil reported.

Montana Democrat Wins House Race

A liberal Democrat who campaigned for tax reform and a roll-back of interest rates won a special election for a Montana congressional seat once considered "safe Republican."

John Melcher, labor-backed Democrat, defeated Republican William Mather by some 2,000 votes in the 32-county eastern Montana district. Last November the same district re-elected conservative Republican James F. Battin by a better than 2-1 margin. Battin later resigned to accept a federal judgeship.

It was the second Democratic pickup of a Republican-held House seat in a special election this year. In April, Democrat David R. Obey won an upset victory in Wisconsin for the seat vacated by Defense Sec. Melvin R. Laird.

The Montana victory raises the Democratic membership in the House to 245. There are 188 Republicans, with two vacancies still to be filled in districts last held by Republicans. One is in Illinois, where Donald Rumsfeld resigned to join the Nixon Administration as head of the Office of Economic Opportunity. The other is in the Massachusetts district which William H. Bates had represented since 1950 and his father had held before him. Bates died June 22.

At the start of the 91st Congress, the party lineup had been 243 Democrats to 192 Republicans.

In the Montana race, the Republican candidate ran as a supporter of Pres. Nixon, declaring that the key issue is whether voters want to stand "with the Administration or against it."

Key Republican officials from Washington came into the district to help the GOP standard-bearer and seek to avoid "another Wisconsin."

Montana's two Democratic senators campaigned actively for Melcher, who had strong support from the state's labor movement and backing from most family farmer organizations.

Records Cited

Both candidates had served in the state legislature, and unions pinpointed the differences in their voting records in reports to their membership. Mather was hit sharply for voting against collective bargaining rights for public employes and for support of the "right-to-work" Sec. 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Melcher, in his campaign literature, stressed that "the nation needs tax revenue and the nation's citizens demand tax equality—tax reform will give us both."

He warned of the impact of high interest rates on the economy and called for a roll-back. "Tight money is squeezing the Montana pocketbook and it hurts."

There was a third candidate in the race, representing George Wallace's American Independent Party, but he had no impact on the contest. While Wallace last November had picked up 6.4 percent of the vote in the district—to 53.4 percent for Nixon and 40.2 percent for Humphrey—the AIP congressional candidate received slightly more than 500 votes, about one-half of 1 percent of the votes cast.

Laundry Union Posts Key Gain In Bay Region

San Francisco—Wage increases of 49.5 cents per hour will go to nearly 2,000 dry cleaning employes in the six-county bay area under agreements signed by the Laundry & Dry Cleaning union with more than 400 employers.

Three-year contracts negotiated by Local 3009 and 3010 of the AFL-CIO union will bring the minimum wages in the industry to $3.08 an hour for store girls, $3.52 for pressers and $3.57 for combination workers.

Wages were raised 17.5 cents this year, with other boosts of 15 and 17 cents due at one-year intervals. The employers also agreed to contribute an additional $5.20 a month per employe into the health plan fund next June 4 for a total of $44.55 a month.

A change in piece work and incentive rates will produce an average earning rate of $5.48 an hour for pressers working under incentive plans—a new high in wages and fringe benefits for the industry. Union Pres. Russell R. Crowell called the contracts "the best kind of victory" in the war on poverty.

Atlanta Unionist Joins Scouts' Staff

Joel Gay, formerly AFL-CIO Community Services representative in Atlanta, has been named director of labor relations for the Boy Scouts of America.

Gay has been a member of the Communications Workers 15 years. holding positions of Local 3290 steward, community services committee chairman and editor of the local's newspaper.

Recently, the National Council of the BSA adopted a resolution expressing appreciation for contributions made by the labor movement to Boy Scout programs.

Those Crazy Bankers

THERE'S AN Alice-in-Wonderland air about the decision of the nation's biggest bankers to raise the interest rate on the money they lend—to the highest level in the history of the United States.

It seems that the banks had a problem. Too many people and business firms wanted to borrow money. At least that's what a couple of leading bankers told the House Banking Committee.

Well, as anyone knows, the last thing a banker wants to do is turn down someone who is looking for a loan.

But there just wasn't enough money in the till to meet all demands.

What to do now?

Obviously—at least obviously to a banker—the thing to do is discourage some of the borrowers.

Not by turning them down. Heaven forfend.

The thing to do is raise the interest rates. Then, maybe, some of the potential borrowers might decide that they can't afford a loan.

Of course, this also means that an already-depressed housing industry is squeezed even tighter and unemployment is bound to go up—not just in the construction trades but in the host of housing-related industries.

And of course this means that the price of just about everything anyone buys will be higher—because the cost of credit gets passed on and on until it hits the consumer.

Meanwhile, the banks make more profit because the money that is lent out brings a higher return. And all because the bankers had the foresight to jack up interest rates to limit demand.

Sounds crazy, doesn't it?

Crazy like a fox.

Summer Job Search

THIS SUMMER, more than 13 million youngsters between the ages of 16 and 21 will be looking for jobs.

For many of these young people, success in their job quest will spell the difference between failure and success in life—between an aimless existence on the street corner and a rewarding career.

Tuition is free in our public high schools, but a student needs money for clothes and for carfare, supplies, and lunches. For many of the students from the poorest families, the lack of needed cash is enough to tip the scale in favor of dropping out of school.

Once a youngster has been labeled a "dropout," he has started down the endless road leading toward the senseless, shiftless life of a failure. Without a high school diploma to buttress his search for a job in our technological society, he is headed toward a lifetime of disappointment and bitterness.

Last year nearly 2 million youngsters were disappointed. In many cases, they were the young people who most needed the jobs. The unemployment rate for nonwhite youngsters was 26 percent—nearly double the rate for white boys and girls.

If each employer produces just one job, if each citizen offers his personal job-hunting help to one student, if each church, union and civic organization talks up the cause to its members, the need would be met—to give all of our young people a fair break in life.

A Word Edgewise:

Marines Excel in Viet Nam Without Rigmarole of ROTC

By John P. Roche

SOME MONTHS AGO, never dreaming that ROTC (Reserve Officer Training Corps) programs would become the focus of extremist attacks, I wrote a somewhat frivolous column suggesting that college military training programs were essentially a waste of time and money, if not counter-productive.

My point was intended seriously, but I am now strongly reminded of an old Chaplin film in which Charlie was ambling down the street minding his own business when the red warning flag fell off a truck's projecting cargo. Charlie, like a good citizen, picked it up and chased the truck. Suddenly a Communist parade emerged from a side street right behind him, the cops descended, and Charlie went off to jail as a leader of the parading Reds. I have a new appreciation of Charlie's predicament. On the subject of ROTC, I have found myself in some pretty odd company.

I have not changed my views, but it is obvious that they need clarification. Gen. S. L. A. Marshall, the military historian, has quite correctly weighed into me in his syndicated column for not dealing with the serious aspects of ROTC. "Slam," for whom I have enormous respect, pointed out that the bulk of present-day commissioned officers have been drawn from college training programs, and argued that abolition of ROTC would be a national disaster.

(He also challenged my credentials as a hand-grenade thrower, noting that in World War I he had induced the U.S. Army to substitute the baseball throw for the British overarm lob. I don't doubt the truth of his assertion, but in the spring of 1943 the word had not reached Camp Lee, Va.)

First of all, nothing said in the earlier column was intended to ridicule the competence of officers who have emerged from ROTC in recent years. The pre-World War II program was appalling, and I was unfair in using the immediate post-war period as if it were typical. Between 1946 and 1950 our whole military operation, not just ROTC, resembled the Keystone Cops.

Given the attitude of the American people, it was remarkable that any competent officers remained in the services. I regret to say that I contributed to this witless orgy of anti-militarism, at least until the Greek Civil War, the Berlin Blockade and the Czech Coup brought me to my historical senses.

Second, I made it clear earlier, and re-emphasize now, that the armed services must have the right to recruit on campus. A college or university should not double as a basic training center, but the right of students to participate in voluntary activities should not be denied, no matter how vicious the blackmail of Students for a Democratic Society (SDS). ROTC can, that is, operate as an extracurricular activity. It should be disarmed since guns have no place on a campus, and summer camps will serve for weapons training.

At this point the critics begin to jump up and down and accuse me of destroying ROTC, but the gist of their argument is an unproved assumption that ROTC training makes first-class officers, that is, that the military science courses, the drill, etc. have shaped the men who graduate.

MY CONTENTION is precisely the opposite. Without for one second denying the importance of ROTC as a mechanism for recruiting good officers, I suggest that ROTC training is basically superfluous.

In other words, if the armed services eliminated the on-campus programs but continued to recruit talented men from the colleges, they would have about the same results—and a lot of time, energy, and money would be saved.

This is not based on speculation. Up in I Corps in Viet Nam, I spent some time with both the Army and the Marines. I have never seen such a fine body of officers as we have there and admittedly most holding Army commissions are products of ROTC, who have been exposed to four years of campus marching and courses in military science.

But before we take this as proof of ROTC's effectiveness, let's take a look at the Marines. Most Marine officers signed up for officer training in college, went to summer training camps, and had none of the campus rigmarole of ROTC.

I defy anyone to demonstrate that the Marines are in any way inferior—even though they never took a course in military science or drilled in the college gym.

To Escape Cycle Of Violence:

Blacks Urged to Channel Rage Into Positive Political Strategy

The author of the following article, Bayard Rustin, is executive director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute and a prominent civil rights leader.

By Bayard Rustin

WE HAVE REACHED a point in the political development of America that can legitimately be called an emergency. Our country is in trouble, very severe trouble, and those who are most profoundly threatened by this unhappy situation are black Americans.

Within recent weeks we have seen a conservative appointed a Chief Justice of the United States. We have seen two integrationist candidates for the school board of Denver, Colo., go down to a resounding defeat. We have seen an obscure police chief from Minneapolis run away with the mayoralty election on a platform of nothing more than "law and order." In Los Angeles we have witnessed the defeat of a talented and idealistic Negro candidate for mayor and the victory of an incompetent and unprincipled demagogue. And now in New York City we have seen both the Republican and the Democratic Parties nominate right-wing candidates for mayor.

As these developments have come in the wake of a Republican presidential victory and the racist Wallace movement—the size of which was unprecedented—we can understand the gravity of the present situation, and we must recognize the necessity to change the course of our common political destiny.

There are many reasons for this reaction that is victimizing all people concerned with social justice, but the fundamental reason lies in the dynamic of fear.

There exists today a dangerous relationship between the extreme Left and the extreme Right, and between black rage and white fear. The confrontationist tactics of the one evoke a reactionary response from the other. When the pseudo-revolutionaries of the New Left manhandle professors, occupy buildings, and destroy property, the Right wins new adherents. When sincere but misdirected young black people engage in violence in the name of justice, they are strengthening those very forces which in the past have inflicted violence and injustice upon the Negro community. Such acts of protest may be cathartic, they may appear to be bold and militant, but let us be very clear—their primary effect is politically reactionary.

These acts have set loose a wave of panic in this country. And there are opportunistic right-wing demagogues who understand the nature of that panic and are building their political futures upon it. These demagogues don't believe in meeting the urgent needs of the black community for income and education. Indeed, social justice would threaten the very base of fear upon which they stand, for it would remove the cause of social unrest. Their program is the billy club and their staunchest ally the police arm of the state. They believe in repression.

The lessons of the past month should be clear. An assault upon our democratic institutions will not reform those institutions but destroy them. Violence will lead to more violence, not to social justice. And the fundamental tragedy is that the absence of justice will provoke more people to engage in violent acts. We must find a way out of this vicious cycle.

The needs of the black community for adequate jobs, housing, and education can be met only by developing a political strategy that will attract a majority of Americans to a program for social change.

There are whites who are unemployed and white workers whose real income is steadily decreasing as the cost of living rises. Both these groups share with blacks the desire for increased and upgraded employment opportunities. Let us build a movement with them. There are whites living in substandard housing and paying exorbitant rents. Their children attend schools that are over-crowded and under-staffed. They share with blacks the desire for massively funded programs in housing and education. Let us build a movement with them, too. And there are those more affluent whites of liberal persuasion who sincerely desire social justice. They too should be our allies.

THESE ARE POSITIVE points around which a political majority can be built. Such a strategy is the only means by which black people will achieve social and economic equality within the context of contemporary American society.

This strategy demands the repudiation of racial separatism which can only isolate Negroes. It also demands the rejection of extremism and violence which increase fear and heighten animosities between groups that might otherwise be united.

Black people are enraged because there are social injustices which provoke rage. But if that rage is not expressed politically, if it is not devoted towards achieving constructive goals, then it will be self-defeating and ultimately self-destructive. Let us be enraged about injustice, but let us not be destroyed by it. Let us act now with forcefulness but restraint, with militancy but wisdom, in the hope of liberating ourselves from rage and injustice, and our white brothers from the fear which now enslaves them.

Costs Miniscule:

Effective On-Job Safety Held A 'Bargain' for Industry, Public

A FEDERAL JOB-SAFETY law shorn of "serious" enforcement and penalty features would be only a "namby-pamby" approach to rolling back the mounting job-related death and injury toll, a union spokesman warned.

"On-the-job health and safety is no small matter," declared Jacob Clayman, administrative director of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. He labeled the yearly toll a "recitation of atrocities on the job"—14,500 deaths, 2.2 million disabling and 7 million non-disabling injuries. He appeared on Labor News Conference, an AFL-CIO produced public affairs interview broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EDT, on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Clayman turned aside the contention that stiff industrial health and safety regulations and enforcement procedures would be too costly to maintain. The costs involved, he said, would be "infinitesimal and miniscule," in terms of the "overall public budget" and the scope of the problem.

"I can't conceive of cost as being a problem of serious consequences," he said, and "hope that the employers in America will not fish out this old canard."

Clayman said that in reality, job safety would be a "bargain" for both employers and the public at large. He pointed out that "the economic cost to the country, to everybody, of accidents and injuries on the job, is more than $7 billion a year," and they result in more lost man-days than "all the strikes and work stoppages rolled together."

The unionist said that the states have failed to adopt and enforce effective industrial health and safety programs, making "federal standards . . . and a strong federal hand in whatever standards are promulgated . . . imperative." Some states, he noted, spend "as little as 2 cents per worker per year on health and safety," and "the most generous state" spends only 45 cents per worker per year on its program.

Reporters questioning Clayman were Gershon Fishbein of the Environmental Health Letter and William Eaton of the Chicago Daily News.

UNION LABEL AND SERVICE TRADES DEPT., AFL-CIO

By Press Associates, Inc.

THE END OF THE WAR in Viet Nam may not be in sight, but there are nevertheless strong indications that the American people and Congress itself are becoming more and more concerned over the size of the nation's military budget.

It is now running in the $80 billion range, a large part of it, of course, due to Viet Nam, but much of it also to the development of all sorts of costly military hardware growing out of the atomic and space age. A considerable number of congressmen, pressed by their constituents, would like to cut down on military costs without regard to Viet Nam. Much of the resistence to funding of the ABM system is due to this factor alone.

What would happen to jobs should the war in Viet Nam end suddenly? What would happen should an economy-minded Congress clamp down on military expenditures over the next few years?

Is the United States geared to a swift and painless return to a peacetime economy or will it have to go through a harsh period of economic readjustment, the chief sufferers of which will be working people?

Defense related employment in 1967, including the military forces, was 7,428,000 or about 10 percent of total employment in the country. Of this, 2,927,000 defense workers were employed by private industry.

Labor economists were warning as long ago as 1967 that peacetime conversion of American industry should not be left to chance or last minute decisions.

THIS YEAR'S Economic Report to the President estimated that should a full withdrawal of American troops be initiated within six months of the end of hostilities in Viet Nam, expenses for defense purposes would drop by $16 billion over a year and a half and by $19 billion at the end of two years and a half.

Should cuts in defense spending reach the proportion that may be expected at some time in the future, how seriously would today's millions of defense workers be affected?

The predictions have their good and bad sides. One study contends that firms concentrating on defense contracts find it difficult to readjust peacetime commercial production. Other studies show considerable job losses already caused by cutbacks of military installations in recent years.

On the other hand, the Dept. of Labor recently reported that there is a large degree of transferability of defense plant workers' skills to peacetime jobs. A study made in California defense plants showed that most defense jobs have counterparts in non-defense industry and that for most the employment outlook is "good."

LABOR ECONOMISTS have noted that the country made the shift from a defense to peacetime economy after World War II without a depression or rise in unemployment. Pent-up buying power did the trick. On the other hand the adjustment after the Korean war was not good. The war was followed by three successive recessions and a rise in unemployment to 5.7 percent in 1963 compared to today's 3.5 percent.

The economists told Congress that this was not necessary. One of their conclusions was that a cut in defense spending should have been followed by a rise in non-defense expenditures to meet the domestic needs of the country—housing, public works, education, the War on Poverty—to speak in today's terms.

In any event, Congress now has before it legislation that would set up a National Economic Conversion Commission to consult with trade and industry associations, with labor unions and professional societies in order to devise a program to meet the conversion problem when it occurs. A national conference would be called and recommendations would be made to the President and Congress.

American workers, notably union members who man so many defense plants, are vitally concerned that the economy be kept moving once the most acute demands for military production have been met. What happened after Korea should be a lesson not to be forgotten.

COST FACTOR of maintaining effective industrial health and safety regulations would be miniscule, Jacob Clayman of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. tells reporters on Labor News Conference. Interviewing Clayman are William Eaton, left, of the Chicago Daily News and Gershon Fishbein of the Environmental Health Letter.

How to Buy:

Inflation, Exploitation Dilute Vulnerable Retirement Income

By Sidney Margolius

APPARENTLY IT IS NOT enough that the present generation of retired people lived through wars and depressions, built this country's present wealth, and now have to try to live on an average retirement income of less than $2,500 a year.

But they also are subjected to some of the most cynical exploitations and commercial indignities you'd care to see, including high-priced drugs; overpriced hearing aids and eyeglasses.

Patent medicines are not only exorbitantly priced but play on older people's fears and sometimes are worthless. Commercial nursing homes and hospitals financed by Wall Street are springing up to take advantage of Medicare.

Loophole-ridden health insurance plans are being sold to supplement Medicare. There are other overcharges and deceptions large and small.

The senior groups are concerned not merely about fringe rackets but about the exploitation of oldsters through excessive prices of many basic necessities, William Hutton, executive director of the National Council of Senior Citizens, told a recent national conference at the University of Michigan.

Older people are our most vulnerable consumers. Their urgent needs, lack of resources and their own worries make them victims of many overcharges.

Their living costs have gone up more because two of their biggest expenses—housing and medical care—have been rising faster than the overall cost of living. Less than three years ago the Bureau of Labor Statistics "moderate" living standard for a retired couple cost $322 a month. Now, by my own approximate updating, it costs about $375.

On the basis of the letters we get from older people, here are their most frequent complaints or requests for help:

- The high price of food.
- The high cost of medicines.
- What health insurance they need to supplement Medicare and where to get it.
- Transportation costs in general, and auto insurance costs and cancellations in particular.
- High charges and deceptive selling of home improvements.
- High charges by doctors.

There also is an area of exploitation which plagues oldsters but about which they often are unaware or tend to defend. That is the lack of nutritional understanding which often leads them to buy vitamin supplements and tonics, and some overpriced "health food", and so spend more than they would for an adequate diet.

Arbitrary cancellations of auto insurance for older people, or extra charges when they reach a certain age, have turned out to be unfair and unmerited.

THE TRUTH, according to American Automobile Association statistics and a survey by the University of Denver College of Law, is that older drivers over 70 have a safety record comparable to those in the 25-29 age group. Since older drivers drive less and have less exposure, they actually are involved in fewer accidents in proportion to their numbers than some of the younger age groups.

Some of the senior citizen groups now are exploring the practicality of setting up their own auto insurance services to correct this problem of discrimination by private firms.

The senior citizen representatives at the Michigan conference were told that the best chance of solving some of the consumer problems of older people is through group buying. Among group activities sponsored by trade unions, co-ops and senior groups in various areas are:

- Hundreds of drug plans ranging from simple arrangements for discounts from pharmacists to complete drug depots and mail order services.
- A growing number of group optical plans, with several now also handling hearing aids.
- Supplementary health insurance increasingly available at low group rates through nonprofit organizations.
- Home repair services in operation in Michigan and now being explored in other areas.

Guide to Health:

Referral Services Aid Urban Dwellers

AS COLD AND REMOTE as the urban community may seem today, it can offer help for sudden or chronic problems—if there is a properly organized Information and Referral Service to guide people to the help they need.

Tell Me Where to Turn is the title of a new Public Affairs pamphlet reporting on the development of such services. It is also the title of a new film that uses the documentary technique to show how an Information and Referral Service works. The pamphlet may be obtained for 25 cents from the Public Affairs Committee, 381 Park Avenue South, New York, N. Y. 10016. The film was produced on a grant from the U. S. Public Health Service.

The pamphlet underscores the need, in this time of rapid social change, for information and referral services to direct people with problems through the maze of health and welfare agencies to the one that can best help them.

Aside from the fact that the person in need—or the clergyman or doctor he has consulted—does not always know the most appropriate solution, Elizabeth Ogg, the pamphlet writer, notes that "The search for service is often misdirected because the seeker has failed to see his key problem in clear focus. . . . People need first and foremost a skilled counselor with intimate and accurate knowledge of all the local agencies to help them sort out their most pressing problems and suggest what they can do."

Today there are close to 275 professionally staffed information and referral services in the United States, which hear such requests as these:

- One of my parishioners must change jobs for health reasons. Can any one help her?
- My brother is an alcoholic. Where can he get treatment?
- We have just moved here and would like to know where to get help for our cerebral-palsied child.
- My husband has recently retired and is restless. Are there any activities he could look into?
- Where can I find a marriage counseling bureau?

Many calls for help can be handled in a few minutes on the telephone or face to face, Miss Ogg explains, "but a few require an interview in depth and several follow-up contacts with both the client and the agency to which the Information and Referral Service refers him, to make sure that he gets the services he needs."

Auspices for such a service vary from state to state, from city to city. In some places, it may grow out of services to the elderly; in others, it might be concerned with health, convalescent, and rehabilitation needs; in many low-income communities, Information and Referral Services have evolved as part of Neighborhood Service Centers, most of which have been funded by the Office of Economic Opportunity.

FOR AREAS THAT do not already have an Information and Referral Service, the pamphlet provides guidance on how to go about setting up such a program. It suggests questions to consider relating to auspices, purpose and program, financing, staff, use of volunteers. But beyond these considerations, it stresses that the needs of "the many who don't know where to turn" must always be paramount.

The film Tell Me Where to Turn, using vignettes of seven men and women with a variety of problems, shows how the social worker in the Information and Referral Service can guide people in trouble to the help they need.

The film is designed to be followed by a discussion on how to strengthen an existing Information and Referral Service or establish one where none exists. It may be purchased for $150 or rented for $10 from the Public Affairs Committee.

Soup to Nonsense:

There's Nothing Like a Camera To Turn Sloths Into Swingers

By Jane Goodsell

ANYONE WHO LOOKS through our family photograph album would get the impression that we are supercharged types who spend our lives dashing madly from one strenuous activity to another. There are snapshots of us skiing down mountainsides, cantering on horseback along the beach, backpacking in the wilderness, and fly-casting in sparkling mountain streams.

Look at this page, for example. Here are Mommy and Daddy with towels flung carelessly around their necks, brandishing tennis rackets. Here we are, riding the rapids in a rubber boat. That's me, displaying a brace of rainbow trout, and that's my husband swinging a baseball bat. Plastered throughout the books are photos of our daughters water skiing and bicycling and ice skating.

To judge from our snapshots, we spend more time traveling than Lowell Thomas. There are dozens of photos of us waving bye-bye from the doorways of planes, leaning out the windows of cars parked by historic landmarks, gazing at scenic views, boarding ferries, grinning toothily in front of famous sites and monuments.

Except for a few shots of barbecues on the patio and Christmas mornings, there is no evidence that we ever stay home—which in fact we do, most of the time.

In short, our photograph collection tells it like it isn't. Our albums are filled with pictures of us doing things we almost never do. Which is, of course, why we took the pictures.

We do occasionally play games and go on picnics with our children. But not as often as you'd think from looking through our snapshots.

Neither are we as cheery and vivacious as you'd guess from looking at our photos. Even those which are just pictures of us having our pictures taken (the ones which show us standing with our arms around each other in front of the Lincoln Memorial, and the group photo of us posed beside a giant redwood tree) show us laughing our heads off.

OFF-CAMERA, we're not anywhere near that merry. At a rough guess, I'd say that we spend at least 85 percent of our time not laughing.

To look at those pictures, you'd get the entirely false impression that we are a couple of cutups, sort of Jerry Lewis and Lucille Ball types, to whom life is just one big laff riot.

Actually, nothing could be farther from the truth. And I guess you could say the same about our entire photo collection.

Carbon Monoxide Study Issued by Fire Fighters

Even non-fatal doses of carbon monoxide may bring serious disorders to the vital human organs, according to a two-year study sponsored by the Fire Fighters.

Repeated inhalation of carbon monoxide has cumulative effects and could cause severe damage to the heart, brain and other organs, the study found.

Through the John R. Redmond Memorial Fund, the IAFF commissioned Dr. Gerald S. Gordon of Denver to study the effects of non-fatal doses of carbon monoxide. The research was conducted with the cooperation of the Denver Fire Dept. and Fire Fighters Local 858.

The fire fighter is subject to a significant exposure to carbon monoxide during the routine course of his occupation, Dr. Gordon observed. And the hazard to all Americans is increasing because of the constantly growing air pollution problem.

Dr. Gordon found that fire fighters need better protection against the poisonous gas and said there is an urgent need for research to improve breathing apparatus.

"Carbon monoxide has become increasingly important to us all," he observed. "It is a hazard in our collective and personal public health. It produces half of the deaths due to poisoning each year in this country. It is a leading and growing pollutant in the air we breathe. . . ."

As a public service, the IAFF has published a summary of Dr. Gordon's findings. The pamphlet is available from the Fire Fighters, 905 16th St. NW, Washington, D.C. 20006.

HISTORIC ERA on the Supreme Court came to a close as Earl Warren stepped down after 16 years as Chief Justice and swore in his successor, Warren E. Burger, right. Pres. Nixon, speaking to the court as a lawyer, praised Warren's "fairness, integrity and dignity," and expressed the nation's gratitude for his service.

Court Cancels License Of Racist TV Station

A federal appellate court cancelled the broadcasting license of a Mississippi television station charged with distorting its news coverage to reflect its racist and anti-labor bias, and sharply rebuked the Federal Communications Commission for its handling of the case.

The decision was written by Warren E. Burger a few days before he left the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia to become Chief Justice of the United States.

Burger, speaking for a unanimous three-judge panel, said the FCC had forgotten its responsibility to the public interest when it renewed the license of Station WLBT in Jackson, Miss. He directed the agency to invite applications from other groups to take over the station's broadcasting channel.

The case that reached the court had been brought by the United Church of Christ which, along with other groups accused the station of airing racial slurs, excluding news of the black community and cutting off network accounts of civil rights activities.

The Mississippi AFL-CIO was one of the earliest critics of the station and had filed repeated protests to the FCC going back to the early 1960s. The state labor movement termed the television station and an affiliated radio station the "semi-official organ of the John Birch Society, the White Citizens Council and other right-wing organizations."

During one NLRB union representation election in the area, WLBT aired a scurrilous charge that State AFL-CIO Pres. Claude Ramsey was a Communist sympathizer. At other times the station preceded network news broadcasts with the announcement: "What you are about to see is an example of biased, managed, northern news." Sometimes network programs were simply cut off the air.

The FCC at the time told the station to live up to the fairness doctrine and do a better job of programming.

Burger said the FCC in the current case had completely misread its responsibilities by assuming that it is up to complainants to prove that the license should be denied. In fact, he stressed, it is up to the FCC to determine that renewal of the license is in the public interest.

Broadcasters, he said, are "temporary" trustees of "a great public resource," the airwaves. "They must meet the highest standards which are embraced in the public-interest concept."

He said the court considered the FCC handling of the case so improper that it would "serve no useful purpose" to send the issue of the license renewal back to the agency for a new hearing.

Instead the court itself cancelled the license, told the FCC to devise a plan for interim operation of the station, possibly impounding the profits, until a new licensee is chosen.

AFL-CIO Convention Set to Start Oct. 2

The Eighth Constitutional Convention of the AFL-CIO will take place in Atlantic City, N.J., beginning Thursday, Oct. 2, 1969.

The meetings of the convention will be in the ballroom of the Traymore Hotel.

Teachers Urge 4-Year Plan On School Aid

Union teachers urged the Senate to approve at least a four-year extension of the basic federal aid to education legislation—and to follow through with full funding of the program.

Pres. David Selden of the American Federation of Teachers said the nation's education needs wouldn't be met even if Congress voted all the money it authorized. But in fact, he noted, appropriations in recent years have been less than half the amount called for in the basic legislation.

House Cutback

The House earlier this year passed a two-year extension of the Elementary & Secondary Education Act, a cutback from a committee recommendation for a five-year extension. It also voted to consolidate some of the programs into "block grants" to the states.

Selden urged the Senate committee to provide safeguards in the legislation to assure that any funds turned over to states are distributed to local school systems on the basis of educational needs and are used to meet these needs.

He criticized a provision in the House bill that would permit some federal funds to be used for what has been called "combat pay" for teachers—bonuses for those teaching in "difficult" schools.

No 'Bribe' Needed

"The money should be used to improve the schools themselves," Selden said, and not to "bribe" teachers to teach there.

Selden termed legislation introduced by the subcommittee chairman, Sen. Claiborne Pell (D-R.I.) preferable to the House version, which was heavily amended before passage by the conservative coalition.

He urged that a provision dropped from the House bill to help finance state and local parents' advisory councils be restored to the legislation in the Senate.

"While we cannot endorse some of the more extreme proposals for local community control," Selden said, "we do favor greatly increased parent involvement and participation in school policy making."

Idaho Delegates Focus On Legislation, Growth

Wallace, Idaho—The Idaho AFL-CIO returned its top officers for a new two-year term and approved their plans for continued legislative and organizational gains.

Delegates to the 11th annual convention re-elected Pres. Robert W. Macfarlane and Sec.-Treas. J. Paul Mais, adopted three constitutional revisions, and endorsed the strike and grape boycott of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee.

A cash collection was turned over to UFWOC representatives by the 130 delegates and convention visitors.

The convention called on Congress to remove the tax loopholes which permit wealthy Americans to escape paying their fair share of taxes. The delegates also joined state and university officials in urging Congress and the Atomic Energy Commission to continue funding Idaho's materials testing reactor until western states can raise the money to convert it to a research reactor.

They endorsed efforts of railroad unions to secure an improved transportation system nation-wide, and urged local settlements on each railroad of disputes over crew consist.

Macfarlane reported an increase of more than 20 percent in the membership of unions affiliated with the state body. In the legislative field, he hailed passage by the legislature of a "red tag" law under which the Idaho Dept. of Labor has the power to halt unsafe jobs or operations.

Vice Pres. William C. Hoop of the Woodworkers won another term in an election contest, as did board member Fred Hansen of the same union. Board member Tom F. Payne of the Painters was re-elected without a contest, and two new members were chosen to fill vacancies—Harold Charlton of the Laborers and Verl Bitter of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers.

AFTER A FRESH COAT OF PAINT was brushed on the Tacoma, Wash., Girls' Club, members of Painters Local 64 paused for a picture. The union painters volunteered a Saturday off from work to devote their time to the community services project.

Detroit Building Trades Sign Pact With Pre-Fab Housing Company

Detroit—Twelve unions of the Detroit Building Trades Council signed a two-year agreement with a producer of manufactured housing to cover both in-plant production and on-site erection.

It is believed to be the first contract in the nation to take in all crafts involved in the production of industrial housing, said Jack Wood, secretary-treasurer of the council.

The contract was consummated one week after the 18-union council initiated a drive to organize producers of factory-built housing in the Detroit area through negotiation of industrial-type labor agreements.

Negotiations are in process with several other manufacturers under the council's jurisdiction in Wayne, Macomb and Oakland counties.

"This action gives the lie to those who have been claiming that our members are out to block factory-built housing," Wood stressed.

He said the building trades accept the challenge to meet the demand for the 26 million housing units needed over the next 10 years. "We shall do everything in our power to see that these goals are met—both as a matter of improving living conditions and to create more jobs at decent wages for more Americans."

Stan Arnold, executive secretary of the Michigan Building Trades Council, said the Detroit agreement is expected to set the pattern for contracts with manufactured home producers throughout the state and the nation.

Recently, the Carpenters signed a national contract covering the in-plant and on-site work of its members employed by Stirling Homex Corp. which has operations in several locations throughout the country.

The Detroit contract is with LeBon Home Corp. which is erecting 250 "instant housing" units for the Metropolitan Detroit Citizens Development Authority. The homes will sell for $11,700 each.

The pact contains an anti-discrimination hiring clause and an agreement for wage adjustments at the end of the first year. Wages for plant workers range from $2.50 to $4.25 an hour and although they are lower than prevailing trades scales, they are higher than industrial scales for comparable factory worker classifications, the council said.

All LeBon workers will be represented directly by the council, rather than being divided along traditional construction craft lines.

Other provisions in the pact include time-and-half pay for work beyond eight hours a day or 40 hours a week; double time and one-half for holiday work, vacation pay, pregnancy leave, medical insurance and grievance and arbitration procedures.

The contract also would allow work to continue at LeBon's factory and erection sites in event of strikes by construction unions against other Detroit contractors.

Great Hot Dog Debate Links Union, Consumers

Pres. Nixon's consumer adviser and the AFL-CIO Meat Cutters lined up against the Agriculture Dept. and the meat industry in the big hot dog debate.

At issue is how much fat frankfurters and other types of cooked sausage should contain.

There's no limit now and the average hot dog is about one-third fat. But some brands are more than half fat.

The Agriculture Dept. tentatively proposed a 30 percent limit on fat content, but then switched to a 33 percent proposed regulation. It is now holding hearings on the proposal.

The fatty hot dog makers say most consumers prefer frankfurters with a high fat content.

The Meat Cutters retort that the reason why the fat content keeps going up is simply that fat is cheaper than meat. And since fat-stuffed sausages can be sold at a lower price, processors compete by decreasing the meat content of their product.

Arnold Mayer, the union's legislative representative, noted that the proportion of meat to fat in cooked sausages had dropped from 3-1 in 1950 to 2-1 last year. The reason, he suggested, is that the wholesale cost of meat used in hot dogs is about 48 cents a pound—and the cost of lard only 6 cents a pound.

Federal regulation is necessary, he said, to "assure that competition will not consist of who can cut the fat corner the sharpest."

Mrs. Virginia H. Knauer, the President's consumer adviser, told the Agriculture Dept. that their proposed standard was too fatty.

She said excess fat in the diet is a health hazard and noted that both the Defense Dept. and the Veterans Administration require that the hot dogs they buy have no more than 30 percent fat content.

If that limit is "good for soldiers and sick veterans," she said, "it should be good for the rest of us."

Both Mayer and Mrs. Knauer also urged the Agriculture Dept. to require labeling of frankfurters to show the percentage of the various ingredients.

Pet foods contain such a listing, they noted, and people should have the same information about the food products they eat themselves.

Wisconsin Assembly Kills 'Work' Bill

With nearly 500 union members present for the funeral, the Wisconsin legislature killed a "right-to-work" bill which would have outlawed the union shop.

The state Assembly's Labor Committee voted 11-0 against the legislation after a one-day hearing. Union members came from all parts of the state to demonstrate their opposition to the bill and even the Republican Speaker of the Assembly testified against it.

He said he had worked in both union and open shops and "the only way to have labor peace" is to allow union shop agreements.

Court Upholds IUE:

GE Told to Permit Union Time Study

Richmond, Va.—A union's right to information it needs in deciding whether to pursue a grievance was upheld in a ruling by the U.S. Court of Appeals here against General Electric Co.

GE was directed to carry out a National Labor Relations Board order to allow the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers to make its own time studies at the company's distribution transformer plant at Hickory, N.C. IUE had asked permission in 1966 to bring in its own industrial engineer and, when management refused, filed an unfair labor practice charge.

Judges Harrison L. Winter, Clement F. Haynsworth and J. Braxton Craven, Jr., cited the "uncontradicted" testimony of the union's expert, Bertrand Gottlieb, in voting to enforce the NLRB decision. Gottlieb, of the Transportation Institute, formerly was on the staff of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research.

The ruling was the fourth legal setback in recent weeks for GE on unfair labor practice charges brought by IUE.

It was evident, the judges said, that Gottlieb's testimony "fully supported the conclusion that . . . the union could not make an intelligent decision on how far to press employe grievances challenging the company's time standards without the advice of an expert."

Such advice, they said, must be based "on his actual observation of the operations in question and an opportunity to check his observations, including time studies, against the company's data" in its motion time study system.

The dispute originated when IUE Local 182 began to consider the filing of grievances over GE's production standards for coil winding jobs at Hickory, and over the exclusion of some of the 750 plant workers from wage increases based in part on an area wage survey by management.

The company refused to permit the union to have its own on-the-job studies made.

It said union time studies would be "disruptive" and that, besides, IUE gave up its legal right to pursue the point when it signed a contract with a "wrap-up" clause at the end of negotiations in 1966.

The court rejected this, saying "we are . . . influenced by the strong public policy to make the grievance procedures" in the contract "the means for accomplishing industrial peace." Also it ordered GE to identify area employers whose wage rates were used by Hickory management in setting GE plant rates.

The court found "no serious suggestion that the studies . . . would interfere with production." It ruled that access to the information requested by the union "is in the interest of an enlightened employer" as well as the IUE, and that the union had not waived its legal right of appeal.

The judges accepted Gottlieb's testimony that all production standards "are strictly a question of judgment, and no engineer can 'prove' a standard is wrong."

Floyd Smith to Assume Machinists' Presidency

Floyd E. Smith, a Kansas farm boy who left school at 17 for a job as a machinist's helper at 25 cents an hour, takes office July 1 as president of the Machinists.

Smith, from Cleveland, O., succeeds P. L. Siemiller, retiring at 65 after four years as president. Smith was elected without opposition in a national referendum in April. So was Eugene Glover of Chicago, successor to retiring Sec.-Treas. Matthew DeMore. Both men take their new posts on the same day.

No drastic changes in policy or program are expected from the new officers. Smith believes legislative action and economic action will continue to be emphasized by his 11-member executive board, including seven incumbents and two new vice presidents—Francis P. Meagher of San Francisco and Fred J. Purcell of Utica, N.Y.

Smith wants his union to keep on being known as "the Fighting Machinists." Union members, he declared, "have never won a dime sitting still and being patient and turning the other cheek."

The depression of the 1930s cost Smith his job at the Everstick Anchor Co., St. Louis. He "worked around" as a salesman until 1935 when he got an offer to learn bricklaying. He joined the Bricklayers, and in 1942 moved from St. Louis to Las Vegas, where he became president of a Bricklayers' local union after several years at the trade.

Smith's Machinist friends in IAM Local 845 recommended his appointment as deputy state labor commissioner. After 18 months at that post he moved to Long Beach, Calif., rejoined the IAM and became assistant business representative for Lodge 1235.

That was in 1945. Since then he has served as union representative, Grand Lodge representative and, in 1961, IAM vice president.

As Grand Lodge representative, Smith served as traveling business agent for construction and erection machinists in seven northwestern states plus Alaska. That was rugged work in rugged territory, he says.

As a vice president with offices in Cleveland, Smith traveled his 11-state area constantly, assisting in negotiations, helping to organize, addressing meetings and attending conferences. Last year, he recalls, he spent only five weekends at home.

FLOYD E. SMITH

To Stem Job Losses:

Boot, Shoe Workers Seek Industry Fund

St. Louis—The Boot & Shoe Workers voted at their 25th convention to raise membership dues $1 a month and to seek an employer-financed fund to promote the sale of union-made shoes to stem the loss of jobs because of foreign competition.

A record turnout of delegates voted to instruct all union negotiators to propose a "royalty" of 5 cents a pair on imported shoes in future contracts to finance the promotion fund.

Union officers sponsored the move, they explained, as "shock therapy" to revive a diminishing industry.

They said that for 12 years they had tried vainly to interest employers and the government in a joint effort to increase production of U.S.-made shoes. Ten years ago they offered to contribute $100,000 a year to an employer-union promotion fund.

Employers eventually did launch a sales promotion fund but took eight years to reach the $100,000 mark, the union said. Its latest effort is based on these statistics, cited to the convention:

- In 1968, U.S. workers produced 630 million pairs of footwear for sale in competition with 170 million imported pairs—nearly a quarter of the U.S. market.
- The week before the convention, one major manufacturer produced 220,000 less pairs than in the comparable week of 1968.
- The industry's labor force is "constantly diminishing." For every 2,700 pairs of imports, one job is lost for one shoeworker for one year.

The 5-cent "royalty" was called only a token in the resolution approved by the convention—a token made necessary by the fact that manufacturers are now importing some shoes for sale in the same market where their American-made shoes are on sale.

Delegates also instructed officers to work for improvements in salary scales and pensions at contract negotiations coming up next year.

The shoeworkers are seeking a minimum of $2.60 an hour. It was pointed out that many wage settlements have been at the federal minimum wage of $1.60 an hour. The best minimum at present is $2.11 an hour.

The resolution pointed out that "many shoe manufacturers have strongly resisted the union's efforts to improve the low paid shoe workers wages above the federal minimum rate" and that the federal rate "is inadequate to meet living costs."

$3.50 Formula

On pensions, the delegates called on negotiators to secure a minimum pension rate of $3.50 a month for each year of service with no limit on the number of years. The resolution also called for optional retirement after 35 years of service, regardless of age.

John E. Mara was unanimously re-elected president and secretary treasurer for his third four-year term. Also re-elected was Vice Pres. Leo Frieda, and eight members of the general executive board. Leslie King was chosen to succeed Derald Wells from the Wisconsin area.

The proposal to raise dues $1 a month was ratified by a substantial majority after vigorous debate. It provides for a payment of 50 cents a month for the union's strike and defense fund, with another 50 cents to be retained by the member's local union.

Major speakers included AFL-CIO Organization Dir. William L. Kircher; Pres. John I. Rollings of the Missouri AFL-CIO; Dir. Joseph O'Donnell of Harvard University's trade union program; Robert Leverenz of the Leverenz Shoe Co., Sheboygan, Wis., and Vice Pres. H. F. Willhite of the Brown Shoe Co., St. Louis.

UNION MEMBERS filled every available inch of space as the Senate Post Office & Civil Service Committee opened hearings on federal labor-management legislation. Pres. John F. Griner of the American Federation of Government Employes, second from right, called for passage of the bill drawn up by a committee of AFL-CIO unions. Those of the 4,000 delegates to the AFGE's legislative conference who could squeeze into the hearing room demonstrated their support. The others circulated through the Capitol Hill offices, explaining the union goals to their home state congressmen and senators.

Federal Employe Unions Press Drive for Labor Relations Law

CIO Metal Trades Dept., Machinists, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Laborers and Service Employes.

Its goal, Biemiller said, is "to assure federal government employes the same organization and collective bargaining rights as those enjoyed by employes in the private sector."

At the opening of Senate hearings on the bill, Government Employes Pres. John F. Griner termed the AFL-CIO bill the "alternative" to the right to strike if there is to be any meaningful collective bargaining in the federal civil service.

It would be "unwise and unjust," he said, "to continue to let union-management relations in the federal service rest solely on the shallow foundation of executive orders."

It was Pres. Kennedy's Executive Order in 1962 that for the first time set up machinery for union recognition and written contracts in government agencies.

Despite shortcomings in the procedures, workers in hundreds of federal installations and offices voted for union representation and the federal service became the fastest-growing sector of the trade union movement.

Postal workers, already heavily organized, quickly achieved nationwide exclusive bargaining rights and written contracts. Naval shipyards, veterans hospitals, air bases and social security offices became centers of union strength.

A Cabinet-level task force last year recognized a number of the union complaints about the functioning of the program and the limitations put on collective bargaining. But the recommendations for improvements were never formally acted on before the change of Administration. And government unions maintained throughout that policies set by each administration through executive orders were a poor substitute for permanent legislation.

The bill drawn up by the postal, blue collar and white collar AFL-CIO unions provides for two forms of recognition—exclusive for unions representing a majority of workers in a bargaining unit, and formal, where no union has a majority but a union has at least 10 percent membership and no other union has nationwide exclusive recognition.

It includes a code of fair labor practices that bar government administrators from aping union-busting tactics of industry.

For individual grievances, unions with exclusive bargaining recognition would have the right to insist on binding arbitration as a final step.

For disputes between the union and management, including an impasse in contract negotiations and charges of violation of contract provisions, a two-step procedure is set forth:

- Either party may bring in the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service to attempt to mediate the dispute.
- If this fails, either party may submit the dispute to a proposed Federal Service Labor-Management Relations Board for a final decision.

The proposed five-member board, to be appointed by the President for staggered terms with Senate confirmation, combines features of the National Labor Relations Board with that of an arbitration panel.

It would have authority to investigate and resolve disputes and to order agencies to penalize supervisors who deliberately commit unfair labor practices.

Disputes over unit determinations or eligibility to vote in representation elections would, however, be under the jurisdiction of the Dept. of Labor with provisions for arbitration.

Except for specialized agencies such as the Government Printing Office and the semi-autonomous Tennessee Valley Authority, the only federal legislation dealing with labor-management relations is a ban on strikes by government workers and the Lloyd-LaFollette Act of 1912. The 1912 law, for generations considered the Magna Carta of government employe unions, merely declares that postal workers can't be fired or demoted for joining a union and affirms the right of all civil service employes to petition Congress.

'Runaway' Firm Checked in Bid To Avoid Labor Board Penalties

The Supreme Court refused to hear a "runaway" company's appeal from a National Labor Relations Board order in a six-year-old effort by the employer to avoid bargaining with the Ladies' Garment Workers.

It was the court's second rejection of review attempts involving the Garwin Corp., which closed its New York plant in 1963, discharged its employes and hired new workers in Miami, where it reopened under the name of S'Agaro, Inc.

The case got to the high court originally when the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia rejected a portion of an NLRB order requiring Garwin to bargain with the ILGWU for the Florida employes. It was sent back for another order after the high court refused to act.

The new order was later upheld by the same appeals court and the high court again refused to review the action, thus closing the door to further delays. The swimsuit manufacturer must now obey these NLRB remedies to overcome its "massive unfair labor practices":

- Give the union the names and addresses of its Miami area employes.
- Grant the union "reasonable access" to plant bulletin boards for a year.
- Permit employes to have access to union organizers on plant parking lots and approaches during nonworking hours.
- Bargain immediately with the ILGWU on receipt of proof that a majority of unit employes have joined the union.

The high court, in its final session of the last term in which Chief Justice Earl Warren presided, sent four pending cardcheck cases back to the Circuit Courts of Appeal for reconsideration in line with its recent decision in Gissel Packing and three related cases.

The Gissel decision was that the NLRB was acting properly when it ordered four employers to bargain with a union whose cardcheck majority they had destroyed by unlawful threats, penalties and promises of future favors. All four had insisted on a representation election and, while the petitions were being processed, used the time to undermine the union.

These, the NLRB said, were not cases where the employer had a good-faith doubt of the union's majority. Its ruling now must be applied in these additional cases:

Thrift Drug Co. of Pennsylvania for its store in Kenosha, Wis., and Retail Clerks Local 526; Lou DeYoung's Market Basket, Inc., Grand Rapids, Mich., and RCIA Local 20; Pembek Oil Corp., Meriden, Conn., and Teamsters Local 677; Atlas Engine Works, Inc., Gibsonburg, O., and Teamsters Local 20.

The court noted in the RCIA Local 20 case that the co-owner of the store refused to look at the cards when the union asked for recognition, tried to close the market door and in so doing kicked at the union organizer's foot. The appeals court at Cincinnati described the company's conduct as a "substantial and sustained effort to thwart" the employes' efforts to organize.

The same appeals court in the Thrift Drug case rejected the company's claim that application cards were "tainted with misrepresentation." It said the employer acted like a man "determined to defeat unionization regardless of the law" or the wishes of his employes.

Unions Oppose Diluting Ship Cargo Policy

At least half of grain shipments to Soviet-bloc countries should continue to be shipped in American-flag vessels, the AFL-CIO and the Seafarers told Congress.

A letter from SIU Pres. Paul Hall and a telegram from AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller urged the Senate Banking Committee not to tamper with the "50-50 shipping provisions" in any extension of the Export Control Act.

Since the 1963 agreement to sell grain to the Soviet Union, government regulations have required at least 50 percent American-flag representation in the transport of the grain.

Hall warned that elimination of this requirement would mean "the layup of U.S.-flag merchant vessels and the liquidation of jobs of American seamen."

He termed it "unthinkable" that Congress would consider driving American participation in the country's foreign trade below its already "inadequate" 5 percent level.

With the Soviet merchant fleet within reach of overtaking American-flag shipping in size and carrying capacity, abandonment of the 50-50 requirement "would have the effect of allowing the Communists to achieve maritime supremacy by default," Hall warned.

First Test in House:

Vote on Surtax Set, Reform Forces Gain

considered simultaneously with recommendations on meaningful tax reform."

With no possibility of congressional action on the surtax before its scheduled June 30th expiration date, the Senate adopted a resolution extending through July the present withholding rates. The House was scheduled to do likewise. If the surtax is not eventually extended, the extra amount withheld from paychecks would be refunded.

The bill before the House was approved by the Ways & Means Committee by a 16-9 vote. While all 10 committee Republicans voted for the bill, nine of the 15 Democrats were opposed.

Most of them joined in a dissenting report warning that passage of the committee bill would "relax pressures for tax reforms which are critically needed to increase government revenue and eliminate the rampant injustice which threatens the integrity of the nation's tax system."

Enactment of the committee bill would amount to a tax increase, since the surtax was only in effect for nine months of last year. Thus taxpayers would be paying an added 10 percent for 1969 as compared with a 7.5 percent increase last year.

In addition to extending the 10 percent surcharge through the end of 1969 and setting a 5 percent rate for the first six months of 1970. the House bill would repeal the 7 percent investment tax credit and eliminate taxation on people with below povertv-level incomes.

The AFL-CIO expressed its support for both the tax credit repeal and the aid for the poorest taxpayers. But in a letter sent to all congressmen, the federation stressed that "these two desirable sections do not constitute sufficient tax reform to justify the reimposition of an unjust surtax."

The letter noted that "time after time Congress has been promised a genuine tax reform bill and each time it has failed to materialize. Last year, Congress was promised that with the enactment of the surtax, tax reform would be a part of the 1969 legislative program; instead you are again asked to buy a tax and a promise."

Urging House members to vote against any surtax bill that doesn't include thorough tax reform, the AFL-CIO warned: "If the surtax bill passes in its present form, genuine tax reform will once again—despite all ringing promises to the contrary—fade into limbo."

Surge in Interest Rate Held Threat to Economy

Instead of combatting inflation, the interest hike is making it worse, Goldfinger charged. Of the 5.4 percent rise in the consumer price index from April 1968 to April 1969, seven-tenths of 1 percent was the result of higher mortgage interest charges.

"Sharp increases in interest rates discourage business expansion and result in production cutbacks and job losses," he noted. "As builders' loan costs and mortgage rates rise, homebuilders postpone construction. State, county and municipal governments put off their building of hospitals, schools, roads and public buildings. Small and medium-sized businesses—and state and local governments—get hit hard by the increased costs and hold back on expanding their operations."

In the 1950s, Goldfinger reminded the committee, "upward hikes in the prime rate were eventually followed by a recession . . . with untold losses in economic growth and human losses, in terms of jobs and incomes."

It's time, he said, for Congress to lay the groundwork for "much-needed reform of the government's monetary machinery."

The United States "is a rich country, with a powerful and flexible economy." But Goldfinger warned that the nation's economy "cannot continue to prosper under the blows of the sharply rising interest rates of the past year—on top of the rising trend of interest rates since the early 1950s."

Goldfinger urged Congress to give serious study to the problems raised by the power of private banks to impair the nation's economy "for their own profit interests." He suggested that "perhaps a kind of TVA of the banking world is needed," a government-sponsored "yardstick" for lending institutions.

In the Senate, meanwhile, Sen. Thomas J. McIntyre (D-N.H.) introduced legislation to empower the Federal Reserve Board to set a ceiling on the interest rates banks may charge.

The chairman of the Senate Banking Committee, Sen. John J. Sparkman (D-Ala.) has called on banks to cancel the latest increase. He said the rate hike is "terrible, uncalled for and ought to be reversed."

Lewandowski Heads OPEIU Organizing

New York—Arthur P. Lewandowski of Milwaukee has been named director of organization for the Office & Professional Employes succeeding the late Henderson B. Douglas.

Lewandowski has been an organizer and staff member of the OPEIU since 1950, when he graduated from Marquette University with a degree in journalism. Last year he was elected an international vice president.

Life Insurance Cutoff Costs Firm $16,000

It was a $16,000 mistake for a company to ignore a union's offer to pay life insurance premiums for its striking employes, a National Labor Relations Board trial examiner ruled.

Examiner Thomas A. Ricci recommended that the NLRB order the Mueller Brass Co., a Port Huron, Mich. subsidiary of the United States Smelting, Refining & Mining Co., to give $16,000 in death benefits to the widow of William Racely, a Mueller employe for 24 years who died during the 1968 strike of Auto Workers Local 412.

Under Ricci's findings, the firm must not only pay the death benefit which Racely's survivors would have received but must also, in the event of a future strike, give the union the information it needs to make insurance payments for its members.

A strike started Apr. 20, 1968, and was settled three months later.

It was the failure of the employer to pay the premiums, or to cooperate with the union by furnishing the data it needed, that the examiner found an unfair labor practice.

Management discriminated against union members by paying premiums for non-striking employes while letting the strikers' premium payments lapse, the examiner added.

made initially by the Appropriations Committee.

House members did balk slightly at the committee's proposed cut of funds for enforcement of open housing programs from the budget figure of $10 million to only $3 million. It raised the appropriation to $5 million.

Repeal of a ceiling imposed three years ago on the number of poor children who can be helped under the Aid to Families with Dependent Children program appeared certain after agreement by House and Senate conferees.

The freeze on the number of children who could be helped in any state never went into effect because Congress postponed the effective date for a year. Now, with the new deadline approaching, the Senate voted to repeal the AFDC freeze outright and the House conferees went along. Final House approval was expected on June 27.

The Senate concluded a week of off-and-on debate by passing an advisory "sense of the Senate" resolution declaring that a "national commitment" by the United States to defend another country or use armed forces abroad can only stem from "affirmative action" taken by Congress, such as passage of a joint resolution or ratification of a treaty.

The Administration presented to Congress a broad-ranging proposal to expand voting rights in all states, including a nationwide ban on literacy tests.

Atty. Gen. John N. Mitchell appeared before a House Judiciary subcommittee which is considering extension of the 1965 Voting Rights Act. He proposed a law that would apply to all states, not just those where fewer than 50 percent of the voting-age population had been registered prior to the 1965 law.

In addition to the ban on literacy tests, Mitchell proposed:

- A nationwide ban on state residency requirements for presidential elections.
- Authority for the attorney general to send voting examiners and observers anywhere in the nation where he feels they may be needed.
- Authority for the attorney general to seek suspension of any voting laws considered discriminatory.
- Creation of a national voting advisory commission to study voting discrimination and corrupt election practices.

Mitchell had five times asked for a postponement of the date for him to testify on the issue—an indication of the strong disagreement within the Administration on extension or amendment of the law.

He told the subcommittee that "we have come to the firm conclusion that voting rights is no longer a regional issue. It is a national concern for every American which must be treated on a nationwide basis."

Railway Clerks Name Sullivan To No. 2 Post

Cincinnati—The Railway & Airline Clerks announced the resignation of Sec.-Treas. George M. Gibbons and the appointment of Vice Pres. D. J. Sullivan to succeed him on July 1.

Gibbons will remain in union service as a consultant for several months, the union said. He resigned for personal reasons after 12 years in his present post, two years as vice president and 46 years of union membership.

Gibbons went to work on the Southern Pacific railroad in 1923 and joined Golden Spike Lodge 926 at Ogden, Utah.

Sullivan, 52, started work for REA Express in 1937 and joined New York Lodge 2130. He was local president, local chairman, delegate to six union conventions, vice chairman of the New York District Board of Adjustment, and general chairman. He was a delegate from his union to the final AFL convention and the first joint AFL-CIO convention in 1955.

Tax Fight Shifts to Senate, Action Pledged on Reform

At Charleston Medical College:

Hospital Strikers Win Major Goals

Charleston, S.C.—Union hospital workers ended a 100-day strike against the Medical College of South Carolina after accepting a state offer of settlement and began returning to work.

By week's end, the 375 strikers were scheduled to be back on the job with their major goals met. These include reinstatement of 12 workers fired last Mar. 17 for joining the strike of Local 1199B of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union. The settlement also provides for wage increases of 30 to 70 cents an hour, plus other benefits.

The agreement, ratified at a meeting of strikers in Zion-Olivet United Presbyterian Church, has not yet been accepted by officials of Charleston County Hospital, also struck last March. Union members voted to maintain picket lines there until all the strikers have been reinstated.

County Hospital officials offered to rehire 37 of the 69 striking employes and to find jobs at other area hospitals for the remaining 32. But the workers said none will return until all return and advised the county to find jobs in other hospitals for the strikebreakers hired to replace them.

Also, the county commissioners announced they had asked Sen. Strom Thurmond (R) and Rep. L. Mendel Rivers (D) to use their influence with community leaders to find other jobs for the strikers. But that move failed when the strikers voted to reject other jobs.

Thurmond and Rivers had been key figures in blocking an earlier settlement. Local newspapers reported the two had asked Sec. Rob-

Nixon Voting Rights Plan Denounced

A virtually unanimous House Judiciary Committee told Atty. Gen. John N. Mitchell bluntly that it wanted no part of the Nixon Administration's proposal to replace the 1965 Voting Rights Act with a milder but more controversial law that would apply nationwide.

The Administration's proposal has been sharply criticized by the Civil Rights Leadership Conference and Republicans as well as Democrats in Congress who helped pass the 1965 law which was aimed at removing roadblocks to Negro voter registration in southern states.

One of the strongest protests has come from the Rev. Theodore M. Hesburgh, the University of Notre Dame president appointed by Pres. Nixon to head the U.S. Civil Rights Commission.

He said the Administration bill would be "a distinct retreat" on the civil rights front. "It is an

Close House Vote Keeps Surtax Alive

By David L. Perlman

Labor called for "genuine tax reform," not just "sugar-coating," as the Senate prepared to take a long, hard look at the surtax extension bill passed by the House.

The surtax bill squeaked through by a bare 210-205 margin—and then only after a public pledge by the President, by Democratic and Republican leaders and by the chairman of the House Ways & Means Committee that a strong reform bill will be acted on this summer.

"We now confidently expect the Senate to insist that the surtax extension bill not become law until tax justice is achieved," AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller declared.

Biemiller said labor's drive for tax justice was helped by the commitments to tax reform necessary to pass the bill in the House.

"An aroused America," he said, "which has focused congressional attention on the inequities and unfairness in the tax structure, will insist that the Administration and the House leadership keep their word."

The Senate's Democratic Policy Committee, in contrast to the position taken by the House leadership, unanimously declared that the Senate will not take up the surtax extension without acting at the same time on "meaningful tax reform."

The Senate Finance Committee, which has jurisdiction over tax matters, plans full hearings on the House-passed bill.

Despite the pledges of support for tax reform in both the House

Desegregation Guidelines:

Nixon Urged to Bar Softer School Policy

Labor and civil rights groups have urged the Administration not to scuttle the school desegregation program by weakening the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare guidelines.

According to press reports, Pres. Nixon is under heavy pressure from southern Republicans to meet what they consider campaign promises to delay cracking down on school districts that refuse to desegregate. Under the Civil Rights Act, continued discrimination calls for withdrawal of federal funds.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller wired Nixon to "urge most strongly that you reject any efforts to weaken the requirements of the school desegregation program." He said the federation is "disturbed" by the reports that a policy statement diluting the guidelines is being prepared.

Pres. I. W. Abel of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. wrote Nixon that weakening of the desegregation guidelines "is bound to encourage resistance to federal law."

Abel noted that 90 percent of southern school districts are in compliance with the law and "the resistant 10 percent deserve no more leniency. They have had 15 years since the Supreme Court decisions in which to end their dual school systems."

Any change in policy, Abel said, "will only add to the frustration and despair of Negro parents and children who have seen their constitutional rights denied for many years and will see in any further delay an attempt to withhold those rights from them for years to come."

In another letter, Chairman Roy Wilkins of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights cited assurances given by HEW Sec. Robert

Struck Bus Line Cited For Safety Violations

The Federal Highway Administration filed charges of "flagrant" and repeated safety violations against the struck Continental Safeway Trails, Inc., and asked the Interstate Commerce Commission to suspend its certificate to run buses between Washington, Philadelphia, Atlantic City and New York City.

The complaint was the first of the kind filed by the Highway Administration against a major bus line since Apr. 1, 1967, when the agency took over the enforcement of safety regulations from ICC.

The latter agency will decide the next step in legal proceedings, probably after Trailways has filed a reply, an ICC spokesman said.

The charge filed by the Highway Administration was that the company violated one safety regulation more than 6,000 times in the last nine years, and that since an ICC compliance hearing in 1965, the firm has committed at least 1,700 violations involving "great danger" to the public. The regulation prohibits bus and truck lines from allowing drivers to remain on duty more than 70 hours in an eight-day period.

Working conditions were a factor in the strike voted Apr. 1 by 360 bus drivers against the Washington-New York bus line. The drivers, members of Lodge 1023, United Transportation Union, have been complaining to ICC for years

HEW Moves to Curb Profiteering Doctors

The AFL-CIO welcomed a new regulation freezing increases in the fees of physicians participating in Medicaid as a first step toward stopping abuses now plaguing the system.

The freeze, announced by the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare (HEW), was originally proposed by former HEW Secretary Wilbur J. Cohen during the Johnson Administration.

Bert Seidman, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, applauded the new regulation, but stressed that it was an interim step.

"While it spotlights a problem it does not completely solve it," Seidman said. "The new control permits fees based on the lowest 75 percent of the customary fees paid in a given area. This means that in many states where a lower limit now applies medical practitioners may raise fees to that 75 percent level."

More important, Seidman explained, is the fact that the new regulation fails to eliminate the worst aspects of the "fee-for-service system."

"We believe in a per capita or

BREWERY WORKERS in Milwaukee took to the picket line when four major brewers made a "take it or leave it" contract offer. Irv Prichette, right, holds the bat symbolizing employers' bargaining attitude. Others, from the left: Tom Watson, Emil Hassman and Ray Schaefer. All are members of Brewery Workers Local 9 representing 4,500 workers at Schlitz, Miller, Gettelman and Blatz.

Beer Pickets Protest Police Aid to Schlitz

Milwaukee—Picket lines of 4,500 striking members of the Brewery Workers remained firm in the fourth week of a strike against four major brewers in what town boosters call "the beer capital" of the nation.

Pres. John W. Schmitt of the Wisconsin AFL-CIO and Pres. Kenneth Mueller of Brewery Workers Local 9 met with city police officials to protest the use of "massed" police in a recent attempt to help the Schlitz brewery ship out beer produced by company officials and hired strikebreakers.

Police used unnecessary force to break through picket lines, the union charged. But Mueller said, "we'll take action further on that matter in due time; right now we want to win a fair contract."

Union members are picketing around the clock at breweries of the Joseph Schlitz Brewing Co., Miller Brewing Co., Gettelman Brewing Co.—a division of Miller—and Blatz beer, produced by the Pabst Brewing Co.

The strike started June 9, eight days after expiration of the old two-year contracts. The union charged the companies with making no real effort to bargain, except on wages. Federal mediators attempted to get negotiations resumed but deferred their efforts when management showed little interest, the union said.

Picketing has been peaceful and there was no disorder until June 23, when police descended on the Schlitz brewery en masse. Mueller said pickets were handled roughly and 31 were arrested on charges of disorderly conduct.

The strike of the brewers is the first since 1953, when union members stayed out for 76 days to win an acceptable offer.

Meanwhile there is no shortage of beer in the town's lager emporiums. Out-of-town brands are on sale everywhere—a condition that will continue through Old Milwaukee Days, the city's annual six-day July celebration, unless the brewers resume good-faith bargaining, the union says.

Elsewhere, members of Beer Bottlers Local 187 in St. Louis returned to work after a four-week layoff at the Anheuser-Busch brewery. The layoffs resulted from a Teamsters' strike that halted production, the Brewery Workers' local said.

Plumbers Announce Two New Officers

Pres. Peter T. Schoemann of the Plumber & Pipe Fitters announced the appointment of general organizers Joseph A. Walsh as executive vice president and Owen P. Kelly as assistant secretary-treasurer of the union. Walsh succeeds William T. Dodd, recently named secretary-treasurer. Kelly takes over from Leslie E. Dilg, who retired July 1.

New Lending Law Bares True Interest Charges

Truth-in-lending became the law of the land this week.

The new law, enacted during the Johnson Administration, requires that the consumer know in writing and in clear language exactly how much interest he will pay on credit offered on cash loans, goods or personal service and on credit for family, household and agricultural use up to $25,000. The amount borrowed for real estate transactions is also covered without the $25,000 limit.

Thus, a borrower may now be surprised to find that the "1½ percent" monthly interest payment he has been making to his department store on his credit card balance is really 18 percent yearly.

The law also requires a creditor to spell out what he means by "small extra charges" and forbids "come-on" advertisements unless full details on true interest rates are provided.

The act permits a borrower to bring suit against a violating lender for twice the amount of finance charges up to $1,000, plus court and legal costs. Willful violators can also face criminal charges and fines of up to $5,000 and maximum jail sentences.

Radio Station Hit on Refusal Of Boycott Ads

Quincy, Fla. — Radio station WCNH has been charged by the Meat Cutters with refusing to sell air time to publicize the union's appeal to the public not to buy Frosty Morn meat products. The brand is produced by strikebreakers at the Neuhoff Co. plant here and in two other locations.

In a formal complaint to the Federal Communications Commission the union cited the FCC's fairness doctrine involving other types of advertising. It said the fact that all the strikers and a majority of company employes are Negroes adds racial overtones to the incident.

The company frequently buys air time to promote Frosty Morn products but the station refused to sell time to the union, it charged.

The union told the FCC that the station is its last remaining link with the public since the Gadsden County Times, local weekly paper, refused it advertising space and law enforcement officers have threatened to arrest union handbillers.

The Meat Cutters asked for the right to intervene in any license renewal proceedings for WCNH.

The Neuhoff strike, which started 14 months ago, was cited in the Congressional Record in remarks of Rep. William R. Anderson (D-Tenn.). He charged that American workers suffer when the Defense Dept. makes purchases from struck plants like those of Neuhoff and called on the department to reconsider its procurement policies.

The story of the Neuhoff strike is told by the union in a new 15-minute movie called "Our Struggle in the South." It may be ordered from the Education Dept. of the Meat Cutters, 2800 Sheridan Rd., Chicago, Ill. 60657.

Labor Educators Elect Dr. Gray

Philadelphia—Dr. Lois S. Gray has been elected president of the University Labor Education Association at its annual meeting here.

Mrs. Gray, who is metropolitan district director of Cornell University's School of Industrial & Labor Relations, succeeds Dr. Herbert A. Levine of Rutgers University. She was elected to a two-year term.

Re-elected secretary-treasurer of the ULEA was Harvey L. Friedman, assistant director of the University of Massachusetts Labor & Research Center. Friedman will be serving his second two-year term.

First Step Against Abuses:

HEW Moves to Curb Profiteering Doctors

capitation system," he added, "whereby a certain amount is paid per participating person to cover all medical services."

Seidman said he understood that HEW is looking into such a system now.

The HEW action followed a reports issued by the Health Insurance Benefits Advisory Council (HIBAC), the top advisory body supervising the workings of both Medicaid and Medicare.

HIBAC is composed of 22 members from fields related to hospital, medical and other health activities as well as representatives of the public. Its members include Nelson Cruikshank, former director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security and president of the National Council of Senior Citizens, and NCSC Executive Director William R. Hutton.

The HIBAC report called on HEW to take major steps to stop abuses in the Medicaid and Medicare programs. It was especially critical of some doctors who it charged, are currently bleeding the programs of millions of dollars.

But abuses are not confined merely to overcharging, the report to HEW pointed out.

Excessive services were cited as a second abuse.

Grossly Inferior Services

Also, the report charged, "medical services have on occasion been delivered which are grossly inferior and harmful to the patient as judged by commonly accepted professional standards."

HIBAC has also recommended legislation to permit HEW to discontinue payments to doctors or suppliers who engage in abuses.

The new HEW regulation was published in the Federal Register and the public may comment on it before July 31.

Meanwhile, a Senate committee probing the spiraling abuses by doctors and medical suppliers participating in Medicare and Medicaid was told that "some doctors are going to have to go to jail" for defrauding the government.

The comment was made by Sen. Russell B. Long (D-La.), chairman of the Senate Finance Committee which has been hearing complaints about fraudulent and questionable medical practices.

The hearings came in the wake of widespread reports of abuses from many parts of the nation.

In Baltimore, for example, seven local doctors and a dental intern were convicted of charges that they conspired to defraud the state in its Medicaid program. Five other medical men and pharmacists are awaiting trial on similar charges. In California, the state attorney general has charged that many doctors, pharmacists, nursing homes and other health care participants are bilking the Medicaid program of between $6 and $8 million yearly "by illegal and unethical activities."

At the Senate hearings, Long reported that some doctors are now voluntarily returning funds to Medicare in the mistaken belief that investigation into their activities will be stopped.

He said that one doctor returned $45,000, a second $25,000 and a third $10,000.

Long also cited the case of a general practitioner who billed Medicare for $58,000 in one year covering house calls to 49 patients.

HEW officials said the department is taking steps to halt such abuses and asked the committee for legislative authority to bar doctors and institutions from further participation in Medicare and Medicaid if they were found to be involved in such practices.

They said the social security numbers of doctors are now being listed on all payment records. Previously, committee staff members said, some doctors were using a "Swiss bank account system" which made it virtually impossible to match doctors with amounts paid them.

In other action, the Senate passed and sent to the House a compromise measure aimed at permitting states to continue qualifying for federal Medicaid funds while operating within the bounds of financial problems they faced.

Alfred Harding Dies; Retired Equity Editor

New York—Alfred Harding, former reporter and drama critic who became editor of Equity magazine in 1923, died here at 77. He retired 12 years ago as editor and assistant to the president of Actors' Equity Association.

The author of books including The Revolt of the Actors, Harding was a delegate to the 1936 International Congress of the Theater in Vienna, Austria, and helped organize the New York City school theater program in 1941. Harding was buried in Washington, D.C., after services at the National Cathedral.

'I Thought Medicare Was for Me!'

Anniversary Conference Ends:

New ILO Standards Govern Health Care, Farm Workers

Geneva—The International Labor Organization ended its 50th anniversary conference after adopting new labor standards governing medical benefits and the right of farm workers to organize for their own advancement.

Jean Moeri, the Swiss trade unionist who served as conference president, hailed the new conventions in an address closing the historic three-week gathering. But he called also for a redoubling of international efforts to guarantee workers their fundamental rights.

"We can be proud of having secured recognition on an international scale for the most fundamental rights of man, and especially of workers," he told worker, employer and government delegates from 116 nations.

"We must ask ourselves now if it is not necessary to lay greater emphasis on programs designed to ensure that the worker is able . . . to exercise these rights freely."

Moeri is the first worker representative to preside over the annual ILO assembly.

The new convention on medical care and sickness benefits upgrades and broadens one on sickness insurance alone that was adopted by the ILO in 1927.

A major feature of the new convention is a provision that preventive care to help workers and their dependents to avoid illness must be an integral part of all medical benefit plans. It also provides for the continuation of medical aid for as long as it is required.

Governments that ratify an ILO convention must insure that its provisions are being met in their country either by national legislation or other arrangements conforming to local law and customs.

All member governments are committed by the ILO constitution to seek ratification of the conventions by their countries and to work toward the even higher goal set out in the more flexible recommendations that are also part of the international standards drafted at each conference session.

Commenting on the action taken on medical care and sickness benefits, Bert Seidman, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, told the conference that the American trade union movement is determined to have a national health insurance program in the United States as "rapidly as possible."

The conference's action on the medical issue will give trade unions and "other progressive forces in my country a renewed strength and determination to establish a comprehensive system of health insurance," he said.

Earlier, the conference adopted a convention to assure that farm workers enjoy the rights to which they are entitled by the establishment of independent agricultural labor inspection systems.

The delegates also completed preliminary drafts of new standards for assuring that minimum wage scales are established and respected. These standards, to be put into final form by next year's conference, will obligate ratifying governments to see that the necessary machinery exists for setting such scales.

The minimum wages, according to the proposed convention, are to have force of law and any failure to respect them should be punished by "appropriate penal or other sanctions."

Expressing satisfaction with the texts approved by the conference, Clothing Workers Pres. Jacob Potofsky said:

"A decent minimum wage is one of the keystones of a modern industrial society, protector of working people, of decent employers, and of the taxpayer."

Joseph M. Pomarlen of the Ladies' Garment Workers worked with Potofsky on the committee that drafted the minimum wage texts.

The conference also approved the first draft of a revised convention that would establish the principle that all workers are entitled to three weeks of paid vacation a year. The minimum for workers under 18 should be even longer under the draft that Richard H. Nolan, executive vice president of the Operating Engineers, helped prepare.

A preliminary outline for a program of youth employment and training plans for developing countries likewise won the conference's endorsement. The essential elements of such plans should include the "safeguarding of human dignity," said the text prepared by a committee that included former Pres. P. L. Siemiller of the Machinists and Lane Kirkland, the AFL-CIO's new secretary-treasurer.

A watchdog committee that checks to see that member countries are conforming to their obligations denounced Portugal for failing to abide by its pledge under the ILO convention on the abolition of forced labor.

Atty. Edward J. Hickey, Jr., the American labor representative on the committee, told the conference that by its work each year the special group had "justifiably earned the accolade of being the 'conscience of the ILO.' "

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany headed the labor group that advised U.S. Worker Delegate Rudolph Faupl. Meany made the team's keynote address at the conference of nearly 1,400 delegates and their advisers.

At a one-day meeting that immediately followed the conference, the ILO Governing Body elected without a formal vote Hector Gros Espiell, Uruguayan government delegate, as its chairman for one year. But the worker delegates on the Governing Body, or executive council, abstained in the election because of what Moeri called the "intolerable" violation of trade union rights by the Uruguayan authorities. Gros Espiell succeeds George L-P Weaver, former U. S. Assistant Secretary of Labor for International Affairs.

MORE JOB OPPORTUNITIES—a goal of the International Labor Organization—is an objective which the AFL-CIO long has sought, Federation Pres. George Meany tells the ILO at its 50th anniversary conference in Geneva, Switzerland.

Siemiller and DeMore Saluted on Retirement

Hundreds of Machinists, fellow trade unionists and government officials paid tribute to P. L. Siemiller and Matthew DeMore in Washington.

Siemiller, president of the IAM since 1965, and DeMore, secretary-treasurer for the past four years, turned over the top administration of the union to Floyd E. Smith and Eugene Glover on July 1.

The reception and farewell dinner for the two retiring Machinist officers drew more than 1,700 well-wishers. In addition to government dignitaries, the attendance list read like a who's who of the labor movement.

Pres. I. W. Abel of the Steelworkers, who delivered the main address, noted that Siemiller's and DeMore's long careers in the IAM have mirrored the progress of the nation and the labor movement.

Gifts from various IAM lodges around the nation were presented to both men, including paintings, jewelry, hunting equipment and desk sets.

Sec. of Labor George P. Shultz gave his best wishes to the retiring officials as he delivered the Labor Dept.'s Award of Merit to Siemiller and DeMore.

In his comments, Shultz cited the need of a strong labor movement in the nation and noted that collective bargaining must continue to be an effective factor in maintaining the strength of the economy.

The role in the progress of America's space program played by IAM members under Siemiller and DeMore was stressed by Dr. George E. Miller of the National Aeronautics & Space Administration. NASA's appreciation was symbolized by the presentation to Siemiller of an astronaut's arm patch that was carried in the lunar orbit of Apollo 10.

Siemiller told his well-wishers that the prestige of the Machinists continues at an all-time high. But despite its strong position, neither the IAM nor any other union can stand alone without the support of a strong and unified labor movement. He called on all members to help maintain the unity.

Remarking on the contributions made to the union by Siemiller and DeMore during their tours in office, new IAM Pres. Smith promised "you will not be forgotten."

Board Raps Hosiery Firm On Unfair Acts

Kayser-Roth Hosiery Co.'s reaction to its employes' self-organization drive at Dayton, Tenn., was "violent and unlawful," the National Labor Relations Board ruled in a refusal-to-bargain case.

The ruling ended five years of legal strife for the employes who wanted a union. The company lost the economic phase of its battle last December when it yielded to a seven-month strike and an AFL-CIO boycott and signed a one-year contract with the Textile Workers Union of America.

The NLRB upheld Examiner Thomas A. Ricci's findings that Kayser-Roth launched a campaign of unfair labor practices after its employes filed an election petition in 1964.

"Management representatives threatened retaliation against employes in many ways, and even discharged a number of them," the examiner found.

When the election was held, the company challenged the right of fired workers to vote, delaying the vote count. The NLRB ruled six workers had been unlawfully fired because of their union activities and two others were fired after the election for the same reason, Ricci noted.

The board certified the union in 1967, but when Kayser-Roth refused to bargain in good faith on major issues, the workers struck. During the strike TWUA filed a refusal-to-bargain charge, the subject of the latest NLRB decision.

CWA Vice President Named Aide to Beirne

George M. Miller, vice president of the Communications Workers District 1 that takes in the New York-New England area, has been appointed an assistant to CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne.

Miller fills a vacancy created when Gus Cramer, one of Beirne's three assistants, was elected executive vice president.

Morton Bahr, assistant to Miller for the past six years, has been named to take over the top District 1 post.

without result, until now, the local said.

Also on strike against the same line are 250 ticket agents, baggage handlers and garage personnel in Philadelphia, Baltimore and New York. They are members of Transit Union Local 1112 and have, like the drivers, been unable to get management to bargain in good faith, the ATU said.

Marvin E. Walsh of Washington is president of Safeway Trails, Inc., a unit of Continental Trailways which recently was swallowed up by Holiday Inns of America in a conglomerate type of merger.

The union said Walsh walked out of the first meeting Apr. 7 without any attempt to bargain in good faith. At another meeting June 11, Walsh threw on the table a copy of his previous summary statement and mediation efforts again ended in stalemate, the local reported.

"The longer the strike lasts, the less there'll be for the strikers," union members quote Walsh as saying.

Support for the strike has been offered not only by the local labor movement including AFL-CIO Region 3 Director George Craig but also by local officeholders.

Rep. Joshua Eilberg (D-Pa.) broadcast from the picket lines a televised message of support and wrote Walsh urging him to "reconsider your position and give the drivers what they want—restoration of their dignity as human beings."

The conditions under which Safeway Trails drivers have to work "are in need of a complete overhaul," the congressman said. Walsh's reply was that Eilberg should stick to his job as congressman and let Walsh run the bus line, the union reported.

IBEW Utility Pact Contains 6.5% Hike

Walnut Creek, Calif.—More than 16,000 employes of the Pacific Gas & Electric Co. will receive raises averaging 27 cents an hour under an agreement ratified by members of Local 1245, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

A 6.5 percent wage increase will apply to the final year of four-year contracts. The union represents 13,400 operating, construction and maintenance workers and 3,300 clerical employes. All had received increases in each of the previous three contract years, union Business Mgr. Ronald T. Weakley said.

Postal Unions Push Bid for Catch-Up Hike

Postal unions pressed Congress for an emergency cost-of-living increase on top of an automatic 4.1 percent salary hike stemming from a 1967 law. And the president of the Letter Carriers warned a House subcommittee that the bitterness of workers over the meager increase could erupt into a series of wildcat strikes—despite efforts by the union to "cool it."

NALC Pres. James H. Rademacher urged quick passage of a 5.4 percent additional increase to catch up with living costs and match the average increase for other government employes.

He said bluntly that he had put his own job on the line by warning against an illegal strike and he cited a recent demonstration by New York City postal workers in which workers and police clashed as evidence that "the crisis is here."

As a matter of principle, Rademacher said, the union has filed a court suit challenging the constitutionality of the law prohibiting work stoppages by federal employes.

Clerks' Blast

The Postal Clerks, representing the largest group of Post Office Dept. employes, have blasted the 4.1 percent raise as "totally inadequate."

The UFPC contrasted the increase contained in Pres. Nixon's executive order on pay adjustment with the President's comments on "underpaid" postal workers last February in a speech to top Post Office officials.

The President told the department's executives that he was aware that in some cities a postal worker might make $4,000 a year less than a sanitation worker. He asked the postal officials to pass the word to the department's rank-and-file employes "that we back them. Let them know that better days are coming."

Sugar-Coating Won't Do

THE ISSUE is tax justice.

The battle is not won even though just about everyone is now on record for tax reform.

But it can be won and it will be won if the American people continue to let their congressmen and senators know that lip service is not enough. What some people call "tax reform" just isn't tax justice.

A few token "reforms" that still leave glaring loopholes for corporations and wealthy individuals will not meet the need.

In the House of Representatives, supporters of the surtax bill pledged that a strong tax reform bill will be forthcoming this summer. Even with that assurance and the heaviest of political pressure, the surtax bill squeaked through only by the narrowest of margins.

In the Senate, the Democratic Policy Committee unanimously declared that "any proposal to extend the income tax surcharge" should "be considered simultaneously with recommendations on meaningful tax reform."

So we have the promises. Now we await the action.

WILL THERE BE real tax justice, a deep and meaningful rewriting of tax laws?

Will the tax loopholes that are open only to the wealthy be closed—tight? And will there be a redistribution of the tax burden to take some of the load off the average taxpayer?

Or will congressmen and senators insist on this or that exemption—to help some influential corporations in their home states or some wealthy campaign contributors?

We have seen signs of this in the House debate and in the Ways & Means Committee. And we will see much more in the weeks ahead.

EARLIER THIS YEAR, the AFL-CIO presented to the Ways & Means Committee a detailed blueprint for closing tax loopholes and realigning the tax structure to provide relief for both the low and middle income taxpayer. Our proposal would also produce enough extra revenue to finance the programs so urgently needed to salvage the cities, improve education, eliminate hunger and provide jobs for all able to work.

Certainly any tax reform legislation adopted by Congress should approach as closely as possible these goals.

This we know. The sparse reform proposals submitted to date by the Nixon Administration don't come close to meeting the requirements for tax justice. Congress must do better, much better, if it is to obtain the confidence of the American people.

We have heard the promises, the assurances.

Now we await the action. To extend the surtax without meaningful tax reform is merely to compound inequity, since those who evade their fair share of taxes pay no surtax on their exempt income.

Over the years, the original ability-to-pay concept of the income tax has been corrupted by the special privileges written into the law.

Congress and the ingenuity of high-priced tax lawyers created these loopholes. Now is the time to close them—all of them.

Simple Arithmetic Discounts Backlash 'Victory' in New York

By John P. Roche

THE RESULTS of the New York mayoralty primary have touched off a new wave of gloomy assessments about the character of the American people. Unfortunately people who can't add seem quite capable of writing.

For instance, the Christian Science Monitor, my favorite daily news magazine, featured a surprisingly uninformed article attributing the New York decisions to "massive conservative voter backlash." After hanging crape in memory of Mayor John Lindsay and ex-Mayor Robert Wagner, the reporter observed that "the devastating results may prompt liberals to question the future of liberal-moderate governments in the nation's major cities." The same theme was widely echoed in the press and on television.

There is no question but that John Marchi beat Lindsay and that Mario Procaccino topped the Democratic ticket. But what appalls me is that nobody seems to have examined the election statistics before rushing off to announce another triumph for vicious racism.

Even if one assumes for purposes of argument that Marchi and Procaccino are "racists" (and I am not ready to accept this hypothesis without a lot more evidence than has turned up to date; they are clearly not liberals, but that is hardly an indictable offense), they received between them about 37 percent of the votes cast in the election. This is hardly a resounding victory for "law and order."

Admittedly, close counts only in horseshoes, but it is pushing a slogan rather hard to write the New York City Republicans off as racists because Marchi topped Lindsay by about 6,000 votes in a 217,000 total. And on the other side of the street, Procaccino won with about a third of the Democrats behind him.

In other words, two-thirds of the Democrats and about half the GOP voted liberal in the broad sense of the word. If Norman Mailer and Congressman James Scheuer had not been playing games, either Herman Badillo or Robert Wagner would have easily topped Procaccino.

I feel no compulsion to play psychiatrist for the Republicans; by any reasonable criteria Marchi is far more of a Republican than Lindsay. I have always found "liberal Republicans" to be ideological frauds. As Sen. Gene McCarthy so neatly put it, "they accompany Nixon into battle to shoot the wounded." In short, I see no reason why a New York Republican had to be a "racist" to vote against Lindsay. All he had to be was a Republican.

However, on the Democratic front it is crystal clear that the liberals lost because of their own political incompetence, not because they were drowned in a tidal wave of backlash. Note the figures again: the winner, Procaccino—252,000; then two liberals—Wagner—222,000; Badillo—215,000. Then two marginal liberal clowns sharing another 80,000.

IT WOULD BE NICE to think that the noble liberal Democrats in New York City went down bravely, fighting against hopeless odds. In fact, they committed suicide and handed the nomination to Procaccino on a platter.

Reassuring as it may be to blame one's futility on cosmic forces, in New York—and elsewhere—liberals must realize that the fault lies not in their stars but in themselves. For some time now the liberal gurus have been announcing that the American people are longing for "new politics." Yet in practical terms the crisis is not one of ideas but of organization.

When we reach the point where two-thirds of the New York Democratic electorate cannot be mobilized behind one candidate, and a conservative minority walks off with the prize, the time has come to emphasize old politics rather than new. Franklin D. Roosevelt would seem to be more relevant than John Kenneth Galbraith.

House Rollcall Vote on Surtax Bill

The House on June 30 voted 210-205 to extend the 10 percent surtax. Labor opposed the bill because it did not contain meaningful tax reforms.

Right votes (R) against the surtax bill were cast by 179 Democrats and 26 Republicans. Wrong votes (W) for the bill were cast by 154 Republicans and 56 Democrats.

Numerals show congressional districts; PR—paired right; PW—paired wrong; A—absent and not paired.

DELEGATES to the Newspaper Guild convention in San Antonio handbill the J. C. Penney Co. downtown store seeking public support for Los Angeles members on strike for more than a year against Hearst's Herald-Examiner. The Penney chain continues to advertise in the struck paper while a number of other firms have pulled out.

Election Contests Set:

Guild Slates Vote On 4% Assessment

San Antonio, Tex.—The Newspaper Guild's 36th annual convention here ordered a referendum on an increased assessment schedule to bolster the union's 18-month strike against Hearst's Los Angeles Herald-Examiner and to arm for future strike emergencies.

Guild members will vote Aug. 21 through 26 on increasing the present schedule of $1 to $6 a month to 4 percent of a week's salary per month.

The referendum will be held simultaneously with international elections for two of the Guild's three top offices and 10 of 12 vice presidencies.

Incumbent Sec.-Treas. Charles A. Perlik, Jr., and Brian L. Flores, administrative officer of the Washington-Baltimore Guild, were nominated for president at the convention. The delegates had voted earlier to change the executive vice president's title to president and that of president to international chairman.

James B. Woods, the current president, was re-elected to the post under its new title, without opposition. Woods had supported the change in titles.

Robert Crocker, a former president of the Wire Service Guild, is running for secretary-treasurer on a slate with Perlik, while Ned Sweet, secretary of the San Antonio Guild, is seeking the post on a ticket with Flores.

The 4 percent assessment schedule was sent to referendum by a 372-to-46 vote after a proposal for a $12 ceiling was defeated in another rollcall.

The convention rejected an executive board proposal to ease the pressure on the Guild's defense fund by eliminating benefits during the first week of strikes and lockouts and by offsetting vacation pay and unemployment insurance against benefits.

But it instructed the board to name a committee of local leaders to study the whole problem of strike financing and make recommendations to next year's convention.

And it voted to ease the drain on defense fund assets by a special 10-percent increase in per-capita payments to the Guild's general fund to halt reimbursement by the defense fund to the general fund for salaries and expenses of international representatives on strike assignments.

In another action, the convention increased the Guild's wage goal for experienced key editorial, advertising and circulation jobs from $340.50 a week to $372 and for all other adult classifications from $170.25 to $186 to keep pace with increases in productivity and the cost of living. And it increased the goal for key starting minimums to $248, raising its ratio to the goal for fully experienced employes from one-half to two-thirds.

The convention incorporated into its collective bargaining program a demand for company training programs "with emphasis on socially and culturally disadvantaged minority groups."

Recommending "continued concentration on collective bargaining," the delegates urged locals to set up coordinated bargaining and organizing programs with an annual goal of at least 3 percent growth in membership.

Rallying to the support of striking Los Angeles Guild members, convention delegates marched 200-strong to distribute boycott handbills at the downtown San Antonio outlet of the J. C. Penney Co., a major advertiser.

In other actions, the convention:

- Called on Congress to reject "the broad, unnecessary and unregulated antitrust immunity" that would be granted the newspaper industry by the so-called Newspaper Preservation Bill, which was tabled indefinitely the next day by the Senate Antitrust Subcommittee.
- Urged publishers, legislators and the courts to protect such "proper privileges" of newsmen as that of withholding identification of confidential sources and called on publishers to resist attempts to "use news gatherers as arms of the court in such manner as to impair their usefulness as news gatherers."
- Decried increasing "harassment, intimidation and physical attack" on reporters and photographers by police and criticized the City of Chicago and Mayor Richard J. Daley for "failing to exercise control over the police department during demonstrations accompanying last year's Democratic National Convention, when several newsmen were assaulted."
- Reaffirmed all-out support of striking California grape workers and pledged financial and moral assistance to "the gallant battle being waged for union recognition" by hospital workers in Charleston, S.C.

Administration Voting Rights Bill Condemned as Backward Move

open invitation to those states which denied the vote to minority citizens in the past to resume doing so," Father Hesburgh warned.

Mitchell contended the Administration bill would be a step forward by banning literacy tests in all states, not just those with a past record of race discrimination. It would also eliminate residency requirements for voting in presidential elections.

But the bill would drop one of the chief safeguards against evasion of the law in the states where it applies—a requirement that any changes in state or local voting laws be approved by the attorney general or by a federal court in Washington before they can take effect.

And opponents also warned that the controversy and delay over passage of entirely new legislation—as contrasted with extension of the present law—could result in no legislation at all.

Separation Urged

House Judiciary Committee Chairman Emanuel Celler (D-N.Y.) said Congress should first extend the present law, then take up the Administration's proposals as separate legislation.

The senior Republican on the committee, Rep. William M. McCulloch of Ohio, charged that the Administration bill "creates a remedy for which there is no wrong and leaves grievous wrongs without adequate remedy." He asked: "What kind of civil rights bill is that?"

The Washington spokesman for the NAACP, Clarence Mitchell, denounced what he termed "a sophisticated, calculated, incredible effort on the part of the chief lawyer of the United States government to make it impossible to continue the constructive efforts we have followed."

Earlier, the AFL-CIO had testified for extension of the 1965 law for another five years as a first priority.

Although the existing law does not expire until mid-1970, the House Judiciary Committee is trying to get an extension bill through this year to avoid the danger of last-minute delaying tactics if action is put off until the second session of Congress.

In other Capitol Hill developments:

- Congress gave final approval to repeal of a "freeze" on the number of children eligible for federal help under the Aid to Families with Dependent Children program. The ceiling was imposed three years ago as part of a work-training program for mothers receiving AFDC benefits, but never went into effect. Last year its effective date was postponed one year. And this year, hours before the fund limitation was to become effective the restriction was repealed outright.
- A labor-opposed bill to exempt newspapers with joint operating agreements from antitrust laws was sidetracked by a Senate Judiciary subcommittee. Subcommittee Chairman Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.) said no date has been set for resuming consideration of the bill.
- The Senate Agriculture Committee approved a bill to make food stamps available to more people, but refused to go along with proposals to give free stamps to the very poorest families and to provide direct federal distribution of the stamps in counties which have refused to take part in the program.

Efforts to strengthen the bill will be made on the Senate floor.

The committee bill would permit the federal government to operate food stamp programs in more than 400 counties or cities which do not have them only if the governor of the state approves.

The Senate has already passed a bill authorizing an increase in food stamp funds from the $340 million ceiling in present law to $750 million for this fiscal year and the committee proposed doubling that figure to $1.5 billion for the next fiscal year.

Action has been held up in the House, however, where Agriculture Committee Chairman W. R. Poage has said he will combine food stamp legislation with an extension of the farm subsidy program in order to pick up liberal votes for the farm program.

- The Senate Labor subcommittee, which includes 12 of the 17 members of the full Labor & Public Welfare Committee, approved a strong coal mine health and safety bill. It would set the limit of coal dust in mines—the cause of "black lung" disease—at 3 miligrams per cubic meter of air six months after the law takes effect, with temporary extensions if the timetable proves too rapid in specific cases. After six years, the permissible coal dust level would drop to 2 miligrams, which the subcommittee said would virtually eliminate the black lung danger. The employers' association in the industry has attacked the bill as "unworkable."

Deck Officers' Accord Halts Tanker Strike

New York—Ship captains and other deck officers began returning to work on some vessels in the American tanker fleet as the Masters, Mates & Pilots reached tentative settlement of a strike that began June 16.

The accord, subject to 24 hours' cancellation notice, follows the pattern of improvements set by the union in recent agreements with operators of freight and passenger vessels.

The new pacts provide an equivalent package of benefits for about 1,200 licensed officers on 114 tankers whose operators sign the agreement with MM&P.

Nearly half the affected ships are sailing again, and the others are expected to sail shortly. But negotiations on contract language may be protracted, the union warned, and another walkout could be called if disputes remain unsettled.

The major aim of the strike was to achieve economic primacy for ship's masters. This was achieved on dry cargo vessels by granting captains an extra 60 days' vacation or the cash equivalent, and on tankers by a similar arrangement. Both methods insure that the master will be the highest-compensated man on the ship.

The new pacts call for a 6 percent salary hike across the board, and substantial increases in pension and welfare benefits.

The union is seeking similar terms from operators of "independent" fleets. Other unions settled their contracts along parallel lines and now offer to settle with tankers. They include the National Maritime Union, Marine Engineers Beneficial Association and the American Radio Association.

BACKPAY FOR FIRED textile workers at J. P. Stevens & Co., Inc., plants passed the $1 million mark with presentation of a check for $9,419 to Mrs. Christine Fendley of the company's Dunean plant at Greenville, S. C. Fired for membership in the Textile Workers Union of America, Mrs. Fendley won reinstatement and her lost pay in a National Labor Relations Board order, plus another $18,493 owed her late husband Amos and $4,887 in insurance benefits. Also reinstated was her daughter-in-law Susan. left, shown with Alfred L. Motley, right, of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

Bids Unions Take Lead:

EEOC Chief Spurs Fight on Job Bias

Vancouver, Wash.—Unions should take the lead in equal opportunity to make sure that "change comes by leaps and bounds," Chairman William H. Brown III of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission told the Aluminum Workers' convention in his first talk to a union gathering since his appointment in May.

Brown urged the 90 delegates to do more to help eliminate discrimination in business and industry, regardless of where the blame for that discrimination might lie.

"Examine your bargaining agreements," he urged, and review the practices at each mill and plant and office "to assure that discrimination is not occurring."

Even where discrimination does not flow out of a bargaining agreement, where it may follow a "unilateral management decision," Brown called on labor to use all its "formal and informal powers to eradicate it."

Unions, Brown said, must become "relevant vehicles for needed change."

The convention raised per capita payments from $2 to $3 and rejected a proposal to choose officers by national referendum. The delegates returned Pres. Henry S. Olsen to office for a full four-year term. Olsen, who has held the top post for two years, was unopposed as head of the 32,000-member union. Sec.-Treas. Patrick J. Reilly was not up for re-election.

Other convention speakers included Executive Sec.-Treas. Peter M. McGavin of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept.; Sec.-Treas. Joseph Lewis of the federation's Union Label & Service Trades Dept. and Regional Manpower Administrator Kenneth C. Robertson of the Labor Dept.

Robertson urged union members to have "compassion" for poverty-level persons who are brought into the plants to work along side them.

"Some of these young men who enter the plant do not know how to get along with their co-workers," Robertson said. He asked union workers to help them and thus assist in the programs "which are designed to bring welfare recipients and others into a status similar to your own—that of being part of the working, tax-paying force."

McGavin forcefully told delegates the United States is no longer a leading maritime nation. "Neglect and indifference have caused us to rank only fifth in the world," he said.

At the same time, he added, productivity on the part of maritime workers has risen 444 percent. He spoke of the continued importance of shipping, noting that 98 percent of the supplies to Viet Nam go by ship. He urged local unions in port cities to join local maritime councils.

Lewis praised the AWIU for the part it has played in past union-industries shows. He also stressed the danger to American industries and American workers posed by the flood of imports from low-wage countries.

The convention delegates, who chose Sheffield, Ala., as the site of the tenth biennial convention in 1971, took no official stand on future contract demands, but gave clear indication they want the AWIU leadership to make another major fight for cost-of-living provisions in future contracts.

The delegates adopted a resolution backing the grape boycott of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee and condemning the Dept. of Defense for its decision to increase the amount of table grapes it purchases.

Other resolutions supported a $2 minimum wage with universal coverage, called for an increase in social security and medicare benefits, backed health insurance for the disabled, supported occupational safety and health legislation, asked AFL-CIO state central bodies to fight in their legislatures for modern registration and election procedures, and hailed the new AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center.

STRIKING HOSPITAL WORKERS at Charleston, S. C., applaud the announcement that the Medical College Hospital of South Carolina agreed to reinstate 12 workers fired last Mar. 17, and accepted other terms offered by Local 1199B of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union. Members approved the settlement for the 375 strikers and continued their efforts to win similar terms from Charleston County Hospital.

Hospital Workers Win Key Strike Objectives

ert H. Finch of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare to hold up threatened penalties against the state hospital and to make a personal investigation into the extent of its compliance with federal law.

HEW had found after an investigation that the hospital was not in compliance with equal employment opportunity provisions of the executive order governing federal contractors. It warned that the hospital was in danger of losing $12 million federal research grants unless it developed an "affirmative program" of hiring and training employes.

The hospital offered to settle the dispute but backed off when Thurmond and Rivers stepped in, holding up the eventual agreement for two weeks.

When the County Hospital refused to follow the lead of the state hospital in reaching an agreement, the Rev. Ralph D. Abernathy announced he would remain in county jail until it does. Abernathy, head of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, was one of the strike supporters jailed on charges of inciting to riot. He was being held in $50,000 bail and has refused all offers to leave jail on reduced bail.

Grievance Plan

The Medical College hospital agreed to key features of union proposals. Besides rehiring all strikers and increasing the wage minimums, it accepted a grievance procedure under which employes may elect their own representatives.

The hospital also agreed that union members may pay their dues through deductions to the hospital credit union—an arrangement the union called de facto recognition. A state law prohibits formal union recognition.

The wage agreement will have a wide impact elsewhere in the state, the union said. Action of the state legislature in raising wage minimums to $1.60 an hour will result in pay boosts totaling more than $600 a year for 12,000 hospital workers in the state, according to Local 1199B.

Unity Credited

The RWDSU called the settlement "a concrete and effective indication of the unity of the labor and civil rights movements." It expressed appreciation for AFL-CIO contributions of funds and manpower and the "continued and effective support" of William L. Kircher, the federation's organization director.

The union said it would continue its cooperation with the SCLC on a voter registration drive. It also announced plans to step up organizing efforts in Baltimore, where its Local 1199E has requested recognition of Johns Hopkins, Lutheran, North Charles and other hospitals.

Administration Yields to AMA On Health Post

The second choice of Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Robert H. Finch has been nominated by Pres. Nixon to fill the government's top health services post as HEW's Assistant Secretary for Health & Scientific Affairs.

After more than five months of political infighting, Nixon bowed to the American Medical Association and its conservative Republican allies and vetoed Finch's first choice—Dr. John H. Knowles, nationally-prominent director of the Massachusetts General Hospital.

He then accepted Finch's recommendation to name Dr. Roger O. Egeberg, 65-year-old dean of the University of Southern California School of Medicine.

Knowles, who said he had been dumped so that the President could pay off "certain political debts" to the AMA, is a Republican. Egeberg is a Democrat who has tangled with California Gov. Ronald Reagan and, like Knowles, has been critical of the AMA.

But the conservative medical lobby, which had advanced its own candidates for the post, indicated that it would not start a new fight over the Egeberg appointment.

Senate Republican Leader Everett M. Dirksen early this year announced his adamant opposition to Knowles and said he would fight confirmation. Perhaps even more importantly, the chairmen of the Senate and House Republican campaign committees, Sen. John G. Tower of Texas and Rep. Bob Wilson of California, reportedly called the White House to warn that the appointment of Knowles might dry up contributions from AMA's political arm to Republican candidates in the 1970 elections.

Just two days after Finch notified Knowles that Nixon approved his appointment and told him to come to Washington, the nomination fell through.

Finch denied widely-circulated reports that he had threatened to resign if the Knowles nomination were not approved. In an apparent reference to another controversial issue within the Administration—southern efforts to weaken school desegregation guidelines—Finch commented, "Sometimes in losing one battle your hand is strengthened for another."

The American Hospital Association, which had split with the AMA and strongly endorsed Knowles, expressed "regret and dismay" at the President's decision.

State-County Expands Memphis Contract Gains

Memphis, Tenn.—A new three-year contract, expanding the gains won by Memphis sanitation workers in a 65-day strike last year, was ratified by the City Council and 4,000 municipal employes after prolonged negotiations.

Agreement was reached without a strike, although one had been authorized by members of State, County & Municipal Employes Local 1733 when city officials balked at changing their voted budget for the year that began July 1.

The settlement was approved unanimously by members of the local and by a 10-1 vote of the City Council. It provides wage increases of 51 cents an hour, a dues checkoff, grievance machinery ending in advisory arbitration, free uniforms for sanitation workers, no compulsory overtime, and other gains.

Almost the entire union membership—sanitation workers, park employes, service workers and others—rose to their feet cheering when Chairman Jesse Epps of the union's negotiating committee put the question in municipal auditorium: "All in favor of accepting please rise."

Historic Strike

Local 1733 represented 1,300 sanitation employes when it stayed out for almost 10 weeks last year for a first contract. The City Council yielded only after the labor and civil rights movements rallied behind the strikers, the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King lost his life to a sniper's bullet, and Under Sec. of Labor James J. Reynolds was assigned by Pres. Johnson to help mediate.

After the 1968 settlement, the local's ranks were swelled by the addition of many other city workers. And the unity forged in Memphis by labor and civil rights leaders has since been extended to other cities, most recently in the Charleston, S.C., hospital strike.

SCME Pres. Jerry Wurf, addressing the ratification meeting on the contract renewal, said he came to Memphis prepared for a long strike. The union's executive board approved a loan of $750,000 for the expected emergency, and Wurf said he had arranged to borrow it "from a bank owned by another international union."

The new contract calls for wage hikes of 18 cents an hour this year, another 18 cents next July 1, and a third raise of 15 cents at the start of the third contract year. It also includes an escalator clause providing wage hikes of 1 half cent an hour for every 1 percent rise in the consumer price index.

Other gains include the dues checkoff, which Mayor Henry Loeb had said a year ago he would never agree to, an immediate raise of $18 a month for licensed practical nurses on hospital duty, and a special raise for sanitation workers that will give them a minimum of $1.80 an hour this year, $2 next year and $2.15 in the final contract year.

Teachers OK 3-Year Pact In New York

New York—Union teachers voted in referendum to accept a new three-year contract with the city school board providing record high wages and new benefits. The vote was 31,876 in favor, 1,719 opposed.

The settlement, reached by the United Federation of Teachers, AFL-CIO, in the last week of school, will boost salaries by $2,650 this year for those with a bachelor's degree, $3,050 for the master's degree maximum. By the third year of the contract, those salaries will be $9,400 to start, $16,950 after eight years of teaching. Other benefits were improved also.

Elsewhere, AFT's Baltimore local union won the right to represent 2,300 non-teaching employes by winning an election, 789-179. In Perth Amboy, N.J., AFT Local 857 won out among paraprofessionals, 192 votes to 77 for an affiliate of the National Education Association.

Strikes by two AFT affiliates brought new contracts and substantial pay increases for teachers in New Rochelle, N.Y., and at Prairie State College near Chicago.

After Close House Vote:

Tax Justice Demand Builds Up in Senate

and Senate, however, the task of drafting legislation will not be easy. To counter virtually every tax reform that has been suggested, there is a strong special interest group which has the ear of some congressmen and senators.

During the House debate, in fact, Ways & Means Committee Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.) said with a touch of cynicism that he hoped there would be as much support for tax reform when the committee brings up a reform bill as was expressed during the debate. When that time comes, he suggested, "some of you are going to feel that we have developed a bullet that may be just a little bit too hot to bite into."

While the House lineup on the surtax bill was not a straight liberal-conservative division, the bulk of the opposition came from liberal Democrats who said bluntly that they didn't believe there would be any deep-rooted tax reform if Congress passed the surtax bill in the form it came from the Ways & Means Committee.

The bill was supported by the party's leadership—the Speaker of the House, the majority leader, the assistant majority leader. It had the backing of most of the committee chairmen—the major powers of the House of Representatives.

But on the showdown rollcall, 179 Democrats voted against the surtax extension without tax reform and only 56 Democrats supported the bill.

On the Republican side, where Minority Leader Gerald Ford had predicted 170 votes, there were 154 for the bill and 26 opposed.

On the day of the vote, Nixon had 26 Republicans, whom the GOP leadership had marked as opposed or on the fence, over to breakfast at the White House to make a personal plea for support. Eighteen of them ended up voting for the bill.

A Virginia Republican, Rep. William Scott, told the House the next day that a member of the House Appropriations subcommittee on public works had told him that planning funds for a dam in his district would not be approved if he voted against the surtax bill. He refused to knuckle under and voted against the extension measure.

Supporters of the bill, who controlled the four hours for debate, used up most of the time the House had allocated for consideration of the legislation. At one point, Rep. Ray J. Madden (D-Ind.), who opposed the bill, got the floor for a parliamentary inquiry to protest that after two-and-a-half hours of the debate "there has been nobody on this side who is opposed to this bill who has been granted any time" to speak.

After his protest, a few opponents got a chance to take part in the debate. Rep. Roman C. Pucinski (D-Ill.), one of two Chicago congressmen who opposed the bill against the urgings of Mayor Richard J. Daley, charged that persons who don't work for wages or salaries could defer their income until next year and escape the full 10 percent surcharge.

Rep. Martha W. Griffiths (D-Mich.) who is a member of the Ways & Means Committee, challenged the ranking Republican on the committee, Rep. John W. Byrnes of Wisconsin, when he claimed that he had never tried to hold up meaningful tax reform.

She cited examples of reforms, including reduction of the oil depletion allowance, that she had proposed in committee. "And how did you vote?" she asked. "You voted no, and you know you voted no."

Finally Byrnes called it quits. "I have learned not to get into an argument or a discussion with a lady," he said, "because it is quite apparent that you cannot win."

Most of the opposition arguments never were heard in the debate, however. They got into the Congressional Record under a grant of permission for any congressman "to extend their remarks at this point in the record."

With the vote still uncertain, Mills, who got out of a sickbed to take part in the debate, promised tax reform "without exception" if the House would pass the surtax extension.

Ford, the House Republican leader, produced a letter from Pres. Nixon which declared that tax reform "is also the goal of the Administration" and said: "There is no reason why a far-reaching tax reform bill cannot be put before the House of Representatives this summer."

Even with all this, the first tally showed the bill defeated. It took some last-minute vote switches to put the legislation through.

Meany Warns Unemployment Rise Would Frustrate Negro Job Efforts

Jackson, Miss.—Any rise in unemployment will cruelly frustrate those who for the first time see improved job opportunities, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said in a message to the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

"Employment opportunities will continue to increase only if the nation's economic growth continues as it has in the past nine years," Meany stressed in a letter of greetings to the NAACP's 60th convention.

"We must be alert," he warned, "to those who would hobble that economic growth, to those economic tinkerers who would fight inflation by promoting unemployment."

Citing Labor Dept. statistics, Meany said that the recent one-tenth of 1 percent rise in the jobless rate to 3.5 percent showed that black workers suffered the most, while the unemployment rate for white workers remained unchanged.

Meany cited the efforts of the labor movement to recruit and train minority group youngsters to acquire skilled trades leading to good-paying jobs. But, he warned, a recession could frustrate all of these efforts.

He noted that the NAACP had attained many significant achievements and major social gains during its first six decades.

"We in the trade union movement share with our friends in the civil rights movement the satisfaction these achievements bring to those who fought to make them a reality.

"None of these victories comes easily or cheaply. . . . the road to social justice is long and bumpy," Meany observed.

New Programs Born

"But victories were won on the legislative battlefield and elsewhere and new programs, public and private, to fight poverty and discrimination were born."

He classed the apprenticeship Outreach program as one of these achievements, noting that 16,200 of the 225,000 apprentices registered with the Labor Dept. in 1968 were non-whites. This is triple of the 1960 ratio.

"You and we have another common concern," Meany told the convention delegates, "—the need to insure complete compliance with civil rights laws. This means we must be alert to fight every attempt to put the inforcement machinery in the hands of hostile and mediocre administrators."

He said labor and the civil rights movement must stand together to battle for adequate funding of the vital social welfare programs—"for which we jointly lobbied."

"All the federal educational programs now on the statute books are valueless without adequate appropriations and we face a major struggle to win passage of these appropriation measures."

Labor's program for tax justice would restore fairness to tax laws and provide revenue to insure that badly needed domestic programs could be adequately funded, Meany observed.

Extremism Scored

Meany said the AFL-CIO is aligned with the NAACP "to heal the schism within the Negro community caused by those black extremists whose so-called 'solution' to America's racist problems is to mimic those white extremists whose activities disgrace this nation."

He told the convention that "the NAACP and the AFL-CIO have shared the sweet taste of victory in the past and we shall again in the future."

"And the goals we share," he said, "are the goals all America must seek—the abolition of hate, poverty, discrimination and disease; the achievement of full and equal opportunity in employment, housing, education and justice."

Firm Stand Urged On School Guidelines

H. Finch that the guidelines "would not be rewritten or evaded."

Wilkins asked the President to meet with a Leadership Conference delegation before making any change in the guidelines.

He said the coalition of church, Negro, labor and civic groups is "determined to stop erosion of school desegregation in the name of expediency . . . We shall do all in our power to arouse the conscience of America to keep the nation from falling back."

According to HEW sources, Finch has opposed scrapping the guidelines to appease GOP conservatives.

He hinted at the conflict within the Administration when he met newsmen after having been slapped down on his effort to name Dr. John H. Knowles to the top health job in the department, despite opposition of the American Medical Association and conservative Republicans.

When asked about the conflict over guidelines, Finch replied that "sometimes in losing one battle your hand is strengthened for another."

The remark was generally interpreted as indicating that Finch thought he would be allowed to have his way on the desegregation issue as compensation for having been overruled by the GOP right-wing on the Knowles appointment.

Illinois House Recants On Dirksen Amendment

Senate Republican Leader Everett M. Dirksen's drive to amend the Constitution to allow one house of a legislature to be elected without regard to one-man, one-vote standards was nearly derailed in his home state of Illinois.

After Congress refused to go along with Dirksen's proposed amendment, a drive began to force a national constitutional convention through petitions of 34 states—a procedure never used in the nation's history.

Thirty-three states, including Illinois, have in the past five years passed such resolutions, although the legality of some of the petitions has been questioned.

The Illinois House, late in June, voted 110-53 to rescind the 1967 call for a convention. Republicans have a majority in the House and the repealer had broad bipartisan support.

The Senate pigeonholed the repeal resolution, however, and the legislature has recessed until October without further action.

Almost the same thing happened in North Carolina, where a constitutional convention resolution had been adopted in 1965.

The North Carolina House voted to rescind the action on July 1, but a Senate committee killed the repealer. However, the sponsor of the House-passed repealer contended that the action taken by the House had the effect of withdrawing North Carolina's support from the call for a convention to amend the Constitution.

Supporters of one-man, one-vote principles have also indicated they will challenge any resolutions passed by legislatures before they were reapportioned. And the varying forms of resolutions adopted by the 33 states have been cited as another ground for challenge.

Labor Hits 'Triple Standard' on Taxes

AFL-CIO News

Vol. XIV | Issued weekly at 815 Sixteenth St., N. W. Washington, D. C. 20006 $2 a year | Second Class Postage Paid at Washington, D. C. | Saturday, July 12, 1969 | No. 28

Bids Senate Take Action On Reforms

The AFL-CIO called for an end to the "triple standard" of the federal income tax as the Senate opened hearings on both the House-passed surtax extension bill and tax reform.

At the start of the hearings, Finance Committee Chairman Russell B. Long (D-La.) flatly rebuffed Administration demands that the committee give priority to surtax extension.

There will be no action on the House-passed surtax bill, Long said, until the Senate committee has considered every proposal for tax reform. This pushed the earliest date for Senate action into August, with a possibility that a vote would be put off until September, after Congress returns from a three-week summer recess.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller told the committee that labor's stand remains in "complete opposition" to the House-passed bill.

At a time when "corporate profits are swollen" and the wealthy escape taxes on a large part of their income, the ordinary worker is being asked "to take the hardest bite of the deflationary bullet in the name of fiscal responsibility," Biemiller declared.

That, he said, "is economically shoddy and socially irresponsible."

Before a surtax can be considered a fair means of dividing the burden of a tax increase, the basic income tax must itself be fair. That requires, Biemiller said, ending the triple standard under which:

- Wages and salaries—the only source of income for most American workers—are fully taxed.
- Only half of capital gains income is taxed. Capital gains are the profit made by stock market and real estate speculators.
- There is no tax at all on income sheltered by oil depletion allowances, fast real-estate depreciation write-offs, state and local bond interest and other "loophole" income.

When a flat 10 percent surtax—a tax on the regular tax—is imposed, the triple standard becomes even more unjust, Biemiller noted.

A married worker taking the standard deduction will pay a $100 surcharge on an $8,000 income.

An investor making an $8,000 profit from selling stocks or property will pay only $13 in surcharge.

And if the $8,000 income was from tax-exempt sources, there would be no surcharge.

Biemiller reminded the committee that the House-passed bill would continue the surtax on corporations unchanged from last year but would

Nixon Bypasses U.S. Role In Jobless Aid Proposals

It is one of four schools being constructed in Guatemala by CARE with funds donated by the AFL-CIO and its affiliates. AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Lee W. Minton, who also is a vice president of CARE, directed the allocation of funds to the schools project.

AFL-CIO Calls Plan 'Far Short'

By David L. Perlman

Pres. Nixon is making "a tragic mistake" in relying on the states to raise unemployment insurance benefits instead of proposing federal standards, the AFL-CIO said.

The President proposed extending unemployment insurance coverage to an additional 4.8 million workers. He also asked Congress to add 13 weeks of federal benefits to state programs during periods of severe national recession.

But he said the states should be given another two years to raise the level of benefits before Congress considers legislating a federal standard that would require them to do so.

AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bertrand Seidman said the President's unemployment insurance proposal "falls far short of assuring adequate income protection for jobless workers."

Seidman said "the states have repeatedly demonstrated their abdication of responsibility. Without federal standards, the states will not raise unemployment insurance standards to decent levels," he warned.

Nixon endorsed the generally accepted goal that the ceiling on state unemployment insurance benefits should be set at two-thirds of the average wage in covered employment in the state. This would enable "at least 80 percent of insured workers" to receive a full 50 percent of their regular wages during periods of unemployment.

School Deadline Extended:

Desegregation Delay Stirs Sharp Protest

A decision by the Nixon Administration to give some southern school districts more time to comply with desegregation guidelines has been sharply criticized as a step backwards by civil rights leaders, educators and congressional liberals.

School districts had been under a mandate to end racially segregated school systems by this September—some 15 years after the Supreme Court ruled that segregated schools are unconstitutional. The only exception in the guidelines issued by the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare during the Johnson Administration was for districts with a majority of black students, where an additional year was allowed.

Failure to comply with the guidelines would mean a cutoff of federal funds—an action that has already been taken in more than 100 districts that refused to make a commitment to a desegregation plan.

With the change of Administration, southern conservative supporters of Pres. Nixon brought heavy pressure to scuttle the guidelines. The outcome of months of internal Administration debate appeared to be a compromise.

A joint statement by HEW Sec. Robert H. Finch and Atty. Gen. John N. Mitchell declared that "in general" the guidelines must be met, but more time will be allowed in districts where there are "bona fide educational and administrative problems."

They promised that the additional time allowed "will be the minimum shown to be necessary."

To civil rights supporters, the relaxing of the guidelines was an invitation to delay and foot-dragging.

Finch's predecessor as HEW secretary, Wilbur J. Cohen, told a Senate subcommittee that easing the timetable encourages noncompliance. When he was secretary, Cohen related, officials of a num-

Unemployment Grows Worse For Negroes

By Duane Emme

The nation's overall unemployment rate declined slightly to 3.4 percent in June but the rate for non-white workers increased, the Labor Dept. announced.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics monthly job report showed that the unemployment picture for Negroes has worsened "significantly" since February.

Employment over the nation rose substantially in June, BLS said, but the jobs pick-up in the April-June quarter ran considerably behind the pace of the previous six months. The jobless rate for June reflected virtually no

Grape Growers' Suit Admits Boycott Hurts

Delano, Calif—Grape growers dropped all pretense that the nationwide boycott of California table grapes is ineffective and filed suit for an injunction against the boycott, seeking $75 million in damages from the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee.

"They can't have it both ways," a UFWOC spokesman commented as attorneys prepared a reply to the suit.

"If the boycott is not effective, how can they claim damages? If it is effective, why have they been misleading the public? We claim the boycott is legal and justified. We have no other recourse, since they have refused to recognize or bargain with us."

The Farm Workers launched the boycott more than a year ago. It quickly won the strong support of the entire labor movement and civil rights groups as a major thrust in the union's four-year effort to win bargaining rights for employes of table grape growers spearheaded

Retirees' Benefits Ruled Subject for Bargaining

By Eugene A. Kelly

The National Labor Relations Board ruled in a major decision that retired employes are protected by federal labor law and employers must bargain with their union about any proposed changes in pension or welfare plans.

By a 4-1 vote the board ordered the Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co. to rescind the unilateral changes in health plans it ordered in 1966 when Medicare went into effect. It ordered the company to bargain in good faith about the plan with Local 1 of the Allied Chemical & Alkali Workers, unaffiliated, in PPG's chemical division at Barberton, O.

The board's four-man majority rejected the reasoning of a trial examiner and the company in deciding management was required by law to bargain about the retirees' health insurance plan. It concluded:

- That retired workers are employes within the meaning of the statute for the purpose of bargaining

4 Banks Reject Interest Boost As Indefensible

Milwaukee—Four Milwaukee banks are not going along with the boost in the prime interest rate, and they have taken a full-page advertisement in a labor publication to explain why.

The ad was signed by Midland National Bank, Home Bank, Park State Bank and Midtown State Bank.

The ad in the Milwaukee Labor Press, publication of the city's AFL-CIO charged that the recent full percentage point hike in the "prime" rate to 8.5 percent "is unfair."

It emphasized that this boost in the interest rate the banks charge on loans to their biggest and best customers "smacks of charging what the traffic will bear and is just not defensible in our opinion."

Noting that some banks have argued the boost was needed because they have less money to loan, the ad compared this to a grocer marking up the price of the last three remaining loaves of bread on his shelves.

"The natural result of the rise in the cost of borrowing," the ad declared, "will be a general increase in the cost of food, shelter and transportation.

"The people who will suffer most are the wage earner and the small businessmen—the people who can least afford it."

The ad pointed out that while "it's hard to make a defensible case" for the New York and Chicago banks who led in raising the prime rate, "it's almost impossible to justify the 'follow the leader' attitude of large Milwaukee banks who followed suit."

They can't plead higher costs, they have good liquidity and "they are all enjoying record earnings (including our banks)," the ad said.

Agents Strike John Hancock As Talks Fail

The Insurance Workers picketed offices of the John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Co. in more than 200 cities in the union's first nationwide strike against the company.

Some 7,000 members have been out since July 1 in a strike over contract terms. Wages are a major issue, the union said.

Federal mediators entered negotiations at the request of both sides but withdrew for the time being when talks broke down.

Late in June, union members voted by an overwhelming margin—4,921 to 194—to strike if no satisfactory terms were offered by the big insurance firm. When the talks ended, management was offering a wage increase of $17.31 a week over a three-year term and the union was asking at least $29.93 a week.

Negotiations opened more than a month ago. IWIU Pres. William A. Gillen called on management to revise the outworn concept "that service should be furnished without compensation because occasionally it results in a sale" from which agents may eventually be compensated.

The union, Gillen said, is "determined that the conditions for new and old agents alike will be at a level that will enable all to maintain a decent standard of living."

Gillen also urged company negotiators to plan now for future improvements to make management's relationship with its employes "more relevant" to modern labor-management thinking and less rooted in the past.

Philip Randolph, president-emeritus of the Sleeping Car Porters, at the Brandeis University commencement exercises in Waltham, Mass., by Brandeis Pres. Morris B. Abram. Pres. Jacob S. Fish Inspection Pressed To Close Protection Gap

Passage of a fish inspection law to close "a dangerous gap in consumer protection" was urged by the AFL-CIO at a Senate hearing.

Americans, who eat 2 billion pounds of fish each year need the same protection against diseased and unwholesome fish that is provided by the meat and poultry inspection programs, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller declared.

He urged a Senate Commerce subcommittee on consumer legislation to give quick approval to a bill by Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.) that would require continuous inspection of fish processing establishments.

Biemiller's statement was presented to the subcommittee by Arnold Mayer, legislative representative of the Meat Cutters. Mayer also testified for the legislation on behalf of his union, which represents many of the workers in the fish processing industry.

Mayer stressed the need for continuous inspection—as in meat and poultry—rather than the spot inspection favored by some segments of the industry.

"In this highly competitive industry," he said, "the temptation to cut corners, to get ahead of another firm, is very great. Under the circumstances, the consumer simply cannot get meaningful protection without a requirement for continuous inspection."

Cause of Death and Illness

The need for effective fish inspection is at least as great as in the meat and poultry industry, Mayer said, citing documented cases of death and serious illness traced to contamination in the processing. And even the "minute" samplings of fish and shellfish undertaken by the Food & Drug Administration found nearly 11 percent violations of the pure food law.

Mayer read from stomach-turning reports of Food & Drug Administration inspectors describing fly-infested salmon canneries, breading of decomposed shrimp at a processing plant, roaches in a fresh crabmeat plant.

"We do not imply that these conditions occur in the majority of the industry," he stressed, "but the fact that they do exist in some parts endangers consumers and the good sections of the industry."

Only 40 plants, which process 11 percent of the U.S. fish production, now take part in a voluntary inspection program of the Interior Dept. under which participating companies pay for the cost of the inspection, Mayer noted. And only Maine and California have even limited state fish inspection programs.

Mayer strongly urged that the same continuous inspection requirement labor is urging for the domestic fish industry be applied to imported products which, he noted, account for more than half of the fish consumed in the United States. While some of the nations supplying fish to the United States have such programs, most do not.

"We firmly believe that the American consumer should be equally protected against unwholesome and adulterated fish—no matter where that fish comes from. It would be a mockery to put regulations and controls on the domestic industry and not do the same for the foreign producers," Mayer declared.

Salute Founder:

Molders Observe 110th Anniversary

Cincinnati—The Molders & Allied Workers are observing the 110th anniversary of the union's founding at a series of union remembrances culminating July 27 in memorial services for founder William H. Sylvis.

The anniversary finds the union with resources at peak strength, membership of 80,000 only slightly behind the World War II high mark, and many locals consolidating into state-wide units while pressing an organizing drive keyed to rapid changes in the foundry and allied industries.

The union "now enjoys the best position in its long history," Pres. William A. Lazzerini said in a message to the 290 union locals. As "drastic changes" take place in the industry, the union is conducting a "vigorous collective bargaining program" on behalf of its members, he declared.

Praising Sylvis as America's "first great labor leader," Lazzerini said "all of us who are members and enjoy the fruits of collective bargaining owe an everlasting debt of gratitude to the man who literally gave his life" for trade unionism.

Union members in the Philadelphia area will hold memorial services in the Fernwood, Pa., Cemetery for Sylvis on the 100th anniversary of his death. A monument erected by the union on his grave proclaims "Labor's Champion—Sylvis."

President of the Molders from 1863 to 1869, Sylvis would find a changed industry were he alive today. Alongside the journeyman molder making cores of iron and steel he would find many members working with automated equipment on cores made of plastics and other metal substitutes and doing other tasks.

The Molders made a historic decision in 1934, when convention delegates changed the union's name to the Molders & Foundry Workers and agreed to admit non-journeymen to membership. The break with the past was accented when employes of Albion, Mich., College were organized by foundry workers in the area and were chartered as a separate local.

The 1961 convention voted to make another change. The union became the Molders & Allied Workers and its jurisdiction became "all workers engaged in the production, processing and assembling" of castings or their substitutes.

The union traces its past to 1830, when molders first formed local unions. Delegates from 12 locals formed a national organization July 5, 1859, for skilled molders in stove and hollow-ware and other branches like jobbing and machine work.

Two years later, three Canadian locals were chartered and the union set the trend of the future when it became an international body with jurisdiction over molders on both sides of the border.

Sylvis helped write the first Molders' constitution; became secretary of Philadelphia local 1, then treasurer and president of the national union. He founded the union Journal, still in existence, and launched the National Labor Union as the first union federation. It expired with his death at age 40.

Sylvis won fame as an advocate of the eight hour day, achieved for federal workers before he died, and for this quotation: "I love this union cause I hold it more dear than I do my family or my life. I am willing to devote to it all that I am or have or hope for in this world."

Bill Endorsed to Curb Credit Insurance Abuse

A federal ceiling on the cost of credit insurance is needed to put an end to the gouging of consumers who borrow money or buy goods on the installment plan, the AFL-CIO declared.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller endorsed legislation directing the Federal Reserve Board to set the maximum charge for insurance which guarantees the repayment of a debt if the borrower or purchaser dies.

Lenders and stores commonly get substantial kickbacks from the premiums their customers pay for credit insurance, Biemiller charged in a statement to a Senate Banking subcommittee. He cited estimates that premium rates average 36 percent higher than a "reasonable" charge for the insurance—and that the overcharges amount to about $220 million a year.

In effect, Biemiller said, the consumer who pays more than he should for credit insurance "supplies the creditor a handsome profit for insuring himself against loss. Such profit is purely exploitative and usurious."

Biemiller endorsed a bill introduced by Subcommittee Chairman William Proxmire (D-Wis.) and Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.) to regulate the maximum premiums "for life, health and accident insurance when such insurance is provided or arranged for by a creditor pursuant to a consumer credit transaction."

He urged that the bill be strengthened by limiting the exemption for rates regulated by state action to those states where the ceiling is no higher than the federal regulation. The legislation as introduced would exempt states with "substantially similar" credit insurance ceilings.

The AFL-CIO statement also urged that the truth-in-lending law be amended to require inclusions of credit insurance charges in the disclosure requirements, even when the insurance is not compulsory.

'Significant' Slackening:

Job Picture Worsens Among Non-Whites change from the 3.5 percent rate recorded in May.

Due mainly to the entry of youths into the job market, the civilian labor force increased by 350,000 seasonally adjusted in June to 83.9 million. The labor force dropped in May and the increase returns it to the April level.

There were 3.4 million persons unemployed in June. The increase of 1.1 million from May, BLS said, was about in line with the usual May-June pattern when students flood into the job market.

Jobless rates for all adult men (2 percent), adult women (3.7 percent) and full-time workers (3.1 percent) showed little change over the month. The rate for teenagers fell from 12.5 to 11.6 percent.

The unemployment rate for white workers was 3 percent in June, about the same as in May, but for non-white workers the rate was 7 percent, an increase of five-tenths of 1 percent over the month.

The 7 percent was up 1.3 percent from a 15-year low of 5.7 percent in the non-white rate reached in February. In the five-month period the white rate has remained virtually unchanged.

BLS figures show that among teenagers' the jobless rate for whites has decreased from 10.1 to 9.5 percent between February and June, while the non-white rate has risen from 22 to 28.6 percent.

The more than two-to-one jobless ratio of non-whites to whites, which had shown signs of narrowing until recent months, has again increased, BLS Deputy Commissioner Harold Goldstein pointed out.

On the jobs side, total nonfarm payroll employment of 70.2 million in June, seasonally adjusted, was up about 190,000 from May. The increase was broadly based, with job gains in both the goods and service-producing industries.

Monthly payroll gains since April have averaged 170,000 seasonally adjusted — "a significantly slower pace" than that experienced during the October-March period when the rise averaged 250,000 a month, BLS reported.

Employment in contract construction and state and local government showed the largest gains in June with each category increasing by about 50,000 during the month.

The increase in construction employment to 3.4 million contrasted with declines in jobs during each of the three previous months.

In manufacturing, payroll employment rose by about 40,000 between May and June to 20.1 million, bettering its increases of recent months.

June employment figures in other areas were:

Wholesale and retail trade, 14.6 million, up 26,000; finance, insurance and real estate, 3.5 million, up 6,000; federal government, 2.7 million, up 13,000; mining, 621,000, down 1,000; and transportation and public utilities, 4.4 million, down 1,000.

In another area, the Labor Dept. reported that average hourly earnings for all workers on private payrolls rose 1 cent in June to $3.02. Compared with June 1968, hourly earnings were up 18 cents. Average weekly earnings were up $1.85 to $115.06.

The seasonally adjusted workweek for all rank-and-file workers rose one-tenth of an hour in June to 37.9 hours, For manufacturing, the workweek was unchanged at 40.7 hours, equal to the 1968 average. Factory overtime averaged 3.6 hours a week, unchanged from May.

IBEW Pickets Upheld Over Firm's Deception

A union that picketed a "reserved" gate at a Glendale, Ariz., construction site was not guilty of an illegal secondary boycott, but instead was the victim of an employer's deception, the National Labor Relations Board ruled.

Reversing a trial examiner's finding, the NLRB dismissed a complaint of unlawful picketing against Local 640 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

The complaint grew out of a charge by Timber Buildings, Inc., general contractor on a Hobo Joe's restaurant construction job, that union members picketed a gate reserved exclusively for employes not involved in the union's dispute with an electrical subcontractor.

The general contractor put signs on two gates at the construction site but the signs were so unclear, the board said, that the pickets were confused about which gate was reserved and which wasn't.

Examiner Herman Tocker ruled last November that the picketing violated the board's Moore Dry Dock rule for picketing at sites used by more than one contractor. The rule is intended to restrict picketing to gates used only by employes of the contractor with whom a union has a primary dispute, but it must be applied with "common sense," the NLRB members emphasized.

The Glendale project was not enclosed by a fence or other barrier, had substantial frontage on two streets, and was surrounded by open areas on the other two sides, the facts showed.

A telegram from the general contractor advised Local 640 that a separate gate would be erected for the use of the subcontractor. Instead, the board pointed out, a sign stated that the gate was for use not only by the subcontractor but also by seven additional nonunion employers.

Another gate was erected with a sign stating it was for use by 16 other subcontractors. The two gates were separated by a single strand of wire.

The "confusion experienced by Local 640's pickets is readily understandable," the NLRB said, when even other subcontractors "failed to observe the posted entrances." In addition, the board declared, Timber Buildings gave the union "untrue information" about the presence of the subcontractor's employes, made an "under cover agreement" with the subcontractor as to when its employes would show up, and engaged in a "pattern of deception" to undercut the Moore Dry Dock rule.

12-Hour Limit Urged for Rail Working Day

The AFL-CIO called on Congress to amend a 62-year-old law under which railroad operating employes may be required to work up to 16 hours a day.

"This antediluvian standard is unfair and unsafe," declared AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, in a letter to Chairman Harley O. Staggers of the House Commerce Committee. Biemiller called for passage of a bill, introduced by Staggers, that would reduce the maximum working day to 12 hours.

Staggers's bill to amend the 1907 Hours of Service Act also would require a 10-hour off duty period after 12 consecutive duty hours and at least 8 hours rest in any 24-hour period. It would strengthen the act's penalties for employer violations.

"To those of us acquainted with labor-management relations," Biemiller said, "it is incomprehensible that railroad employes can be required to work over 12 hours per day."

In this connection, he pointed out, premium compensation for such service, under the pay system peculiar to operating employes, may not always be paid even when a worker exceeds 10, 11 and 12 hours per day.

"Therefore," Biemiller added, "the only sure way of reducing these excessive work hours is through a maximum work limitation, policed and enforced by governmental authority, as proposed in this bill."

Evidence Presented

At committee hearings, rail union spokesmen gave extensive evidence of operating employes being required to work 13, 14 and 15 hours and more on successive days.

Al H. Chesser, who testified for the bill as chairman of the safety committee of the Railway Labor Executives Association, presented 25 recent time sheets on such long hours.

Chesser, also testifying for the United Transportation Union, expressed vexation that in 1969 rail labor should even find it necessary to ask for a 12-hour maximum working day.

The fatique due to long hours combined with high speed diesel engines and long trains has added to "an already bad safety record on the railroads," he declared.

New Training Pact Boosts Project Build

Washington's labor-backed Project Build—the nucleus of a federally-funded apprenticeship preparation program for minority youths—got a shot in the arm with the signing of a new Labor Dept. contract for the training of 100 more men in the construction trades.

The youths will be trained for a two-year period at an average cost of $4,607 per trainee. The 15 skilled trades of instruction include bricklaying, carpentry, electricity, lathing, roofing, sheet metal work, structural iron work and tile setting.

The actual contract was awarded to Winston A. Burnett Construction Co. of New York which will work with Project Build, the Greater Washington Central Labor Council and other organizations in the recruitment and training project in the Washington metropolitan area.

Burnett Construction, a Negro-operated firm reputed to be the 10th largest construction company in the country, specializes in new construction and renovation of buildings in ghetto areas in a number of cities.

The company says it emphasizes the use of skills and talents of persons living in the run-down sections of the cities being rehabilitated.

This approach also has been used by Project Build since its inception by the Washington area building trades unions early last year.

Burnett said at the contract signing that he is deeply interested in cooperating with the labor movement in any city in which the firm has operations. This is the main path, he suggested, for Negro contractors to get into the mainstream of the construction industry.

The company is currently renovating the Clifton Terrace Apartments in Washington. It also has major existing projects in New York City, Gary, Ind., and San Francisco.

Representatives from labor attending the contract signing included Roland Williams, executive director of Projector Build; Robert McGlotten of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights; Pres. J. C. Turner of the Greater Washington Central Labor Council; Executive Sec. Joseph Curtis and Pres. Richard Bailey, both of the Washington Building & Construction Trades Council.

Michael F. Smith Dies, Former IAFF Official

Elizabeth, N.J. — Michael F. Smith, labor adviser to the national director of the Office of Civil Defense and former vice president of the Fire Fighters, died at 63 after a heart attack at his vacation home in Seawood Harbor, N.J. Funeral services were held here July 7 in St. Mary's Church.

Smith's services to labor and civil defense were praised in statements by IAFF Pres. William H. McClennan and Sen. Clifford P. Case (R-N.J.).

Smith was a member of the Elizabeth Fire Dept. for 25 years. He had served also as trustee of the Union County, N.J., Building & Construction Trades Council; as secretary-treasurer of the Union County Central Labor Union, and as labor adviser to Sen. Case from 1956 to 1961, when he joined the civil defense staff.

N.Y. Cap Union Wins $18 Gain In 3-Year Pact

New York—Members of Hatters Local 2 will get wage increases totaling $18 over three years in a new agreement between the union and three groups of manufacturers in the New York City cap and cloth hat industry.

The contract, ratified by an overflow membership meeting, provides for wage hikes of $6 each year; 1.5 additional days' paid holiday, and increased employer contributions to the union-industry health and welfare fund.

The new pact raises minimum scales by $5 a week and makes an increase in welfare fund benefits possible, union Vice Pres. Herschell Chanin said.

Hatters Pres. Alex Rose reported that the Local 2 settlement probably will set the standard for contract negotiations in Chicago, Philadelphia, St. Louis and other cities. The New York market is the leading U.S. center for cloth hats and caps, Rose said.

Chanin headed the union negotiating committee. The employer groups were the Empire State Hat & Cap Manufacturers Association, the National Headware Manufacturers Association and the Uniform Manufacturers Exchange.

Leave It to the States?

DOES PRES. NIXON really believe that in the next two years the big majority of states will voluntarily raise their unemployment insurance benefit ceiling so that "at least 80 percent" of workers will receive a full 50 percent of their regular wages when they are unemployed?

Surely the President is not that naive.

As he noted in his message to Congress, Pres. Eisenhower made the same request to the states back in 1954.

After 15 years, only two small states have achieved that level of benefits.

It is "essential," Mr. Nixon says, that the other states do so.

We heartily agree.

As the President so accurately stated, unemployment insurance is an earned benefit given with "no demeaning of human dignity, no feeling of being on the dole." It is "an economic stabilizer" to preserve purchasing power when the economy falters and to keep a recession from becoming a depression.

The President has asked Congress for a federal standard to prevent any state from paying unemployment benefits to strikers. Only two states permit this, and then only after a long waiting period. But he says he is reluctant to ask for a federal standard to bring about an "essential" increase in benefits.

Unemployment insurance is one of the areas of competition among states—competition in its worst sense.

The lower the benefits, the lower the payroll tax the employer pays. The lower the tax, the greater the inducement to an employer to locate in a state.

That's why the AFL-CIO's comment on the Administration proposal said flatly: "Without federal mandatory standards, the states will not raise unemployment insurance standards to decent levels."

What It's All About

CREDIT INSURANCE . . . fish inspection . . . utility rates. These are just a few of the legislative issues the American labor movement has been involved in during the past several weeks.

Is that what unions are for? You bet it is.

Every one of these issues involves the buying power of union-negotiated paychecks or the health of union members and their families.

We asked Congress to pass a law limiting the cost of the credit life insurance you are required or pressured to take out when you borrow money or buy on the installment plan. Did you know that you are paying 36 percent more on the average than the insurance should cost? The overcharge adds up to more than $200 million a year.

We asked Congress to require strict federal inspection of fish. Unlike meat poultry, there is practically no protection against diseased and unwholesome fish being sold.

How many thousands of people have to get sick, how many hundreds must die before Congress acts?

You may wonder why the AFL-CIO should testify in support of something called the Utility Consumers' Counsel Act.

The title is a mouthful. But what it means is that the consumer will have someone to challenge the lawyers and economists from the big utility companies when they come before some understaffed regulatory agency to ask permission to raise their charges.

Maybe they're entitled to an increase. But let's not just take their word for it.

And that's part of what the labor movement is all about.

'Aw, C'mon, How About Some Volunteers?'

A Word Edgewise:

'Participatory Democracy' Is What They Choose It to Mean

By John P. Roche

THIS HAS BEEN a big month for "participatory democracy." Out in Santa Barbara, Calif., Robert M. Hutchins has purged the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions. In Chicago, a minority of the Students for a Democratic Society has expelled (excommunicated would be a better word) the majority. And in New York City, the McCarthy wing of the Democratic shambles is busy explaining that the primary election was meaningless.

There are, I'm sure, perfectly sound reasons for each of these actions. The group purged by Hutchins includes some classic bores and, since Hutchins bores easily, he doubtless felt that it was worthwhile to get them out of earshot. The kicker is that for as far back as I can remember Hutchins has been issuing the secular equivalent of papal bulls on how to be democratic. Hardly a month went by without a bulletin from Santa Barbara on the parlous state of democracy in the colleges, in trade unions, in the churches, etc.

As I have said before, I am sadly in need of moral instruction, but this does not include hearing the Sermon on the Mount from Machiavelli. Hopefully Hutchins will change the name of his reconstituted group to the Center for the Study of Authoritarian Institutions.

Meanwhile in Chicago the SDS was, unknowingly, re-enacting the age-old pattern of religious heresies. Every generation, of course, thinks that the world began the day it arrived, that sex was invented the day it hit puberty. But the only way to maintain this invincible ignorance is to hide from history. To a student of theology, or political theory, the moral postures, the weird logic, the very formulation of the disputes in SDS were old hat when St. Augustine took out after the Christian heresies of the 5th Century.

In historical terms the behavior of SDS has direct parallels with that of the Anabaptist sects of the Reformation. The minute one combines the propositions that (1) Truth emerges only from private inspiration; (2) Possession of truth puts one above the law, and (3) True believers have the obligation to impose this truth, you have a violent sect, not a political organization.

Ironically such sects have always talked about the joys of "community," about the wonders of "communication." But they meet only to split because nobody (except possibly a saint) can trust anyone else's truth. I have spent over a quarter of a century in various liberal organizations and I have never known a militant ideologue who really liked people.

WELL, THE SDS MEMBERS, like the "Fifth Monarchy Men" of the 17th Century, are now so busy trying to purify each other that they will have little time left over for the rest of us. That will be a relief. I am tired of hearing contemporary reruns of 16th and 17th Century tapes.

In New York we are dealing with a far more worldly business. There the problem is that "participatory democracy" produced the wrong winners. Having spent much of last fall arguing that all good Democrats should support Senate candidate Paul O'Dwyer because he won the primary, the McCarthy Democrats are busy trying to justify dumping Mario Procaccino (who in fact got a bigger percentage of the vote than did O'Dwyer). There are excellent reasons for not supporting Procaccino, but they are not in the realm of high theory.

I, for example, have never thought much of primary elections; they undermine party organization and responsibility. Thus one can simply say "Procaccino (or Marchi) is not my kind of Democrat (Republican)," and support somebody else who is more compatible. But having gone overboard for "participation," the (Eugene) McCarthyites can't take this sensible course. They have to find a cosmic excuse for their pragmatism. My guess is that the cosmos will be cooperative, but meanwhile we have to watch as they wrestle with their consciences and inevitably win.

However, the net outcome of all these shenanigans may be positive. They could muffle the klaxons of the self-righteous who have been distracting American politics from serious problems.

A 'Pernicious Notion':

Justice Dept. Makes Own Law To Justify Wiretaps, Bugging

The following is an editorial from the Washington Post, June 19, 1969.

THE DEPT. OF JUSTICE has come forward with an appalling paradox: entrusted with enforcement of the federal laws, it holds itself to lie outside the ambit of those laws; committed to the championship of the United States Constitution, it holds itself to be free from the restraints of that fundamental charter. Expressly, the department declared on Friday [June 13] that it possesses legal power—despite a clause of the Constitution and an Act of Congress to the contrary, and without bothering to obtain judicial authorization in advance—to carry on electronic surveillance of any members of organizations who, in its opinion, may be seeking to "attack and subvert the government by unlawful means."

No more pernicious notion has ever been propounded by an agency of the United States government. What this comes down to is a bald assertion that the department can take the law into its own hands whenever it thinks the national security is threatened—from within or from without.

Last week, in a federal District Court in Chicago, the department disclosed that it had employed wiretapping or bugging devices to monitor conversations of the antiwar activists who were indicted for inciting riots at the Democratic National Convention last August. What is the department's justification? "Any President who takes seriously his oath to 'preserve, protect and defend the Constitution,'" the department asserts, "will no doubt determine that it is not 'unreasonable' to utilize electronic surveillance to gather intelligence information concerning those organizations which are committed to the use of illegal methods to bring about changes in our form of government and which may be seeking to foment violent disorders."

Of course the Constitution which any President has taken an oath to "preserve" specifically forbids unwarranted searches. And the Supreme Court has plainly said that electronic surveillance constitutes a search permissible under the Fourth Amendment only when properly circumscribed and authorized in advance by a judge. Congress only last year, wishing to regularize and control electronic eavesdropping, stipulated precisely in the Crime Control Act the conditions under which bugging and wiretapping could be authorized.

Yet the Dept. of Justice appears to be saying that both the Constitution and the Crime Control Act can be ignored whenever the President thinks that certain groups are "committed to the use of illegal methods to bring about changes in our form of government."

What could better illustrate the absurdity of this standard than its application in regard to the tatterdemalion crew of New Leftists who stirred up disorder in the streets of Chicago? If the President or the Dept. of Justice can see a threat to the nation's security in that tawdry, loose-lipped cabal, it can see a threat in anything.

And if a supposed threat to national security can justify setting aside the Constitution and the law respecting electronic eavesdropping, why can it not be used to justify setting them aside for any other purpose the President and the Dept. of Justice may deem expedient or convenient in the protection of national security? Will they some day think it not "unreasonable" to set aside the prohibitions against arbitrary arrest or against random physical searches of citizens' homes or against imprisonment without trial or against suppression of speech deemed dangerous? What the Dept. of Justice has so blandly enunciated is the rationale of dictatorship. It is the justification of every despot from Caligula to Adolf Hitler.

IT HAS BEEN DISCLOSED recently that the Federal Bureau of Investigation systematically, over a period of years, tapped telephones in flagrant violation of the law and in cases having nothing whatever to do with national security. It bugged and tapped the homes and hotel rooms of the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., and of Elijah Muhammad, the Black Muslim leader, for example. It is beside the point if, as the FBI now asserts, the Attorney General, at that time Robert F. Kennedy, authorized the eavesdropping; no Attorney General had any authority to do so. The FBI also bugged and tapped numerous persons alleged to be part of that undefined group called the "Mafia."

This eavesdropping was done in violation of the Constitution, in violation of the law, in violation of a presidential order and in violation of repeated assurances by the director of the FBI that it was not being done. J. Edgar Hoover has forfeited the confidence of the American people. He ought to resign or be removed from office.

A Federal Bureau of Investigation which eavesdrops on citizens is a peril to privacy and a menace to freedom in any circumstances. But a Federal Bureau of Investigation which does this in direct defiance of Congress is intolerable. Congress, in its wisdom, decreed last year that bugging and tapping could be done under court order. For the Dept. of Justice to assert now that it may bug and tap at its own discretion is to undermine the whole concept of a government of laws.

For All Workers:

Labor-Negro Coalition Strives For Total Economic Equality

ALTHOUGH POLITICS may be the main thrust of the organized labor-black community coalition in the immediate future, "decent jobs at decent pay" for all workers remains the long-range goal, the AFL-CIO director of civil rights declared.

"This is not a power game played in order to divide up the spoils," said Donald Slaiman. The object, he said, is to get legislation and programs to help meet the problems. Yet, he added, effective operation of programs takes not only "people who will pass the right legislation," but "cooperative work in the community and in the workshop" as well.

Slaiman said that the coalition had "one of the better cooperative working relationships ever in registration and getting out the vote" in the 1968 elections. He said that the percentage of the vote was "higher for COPE-endorsed candidates than it ever was in the black community." As a result of its narrow margin of victory, the new Administration has "moved to the [political] right at a very, very slow pace."

Slaiman appeared on Labor News Conference, a nationwide radio interview broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EDT, on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

He said that the "overwhelming majority of the Negro community" remains interested in integration and peaceful progress, and "is not moving toward separatism and nationalism." But, he cautioned, the civil rights movement and the labor movement—as well as the militants—know that "just ending discrimination will not solve the problems of poverty and deprivation, nor even the problems of integration."

"UNLESS WE BREAK UP and disperse the ghettos," he said, "we not only will have an intensified apartheid in our major cities, but we will also have a deterioration of the hubs of our total society." And if that happens, he warned, "not only will the Negro youth be lost, but the country will be lost."

Slaiman said that integration of apprenticeship programs is a "very rapidly improving picture," noting that since 1960, the level of black apprentices in registered apprenticeships has nearly tripled. That, he said, is a "more rapid increase on minority participation and a higher absolute percentage than in almost any well-paid part of the labor force throughout the country."

Reporters questioning Slaiman were Frank Swoboda of United Press International and Harry Conn of Press Associates, Inc.

By Press Associates, Inc.

BY NOW IT IS pretty well known that the American taxpayer has been heavily subsidizing some of the country's wealthiest and conservative landowners, notably in the old cotton South.

Tables have been published showing that companies and individuals have been paid a total of $3 billion a year not to grow crops. Statistics have been compiled to show that subsidies to the 10,000 richest farms actually are greater than the amount allotted to such vital programs as low-rent public housing.

In the case of cotton, some $784 million was paid out by the government last year. One of the recipients of the nation's bounty was Sen. James O. Eastland, Mississippi Democrat and plantation owner, to the tune of $150,000. It has been estimated that the Eastland subsidy alone would be enough to maintain 684 dependent children in the state of Mississippi under the meager aid formula that that state employs.

Efforts are now being made to limit farm subsidies to $20,000 annually per farm. The House has voted such a bill, but the highly conservative Senate Appropriations Committee turned it down and efforts to restore the ceiling on the Senate floor failed. The political alibi is that cotton planters in the South will go back to growing cotton should their fat subsidies be curtailed. Then, under another law which these same Southern conservatives had the perspicacity to have enacted some years ago, they will enjoy a "snap back" provision setting high price supports for their cotton crops.

The injustice of placing this kind of burden on the backs of the American taxpayer at the very time that a taxpayer's revolt is in progress is exceeded only by the injustice done to the forgotten man in the agricultural subsidy picture—the sharecropper, the tenant farmer and the farm worker who is displaced when the plantation owner collects his subsidy for taking his farm out of production.

The New Orleans Times-Picayune earlier this year published a feature article called "BIG checks for the BIG guys," which documents in human terms what happens to the "little" guys when plantation owners and managers cash those big government checks at their local banks.

LOUISIANA LANDOWNERS cashed some $30.3 million last year under Agricultural Stabilization & Conservation programs. They got this for not planting cotton, feed grains or rice or for curtailing sugar cane plantings. One got as high as $280,000, the rest smaller sums for an average of $14,000.

The Times-Picayune interviewed a few of the workers on those plantations who didn't share in the riches. There was Felix Ledet, who for 42 of his 52 years has been working in sugar cane on the Rienzi Plantation near Thibodaux. When the cane quota is cut next year, Ledet expects to be out of a job with no share whatever in the $34,127 that will be paid his employer.

"There doesn't seem to be any provision in the program for compensating the people who do the work of planting and harvesting the crop," said Ledet sadly.

Then, there is James Sewire, who has worked for the same plantation for 23 years. His employer will receive more than $185,000 in subsidies for holding his planting to an allotment program. Sewire is slated to lose his job and may have to go on welfare.

The files of the National Sharecroppers Fund are filled with examples of what happens to both Negro and white workers when their jobs, whether as paid workers or renters or sharecroppers, disappear. Hundreds of thousands of them—twice as many Negroes as whites—have fled the South in recent years. They have moved to northern ghettos to which they bring few skills and many bitter grievances.

The Senate Appropriations Committee has turned its back on the effort to reform the subsidy program that enriches the few at the expense of the many. What it should be doing is to seek actively a change in a system that permits scandalous payments to wealthy farmers and at the same time alleviate the condition of the forgotten workers who do the plowing, the planting and harvesting of the crops that make the United States a "land of plenty."

"DECENT JOBS at decent pay" for all workers remains the long range goal of the labor-black coalition, although politics may be the main thrust in the immediate future, AFL-CIO Civil Rights Dir. Donald Slaiman, center, told Frank Swoboda, left, of United Press International and Harry Conn of Press Associates, Inc., on Labor News Conference. The public service interview is heard Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EDT, on Mutual Radio.

Winn-Dixie Hit On Bid to Bar Meat Cutters

New Orleans—The U.S. Court of Appeals here upheld the National Labor Relations Board in ordering Winn-Dixie Stores to bargain with the Meat Cutters after the company destroyed the union's cardcheck majority.

The ruling was the latest in a series involving employers who refuse to recognize a union, demand an election, and use the delay to make promises of favor or threats to get card-signers to abandon the union.

The New Orleans decision was made public shortly after the Supreme Court unanimously upheld the NLRB's right to order a union-busting employer to bargain with a union on the basis of signed membership cards when a fair election has been made impossible or unlikely.

The latest case involved employes of the big Southern grocery chain's Tampa warehouse. A majority of employes signed union application cards in 1966. When management insisted on an election, enough of them changed their minds to produce a tie vote. The NLRB agreed with a trial examiner that Winn-Dixie must bargain with the union and give its members a wage increase they should have gotten three years ago.

The appeals court rejected a company claim that the membership card was "ambiguous." The card authorized the union "to represent me and bargain collectively with my employer in my behalf, and to negotiate and conclude" contract agreements.

The judges said there was no basis for inquiring into the "subjective intent" of the card-signers.

William Mirengoff Heads Job Corps

Labor Sec. George P. Shultz has named a career federal employe, William Mirengoff, as acting director of the Job Corps.

Mirengoff, who has been with the Labor Dept. since 1946, has been deputy associate manpower administrator. The Job Corps has been transferred from the Office of Economic Opportunity to the Labor Dept.'s Manpower Administration.

ORGANIZED LABOR has an important role to play in helping initiate and strengthen consumer protection programs, Mrs. Virginia Knauer, center, Pres. Nixon's assistant for consumer affairs, told labor representatives at a Washington luncheon. With her are AFL-CIO Community Services Dir. Leo Perlis and Evelyn Dubrow of the Ladies' Garment Workers, who is chairman of the AFL-CIO subcommittee on consumer affairs.

by the Giumarra Fruit Corp.

The growers have repeatedly scoffed at the boycott, calling it a "total failure."

But on July 3 they told the U.S. District Court at Fresno that the boycott had cost them $25 million and asked for an injunction and triple damages under the antitrust laws.

The suit was filed by the Central California Farmers Committee, Inc., of Dinuba, Tulare county, and 81 individual growers and shippers. The same group was granted court permission to take depositions from executives of nine Chicago area food stores.

UFWOC Atty. Jerome Cohen called the suit the growers' "annual attempt to scare the chain stores." The union, he said, is considering a countersuit charging that the growers are acting in restraint of trade by threatening 10 other growers who have agreed to negotiate.

The latter group has been meeting with UFWOC in the Federal Building at Los Angeles, where the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service is assisting in the talks at the request of both sides.

The parties recessed for the weekend amid reports of some progress. One of the 10 growers is Lionel Steinberg, member of the California State Board of Agriculture who owns a large ranch in the Coachella Valley, where UFWOC is on strike.

Steinberg resigned from the California Grape & Tree Fruit League after 20 years of membership in protest against the league's claims that the union boycott isn't hurting at all.

Steinberg, who seeks a truce with the union, said "we cannot continue to try to sweep this problem under the rug." Whether the boycott is "illegal and immoral" as some growers claim, "it is also a fact and we must recognize it, and try to deal with it in a manner fair to both sides," he said.

UFWOC has contracts with nearly a dozen large growers in the wine grape industry. The contracts have benefited the workers notably and are being observed with substantial success, both sides reported.

UFWOC said that some 1,800 pickers are on strike in the Coachella Valley, with growers able to replace only about 1,000 with alien "green card" holders from Mexico. The strike also has spread to the Phoenix, Ariz., area where more than 300 workers have walked off the fields to join the union.

Farm Subsidy Ceiling Voted Down by Senate

The Senate voted down a proposal to put a $20,000 ceiling on the farm subsidy that could be paid to any individual or corporation after promises that the entire issue of farm subsidies would be considered later this year in separate legislation.

The $20,000 limit had been added by the House to an Agriculture Dept. appropriation bill, after a bipartisan floor revolt against payments running into millions of dollars to a few huge corporate farms and wealthy growers.

Opponents argued that a "snapback" provision of the present farm program would require the government to pay out more money than it does now. The Senate Appropriations Committee deleted the $20,000 limit from the bill before sending it to the floor.

An attempt to restore the subsidy ceiling was defeated, 53-34. The issue now goes to a House-Senate conference committee, just as it did last year when the House and Senate took similar actions. At that time, the House conferees—who opposed the ceiling when it was voted by the House—happily gave in without a fight.

Agriculture Sec. Clifford M. Hardin said earlier that the Administration hopes to come up with a plan to "modify downward" the farm subsidy program.

In other action, a House-Senate conference committee agreed on a mild limitation on the amount of money the government can spend for the fiscal year that started July 1.

The initial figure was put at $191.9 billion—a cut of $1 billion from the spending estimate by Pres. Nixon in his budget. However the ceiling would rise or fall as Congress acted to raise or lower specific appropriations. In addition, there is a $2 billion "cushion" for items over which neither Congress nor the President has control, such as interest on the public debt.

The cutback is considerably milder than the budget slash Congress ordered the executive branch to make last year. Congress also repealed a freeze on filling government jobs it had imposed last year. The evidence was that the job freeze in some departments had cost more in overtime pay than was saved.

Labor Dept. Okays NMU Vote Results

New York—The U.S. Dept. of Labor has certified the results of a special National Maritime Union election won by NMU Pres. Joseph Curran and all 95 candidates on his slate.

Dir. Frank M. Kleiler of the Labor Dept.'s Office of Labor-Management & Welfare-Pension Reports filed an affidavit in U.S. District Court saying that investigations showed no ground to sustain complaints of unlawful interference, as some losers charged.

All candidates on the Curran ticket were elected in March for four-year terms. Most had previously been elected in 1966 but a special election was ordered at the request of the Labor Dept.

Unilateral Change Blocked:

Firm Must Bargain On Retiree Benefits

about changes in their retirement benefits.

- That such bargaining is lawful "because of the interest which active employes have in this subject."
- That bargaining about such benefits complies with the law's requirements that "wages, hours and other terms and conditions of employment" are proper collective bargaining subjects.

Briefs urging the board to reverse the examiner were filed by a number of labor organizations led by the AFL-CIO. The U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers urged approval of the examiner's decision.

AFL-CIO General Counsel J. Albert Woll cited a federation review of 25 major contracts covering 635,000 employes represented by 20 different unions. The study, he said, supports the conclusion that retiree benefits are a "mandatory subject of collective bargaining, and there is not a single factor of substance which supports the examiner's opposite conclusion."

Board Member Sam Zagoria dissented from the decision, saying he agrees with Examiner James V. Constantine that the complaint of the union should be dismissed. He argued that retired persons "are no longer working for the employer, are not on the payroll, probably have no access to the plant or hope of recall to employment" and should be considered pensioners, not employes.

The union has had a contract with PPG in Barberton since 1950. In 1965, following the enactment of Medicare, it asked the company to "engage in mid-term bargaining" on insurance benefits for retired employes "of a type not available under Medicare."

In 1966 the management first told the union it intended to cancel the negotiated health insurance plan for retirees, and challenged the union's right to bargain for retirees at all. Two days later the company said that on reconsideration it would leave the health plan for the retired workers "intact," but if an employe chose to withdraw from the plan, it would contribute $3 a month toward Medicare premiums.

The company sent letters to all retirees and 15 of 190 canceled their participation in the company plan. The union then filed refusal-to- bargain charges against PPG.

The board majority noted that it has long been established that employers and unions must bargain in good faith about pensions and health benefits for employes upon retirement, and that "it is equally settled that unilateral changes in negotiated pension and insurance plans violate" the law. The board said "the single question to be decided here is whether these principles apply to such benefits for employes who have already retired."

The majority reviewed the history of the law and court decisions in finding that an employe does not sever all ties with union contract benefits when he retires.

For retired employes, it wrote, "the critical question is whether the benefit is founded on employment. . . . The benefits paid to them in retirement are part of the return on their investment of a lifetime of labor."

It would "virtually stand the Act on its head" to hold that the retiree's employer is free to deal with him unilaterally and that the union "may not represent him with respect to changes in the very plan it negotiated for him," the board observed.

Counsel for Consumers Urged in Utility Cases

Labor strongly supports legislation to set up a federal watchdog agency to represent consumers before utility regulatory commissions, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller testified.

He urged a Senate Government Operations subcommittee to clear a utility consumers' counsel bill that has been introduced by Sen. Lee Metcalf (D-Mont.) and a number of other senators.

The counsel, backed by an expert staff, would intervene in proceedings before state and federal regulatory agencies on behalf of the users of electricity, gas, telephones and other regulated utilities.

Regulatory commissions, which set rates and rule on adequacy of services, normally hear only the industry's side of the case, Biemiller noted.

"The utility is usually bolstered by phalanxes of accountants, financial experts, lawyers and economic consultants. It descends on a hearing like a Roman legion. The staff of the state regulatory commission is completely outmanned and outgunned," Biemiller testified.

In rare cases, where consumer groups and unions have been able to hire their own experts and finance detailed studies, rate increases have been denied or reduced. But, Biemiller stressed, "there are too many holes in the dike and too few fingers. What a consumer needs is full-time representation with skilled, adequate manpower at all levels of government."

Biemiller also endorsed a section of the bill requiring public disclosure of financial data and ownership links of regulated utilities. If this were done, Biemiller said, "the fictitious goldfish bowl that the utilities allege themselves to be placed in for public scrutiny would become a real goldfish bowl, and they could swim around in full view."

The legislation would also provide federal grants to state and local governments to create and operate their own utility consumers' offices and finance needed research of importance to consumers.

Biemiller noted that technological advances in the electric utility industry alone point to savings of as much as $11 billion a year by 1980.

He asked, "Will America's electric consumers share in these cost reductions? Will their interests be adequately represented?"

Without legislation, "under the present regulatory climate we believe not."

Surtax Linked to Reforms:

Senate Opens Tax Hearings, Labor Hits 'Triple Standard'

raise the surtax for individuals, who paid only a 7.5 percent surtax on their 1968 earnings.

The House bill has some desirable features, Biemiller acknowledged, but even these need strengthening.

The exemption from income tax for the lowest-income families is a flat dollar amount geared to today's poverty level. But it won't take effect until 1970, Biemiller noted. "Hence it will be outdated even before it becomes effective."

As for the labor-supported repeal of the 7 percent investment tax credit, it contains "unnecessary exceptions" which reduce the revenue it will bring in.

If there is need for a surtax, the rate for corporations should be double that for individuals, Biemiller said. After-tax profits of corporations are up 98.5 percent above 1960 levels, "a much faster increase than other major forms of income."

It is the ordinary consumer, he stressed, not the corporations, who are hurt most by "rising prices, the highest interest rates in 100 years, and phenomenal increases in regressive state and local sales and property taxes."

Labor does not question the need for sufficient federal revenues to meet the nation's commitments, fully fund domestic social programs and avoid meat-axe budget cuts, Biemiller said.

But he insisted that "the injustices in the nation's revenue-raising methods cannot again be ignored—or compounded through a tax increase based on a structure that is inequitable."

Americans expect justice and equity in their tax laws, Biemiller said, and the labor movement sticks by the statement it has reiterated throughout the controversy over surtax extension:

"We in the AFL-CIO will not support any extension of the surtax, until it is combined with immediate, substantial and equitable reform of the federal income tax structure."

Earlier, Treasury Sec. David M. Kennedy had appealed to the Senate committee to move the surtax bill through Congress now and consider tax reform later.

He raised the possibility of wage and price controls as an alternative to control inflation—a remark that the New York Times reported caused "considerable unhappiness within the Nixon Administration." The President has repeatedly expressed his strong opposition to such controls.

The Administration and Republican congressional leaders continued, however, to seek to bring pressure for Senate action on the surtax by pinning an inflation label on opponents.

House Republican Leader Gerald R. Ford told newsmen after leaving the White House: "It is the strong feeling of the President and the Administration that those who for one reason or another delay the consideration and the enactment of the surtax are responsible for any of the ill effects that take place in the economy."

Actually, there has been no economic effect of the delay since Congress voted to continue the surtax withholding rate for an additional month while the extension bill is being considered.

Senate Republican Leader Everett M. Dirksen likewise protested consideration of tax reform before action on the surtax extension.

But Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield stated his full agreement with the Finance Committee's plans for complete hearings on tax reform.

Mansfield told newsmen that he wanted both a surtax bill and tax reform legislation on the Senate floor at the same time and he would not schedule a vote on the surtax until tax reform can be acted on.

Meanwhile the House Ways & Means Committee continued its closed door consideration of tax reform proposals.

The committee has promised to bring a reform bill to the House floor before the Aug. 13 recess.

Picket Line Prompts 'Sermon' on Unionism

St. Louis—A Los Angeles clergyman who practices what he preaches refused to cross a union picket line here to serve on a speakers' panel at the 25th annual meeting of the Foundation for American Agriculture.

The Rev. Wayne C. Hartmire, Jr., of the California Migrant Ministry refused to occupy his room at Stouffer's Waterfront Inn or speak at the meeting. En route to the inn, he discovered that members of the Hotel & Restaurant Employes have been conducting an informational picket line at the inn. The pickets are protesting Stouffer's refusal to recognize five culinary unions as representatives of employes at the big new facility near the Gateway Arch.

The Rev. Mr. Hartmire is not a union member, but his work with the United Farm Workers has convinced him of the value of unionism. When his explanatory letter to a foundation official was made public here, AFL-CIO organizing Dir. William L. Kircher and Regional Dir. Delmond Garst called it the "best sermon" on unionism they have read in years.

"I wish I did not have to write this letter," Hartmire wrote Charles Dana Bennett of the foundation. "I have given it much thought since seeing you early last evening.

"I came prepared to speak to the Foundation, and I was genuinely looking forward to the dialogue that would have followed."

Recounting his discovery of the AFL-CIO picket line, the clergyman said he found that "this is the only major non-union hotel in St. Louis" and "apparently it is the policy of Stouffer's to keep it totally non-union."

This "may seem like a small matter to you," Hartmire went on, but "to the American workingman his union represents the only dependable and effective way of participating in the decisions of our democracy, and the only way of attaining a measure of economic justice."

It is "unfortunately symbolic of agribusiness's resistance to justice for farm workers," he continued, "that the Foundation for American Agriculture is meeting in a notorious non-union hotel"—a fact probably known to the local businessmen who planned the meeting, he noted.

"Feeling as strongly as I do about the need of a union for farm workers, I don't see how I can formally participate in a meeting which inevitably encourages antilabor management of this hotel, nor can I undercut the unionizing efforts of the hotel workers by crossing their picket line," he said.

The California Migrant Ministry describes itself as "the church at work with farm workers." The staff is drawn from the Northern California-Nevada Council of Churches and the Council of Churches in Southern California.

The Foundation for American Agriculture is dominated by farm corporations and their industrial suppliers.

Ship Engineers Ratify Gulf-Atlantic Contract

New York—The Marine Engineers announced that new three-year agreements providing "dramatic innovations for maritime labor" have been ratified by MEBA members in Atlantic and Gulf Coast ports.

The union represents 9,000 members on the two coasts. Negotiations between MEBA and the Pacific Maritime Association for West Coast members are continuing in San Francisco.

MEBA was one of three unions which coordinated their bargaining on a "team" basis and reached agreement with ship owners before the June 15 contract expiration deadline. The others were the National Maritime Union and the American Radio Association.

A fourth union, the Masters, Mates & Pilots, reached tentative settlements in separate negotiations after a two-day strike against dry cargo vessels and a longer walkout against tankers.

MEBA Pres. Jesse M. Calhoon said his union's new pacts "set new standards of personal security" for engine-room officers while providing a three-year period of stability for ship owners.

In addition to a 6 percent annual rise in base pay and a series of changes in working conditions, Calhoon listed five important gains in the MEBA agreements:

- Retirement after 20 years of service with a minimum pension of $325 a month or 37.5 percent of base pay, whichever is larger; or a sliding scale providing up to $425 a month or 50 percent of base pay after 25 years' service.
- Engineers on dry cargo ships will get 10 days' vacation for each 30 days worked, plus an additional four days for each 30 days worked on "fast-turnaround" ships. Tanker engineers will get 15 days for each 30 days worked. Both groups can carry vacation credits from one ship line to another.
- Overtime at time and one-half pay after eight hours in one day, 40 hours in one week, for work outside regular tours of duty and for work on Saturdays, Sundays and holidays.
- Major improvements in welfare provisions, including a raise in company-paid life insurance from $5,000 to $20,000; expanded major medical protection, and benefits equivalent to those of medicare for all pensioners until age 65.
- Substantial benefits within a cover-all package for all members of MEBA and the other two unions which coordinated their bargaining.

The pension agreement obligates employers to contribute in each contract year the same amount of dollars previously contributed during the past three years—a high employment period. If employment drops, the rate of dollar contribution to the fund will be raised, Calhoon said.

This year's negotiations centered on the fact that new U.S. freighters with highly automated equipment require fewer crew members. Carrying huge containers of freight which can be speedily loaded and unloaded, they spend little time in port. The net result is a high increase in productivity per crew member, the union said.

Religious Leaders Call on Congress For Farm Worker Bargaining Law

Full collective bargaining rights for farm workers are favored by Christian and Jewish church groups and the National Farmers Organization, their representatives testified at hearings called by the Senate Labor subcommittee.

Spokesmen for the National Council of Churches, the Commission on Social Action of Reform Judaism, and the NFO voiced support for a pending bill to extend the protections of the National Labor Relations Act to farm and field laborers. Scheduled to testify later are the Catholic bishops and other groups interested in the plight of the farm workers.

Extension of the labor act to agricultural workers is strongly favored by the AFL-CIO and the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee. Mrs. Dolores Huerta, vice president of UFWOC, told the subcommittee earlier this year that farm workers, excluded from the law in 1935, need it in their struggle for "signed contracts . . . good wages . . . a strong union."

Harry L. Graham, legislative representative for dairy, cattle and other farm owners represented by the NFO, told the subcommittee "there can be no economic justice in our society until its benefits are extended to all."

Graham reminded the subcommittee "and our friends in the labor movement that we claim for agricultural producers the same rights to organize and to bargain collectively which we would extend to our employes" who do farm labor.

American farmers, Graham said, are "not opposed to economic gains by our brethren" in labor groups because they understand, "perhaps better than any other group, that a prosperous agriculture depends on prosperous customers."

Where farm workers have already been organized—in Hawaii and California—"there is not only labor peace but increased efficiency," Graham said.

Rev. Shirley E. Greene, field secretary for the Methodist Board of Missions, supported the proposed bill but asked that restrictions against labor unions in the Taft-Hartley and Landrum-Griffin laws be omitted with respect to farm workers.

Greene called "unacceptable" the Nixon Administration's proposal that a special board be created to deal with farm labor, and that a cooling-off period be provided to delay strikes at harvest time or other critical periods. This would make the workers powerless, he said.

Marvin Braiterman, speaking for the Reform Judaism group, said his church has traditionally favored equitable treatment of labor by employers. If it was ever just and necessary to exclude farm workers from coverage under the labor law, Braiterman said, "it is clear to us that justice and necessity require that this exclusion be ended now."

Jerome Adler Named Music Fund Trustee

New York—Jerome H. Adler, New York legal counsel for the Musicians for many years, has been named trustee of the Music Performance Trust Fund succeeding Samuel H. Rosenbaum of Philadelphia, who resigned.

10 Field Staffers Added To Community Services

Ten full-time community services representatives have been added to the AFL-CIO Community Services Activities to expand the department's operations to 126 communities with a field staff of 160.

Leo Perlis, director of the federation's CSA program, said the new representatives were assigned to the United Fund operations at Sioux City, Ia.; Knoxville, Tenn.; Union County, N.J.; Honolulu; Jacksonville, Fla.; Passaic County, N.J.; Little Rock, Ark.; Lima, Ohio; Muncie, Ind., and Montreal.

Labor Sees 'Tragic Mistake':

Jobless Aid Plan Ignores Standards

In most states, the maximum benefit is so low that only the lowest-paid workers are able to collect 50 percent of their lost wages.

Pres. Eisenhower made the same request 15 years ago—but only two of the states have come up to that goal.

Nixon said in his message that "it is essential that the benefit maximum be raised" if the unemployment insurance program is to "fulfill its role . . . to pay weekly benefits high enough to prevent a severe cut in a worker's standard of living when he is between jobs."

But in what Labor Sec. George P. Shultz described as "one more effort to work with the states," Nixon called upon the states "to act within the next two years to meet this goal, thereby averting the need for federal action."

Seidman said the AFL-CIO will press for its own legislative proposals on unemployment insurance, "which will fully reflect the need for immediate federal action in this field."

Nixon did propose some new federal standards—one to enable unemployed workers enrolled in retraining programs to continue to receive unemployment insurance, and others to toughen eligibility for benefits.

The President asked Congress to bar strikers from receiving jobless benefits—something which now is permitted only in New York and Rhode Island, and then only after long waiting periods.

The Administration proposed to extend unemployment insurance coverage, starting in 1972, to:

- 1.6 million workers in small firms with less than four employes.
- 400,000 on large farms.
- 200,000 in agriculture processing employment not now covered.
- 1.8 million persons employed by non-profit organizations.
- 600,000 employes of state hospitals and universities.
- 200,000 salesmen, delivery tradesmen and others not currently defined as employes under the law.

This would still leave some 12 million American workers without coverage, the AFL-CIO statement noted.

The Administration bill would provide for up to 13 weeks of federal benefits for workers who have exhausted their state benefits during recession periods.

The federal extended-benefit program would take effect only when the jobless rate among those covered by unemployment insurance is 4.5 percent or higher for three consecutive months.

That would translate into somewhere between 5 and 6 percent actual unemployment, since the jobless rate for covered employes is always less than the overall unemployment rate. Currently, for example, the overall jobless rate is 3.4 percent but the insured unemployment rate is only 2.1 percent.

The President also proposed that the wage base on which the federal unemployment insurance payroll tax is levied be raised from $3,000 to $4,800 in 1972 and to $6,000 in 1974. This would pay for the extended benefit program, Nixon said.

The Administration also asked that states be required to deny benefits to persons with less than 15 weeks employment during their base period, regardless of the amount of their earnings while employed. A few states have used an earnings amount, rather than a time period, to determine eligibility.

In virtually all respects, the new Administration proposal is a cutback from the recommendations made during the Johnson Administration.

The Johnson Administration's bill was hacked down in the House Ways & Means Committee, with federal benefit standards dropped, extension of coverage trimmed to 3.5 million and extended benefits only during recessions with a 13-week maximum. It passed the House in 1966 under a no-amendment rule.

The Senate restored part of the cutbacks made by the House, including benefit standards. But the House delayed naming conferees until shortly before adjournment and the legislation died with the end of the 89th Congress.

With the House Ways & Means Committee this year tied up on tax reform, September is the earliest date the committee could turn to unemployment insurance.

Gildea Named To Top Post on Meany's Staff

James C. Gildea has been appointed executive assistant to the president of the AFL-CIO, Federation Pres. George Meany announced.

Gildea, whose career in the labor movement spans nearly three decades of service both at the national and state levels, succeeds Lane Kirkland, who became secretary-treasurer of the AFL-CIO on July 1.

Born in Hazleton, Pa., on Oct. 5, 1922, Gildea started in the labor movement as a member of the Textile Workers Union of America. He joined the staff of the CIO on July 23, 1941.

After serving with the armed forces from 1943 to 1946, Gildea studied labor economics and other labor subjects at George Washington University and American University in Washington, D.C.

In November 1958, after serving as assistant to the secretary-treasurer of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., he became special assistant to the president of the AFL-CIO, and in 1962 became assistant to the president, a post he has held since then.

Gildea is a former vice-president of the Maryland State and D.C. AFL-CIO and a former vice president of the Greater Washington Central Labor Council. He has led a number of organizing campaigns for the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers and, on occasion, has worked in organizational efforts for the TWUA.

Gildea, his wife and three children, reside in Chevy Chase, Maryland.

CONTENTMENT for this union member's son meant an ice cream soda and a spoon at the first annual picnic of Retail Clerks Local 888 in New York City. The picnic featured a puppet show, dance contests, games and races and what the union called a "pleasant blending of members of all colors, creeds and standing."

Broad Federal Authority Urged over Rail Safety

Passage of broad, new federal legislation to reduce a "large and steady" increase in accidents on railroads has been urged by a government task force made up of representatives of labor, management and the public.

The task force, which has been examining the rail safety problem since May 1 at the request of Sec. of Transportation John A. Volpe, presented an eight-point program.

The report is regarded by railroad unions as a milestone since it represents the first time that designated representatives of management have conceded the need for greater federal regulatory powers in the area of railroad safety.

The report noted that the 8,028 train accidents recorded in 1968 represent "a significant increase, by any yardstick, over the 4,148 recorded in 1961."

In 1968, when 146 employes were killed and 17,993 were injured, the report added, most accidents could be attributed to human error, failure of equipment and "defects in or improper maintenance of track and roadbed."

In light of these factors, it concluded, there must be "effective steps taken to bring the problem under control," including enactment of "broad federal regulatory powers" over railroad safety.

The report recommended that the Secretary of Transportation, through the Federal Railroad Administration, be given authority "to promulgate reasonable and necessary" rules and standards for safety.

It said that reporting of railroad mishaps is inadequate—a point long emphasized by labor—and urged the Dept. of Transportation to revise its reporting rules in consultation with management, unions and state regulatory commissions.

In other areas, the report recommended that:

- A National Railroad Safety Advisory Committee be established headed by the Federal Railroad Administrator with representation from state regulatory commissions, management and labor.
- A federal-state partnership in carrying out a safety program be continued unless pre-empted by federal action.
- Employe training programs be expanded "to insure compliance with safe operating practices and to reduce the impact of human error in accidents."
- Current authority over the shipment of dangerous materials be further evaluated with a view to strengthening it.
- A government - industry research program in safety technology be initiated and funded immediately for an initial three-year period.
- An expanded grade crossing safety program be established with new sources of funding provided.

Labor members of the task force were George E. Leighty, chairman of the Railway Labor Executives Association; Donald S. Beattie, RLEA executive secretary; Al H. Chesser, national legislative representative, United Transportation Union; and William E. Skutt, assistant grand chief engineer, Locomotive Engineers.

P. L. Siemiller To Head NAB Labor Affairs

P. L. Siemiller, retired president of the Machinists, has been named vice president of labor relations for the National Alliance of Businessmen.

The NAB was created last year with the objective to locate jobs in private industry for unskilled and disadvantaged workers who have difficulty finding satisfactory full-time work.

Siemiller, who has been IAM president from 1965 until his retirement July 1, succeeds Robert McGlotten in the NAB post. McGlotten had been on loan to the organization from the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights.

Matthew DeMore, who retired with Siemiller after serving as IAM secretary-treasurer since 1965, has also taken a new job as vice president of the National Council of Senior Citizens.

Desegregation Delay Draws Sharp Protest

ber of southern school districts privately urged him to enforce the guidelines firmly so that they in turn could resist local segregationist pressures to delay action.

Both the AFL-CIO American Federation of Teachers and the National Education Association wired strong protests to Pres. Nixon.

Convention Outraged

Delegates to the NAACP convention, meeting in Jackson, Miss., heard the news with dismay and outrage. And NAACP Executive Dir. Roy Wilkins said bitterly, "It's almost enough to make you vomit."

In Congress, Sen. Walter F. Mondale (D-Minn.) said the Administration's "closest educational advisers" appear to be Sen. Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.) and Harry Dent, former aide to Thurmond who now is a White House staff official.

Republican Sen. Jacob K. Javits (N.Y.) joined in the protest and warned that the decision to ease enforcement of the guidelines "could prove to be disastrous."

Despite the criticism, HEW sources said the policy statement should be viewed as a victory for those who sought strong enforcement of the guidelines. They pointed to new cutoffs of federal funds by HEW and Justice Dept. school desegregation suits within a week after the guidelines announcement.

Thurmond said that from his viewpoint the new policy is "an improvement over past policy" but does not go as far as he would like.

Labor Mourns Assassination Of Tom Mboya

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has cabled the Kenya Confederation of Trade Unions to express U.S. labor's "deepest sorrow and shock" on the assassination of Kenyan leader Tom Mboya.

Mboya, shot down at a pharmacy in Nairobi, helped found the labor federation and formerly served as its general secretary. He was Kenya's Minister of Planning & Economic Development.

Meany described Mboya as "our esteemed trade union colleague, dedicated champion of Kenya independence and tireless fighter for democracy and social justice for all the peoples of Africa."

"We of American labor," Meany said, "are proud of our early association with Brother Mboya in his pioneering role in building the free trade union movement of Kenya."

The AFL-CIO president voiced hope Kenya's unions and democratic forces will "redouble their efforts in their struggle for the ideals which inspired their fallen leader."

Defense Dept. 'Neutrality' Scored on Grape Buying

Meany Hits Senate Unit's Surtax Vote

By David L. Perlman

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany called on the Senate to back Majority Leader Mike Mansfield's position that the surtax extension bill be held up until tax reform legislation can be considered at the same time.

"The AFL-CIO will continue to oppose extension of the surtax," Meany said, "unless it is combined with immediate, substantial and equitable reform of the federal income tax structure."

Meany's statement came only a few hours after the Senate Finance Committee—by a 9-8 vote—approved without change the House-passed surtax extension bill.

That sent the bill to the Senate calendar, but Mansfield earlier served notice that he won't call up the bill for debate until tax reform is ready for action.

"This is the only way to achieve tax justice—and that's what America's taxpayers want and need," Meany said.

He termed the bill cleared by the Finance Committee "patently unfair."

The AFL-CIO president dismissed as "pure political propaganda" the Administration's scare campaign predicting massive inflation if the surtax isn't passed at once.

"If the surtax does tamp inflation, which so far it has not accomplished," Meany noted, "the temporary extension of the withholding rate—already once done—can be continued."

Meany added: "Make no mistake about it, those who fight to pass the surtax extension with speed and without reforms are the foes of tax justice. If the surtax is extended now, without amendments, the battle to achieve tax justice will be lost."

The Finance Committee's action came after a week of the heaviest Administration pressure on the Senate to pass the surtax bill before Congress begins a three-week recess on Aug. 13.

It would be "unthinkable," Treasury Sec. David M. Kennedy told a news conference, for the Senate Democratic Policy Committee to stick by its unanimous resolution that the Senate will not act on the surtax without tax reform legislation.

The Administration won at least a partial convert in Senate Finance Committee Chairman Russell B. Long (D-La.). Long initially appeared to support the Democratic leadership position. But after a White House meeting with Pres. Nixon, he said the surtax bill with a few reforms added to it should be passed promptly because it would take too long for his com-

Boost in Purchases Held Aid to Growers

By Eugene A. Kelly

A Defense Dept. official insisted that the Pentagon is remaining neutral in the California grape strike and boycott even as he admitted that the department had stepped up sharply its purchase of the struck table grapes.

Deputy Executive Dir. Dale R. Babione of the Defense Supply Agency, in testimony before the Senate Migratory Labor subcommittee, also acknowledged that the agency had notified all supply officers they could order table grapes as a substitute for oranges and other fruit.

Subcommittee Chairman Walter F. Mondale (D-Minn.) asked Babione: "When you increase grape purchases 40 percent in one year, and shipments to Viet Nam nearly 400 percent, what's the limit before you become non-neutral?"

Mrs. Dolores Huerta, vice president of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, called the increased grape purchases by an arm of the U.S. government "a national outrage."

"How can the department explain its intervention in this strike?" she asked.

Mrs. Huerta, Babione and AFL-CIO Organization Dir. William L. Kircher were the first witnesses as the subcommittee opened its third set of hearings into the problems of farm workers in dealing with organized growers.

Change Asked

After Babione testified, Sen. Alan Cranston (D-Calif.) of the subcommittee urged Defense Sec. Melvin R. Laird to advise the Pentagon to show "true neutrality" by holding its grape purchases to their pre-strike level.

Despite all the supply agency's good intentions, the "end result" of its policies is "not to be neutral," Cranston informed Babione at the hearing.

Babione agreed to supply additional information, including data

House Group Clears Voting Rights Bill

The House Judiciary Committee handed a bipartisan rebuff to the Nixon Administration by approving a five-year extension of the Voting Rights Act.

Democrats and Republicans joined in urging continued federal supervision of voting laws and practices in the southern states that previously used legal stratagems such as rigged literacy tests and intimidation to keep Negroes from voting.

Substitute Rejected

The Administration had proposed instead a nationwide law that would ban all literacy tests and establish a cumbersome procedure requiring the government to go to court to challenge discriminatory voting laws.

Under the present law, in the seven states where it applies, states or cities that change their voting laws must obtain approval either from the Justice Dept. or from a federal court in Washington, D.C., before they take effect.

The civil rights coalition of religious, Negro, labor and civic organizations, which led the fight for the 1965 law, opposed the Administration bill on two key grounds. It would open the way to new efforts by Deep South states to restrict

'In Foreseeable Future':

White House Rejects Wage-Price Control

The Nixon Administration has firmly rejected wage and price controls as a way of dealing with inflation, clearing up confusion over its position created by statements of some of its spokesmen.

The question of controls was revived after Treasury Sec. David M. Kennedy told a news conference that he would "close no doors on any kind of possibilities."

At a White House news briefing, Press Sec. Ronald L. Ziegler was asked if this meant the Administration might consider wage and price controls as an anti-inflationary move.

Ziegler returned with an answer at his afternoon briefing. He said that after talking to the President, Kennedy, Chairman Paul W. McCracken of the Council of Economic Advisers, and Dr. Arthur F. Burns, counsellor to the President, he was authorized to say:

"The President is not for wage and price controls. He has consistently taken that position. This Administration is consistently pursuing a course of action to cool the economy.

"The strategy does not include wage and price controls. The Administration has ruled out wage and price controls as a way of dealing with inflation under conditions that are now foreseeable.

"Looking into the future with the knowledge and experience that this Administration has and projecting various alternatives that could be used in the foreseeable future, wage and price controls would not be considered."

The White House, in off-the-record comments to newsmen, had indicated Nixon's displeasure with previous references by Kennedy to controls. This time the squelch was firmly on the record.

Nixon Health Care Remedy Called 'Thin'

Pres. Nixon warned the nation of a "massive crisis" in health services and said immediate action is needed to prevent a complete breakdown of the system.

The President called newsmen to the White House to hear a report from Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Robert H. Finch and Dr. Roger O. Egeberg, newly-named assistant secretary for health.

The report diagnosed the problem in graphic terms. It said bluntly that the demand for health services is "far in excess of the capacity of our health system to respond." It cited the "crippling inflation" in physicians' fees and hospital charges, the "wasteful" utilization of hospital and nursing home facilities, and the "too little attention to the prevention and early care of illness."

But its "prescription for specific action" is "extremely thin," according to AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bertrand Seidman.

"Except for repetition of two previously-announced cost-controlling measures affecting Medicare and Medicaid, the Administration suggested only some general aims," Seidman noted.

Most conspicuously absent, he said, were proposals "for fundamen-

2-Year Contract Caps Brewery Union Strike

Milwaukee—Brewery Workers returned to their jobs in this beer capital of the United States after ratifying a new two-year contract their union called "the best in the world" for brewers and bottlers.

Ending a five-week strike, members of Brewery Workers Local 9 voted approval of the new contract, which provides wage increases of 75 cents an hour over the two-year term and additional benefits valued at 18 cents.

The contract is with the Joseph Schlitz Brewing Co., Miller Brewing Co., Gettelman Brewing Co., a division of Miller, and the Pabst Brewing Co.

The vote to ratify the new pact was 3,566 in favor, 428 opposed. Picket lines were removed and the strikers returned to work July 16, Local 9 Pres. Kenneth Muller said.

Under the agreement, wages will be raised by 38 cents an hour this year, and an additional 37 cents next year.

The vacation provision was improved to provide six weeks after 17 years, seven weeks after 20. Other improvements were made in the pension, sickness and accident provisions.

The chief gain, the union said, was in new language guaranteeing job security and protection against arbitrary work assignments.

Treasury Asks 5% Ceiling for Savings Bonds

The Treasury Dept. has asked Congress to raise the ceiling on U.S. Savings Bonds from the current 4.25 percent to 5 percent to make them more competitive with other investments that are offering a higher return.

Treasury Sec. David M. Kennedy urged the House Ways and Means Committee to consider legislation increasing the interest rate on all Treasury bonds after it completes work on tax reform.

Earliest possible enactment of meaningful reform is of the highest priority, Kennedy stressed.

The statutory limit of 4.25 percent that may be paid on any Treasury bond has not been changed since 1918.

The proposed 5 percent rate would apply to Savings Bonds purchased after June 1, 1969. Holders of outstanding Savings Bonds would also receive a 5 percent rate for the remaining period to maturity from June 1.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council earlier this year recommended that the interest rate of Savings Bonds be raised in urging more purchases of the bonds through payroll savings plans.

For several successive months, redemptions of Savings Bonds have been running ahead of sales. In June, for example, redemptions were $483 million to sales of $383 million, the Treasury Dept. reported.

Because of the ceiling, the Treasury said that it has been unable to sell marketable government bonds since May 1965. Instead, Kennedy noted, the Treasury has had to rely on short term bills and notes on which there is no ceiling.

State Court Voids Ban On Teachers' Petitions

Sacramento—The California Supreme Court knocked out as unconstitutional a Los Angeles Board of Education rule that teachers may not circulate petitions on school time or property.

The ruling, by unanimous vote of the judges, upheld an appeal brought as a test case by American Federation of Teachers Local 1021, Los Angeles. The state's high court overturned both a Superior Court decision and another by the District Court of Appeal.

Executive Sec. Roger Segure of the union said the decision was one that "may force the School Board to have second thoughts about some of its other repressive rules."

The case involved a petition, circulated by union teachers during their lunch periods, urging Gov. Ronald Reagan (R) to increase funds for public education.

In its decision, the court said school officials have the authority to control conduct "consistent with fundamental constitutional safeguards." But "the government has no valid interest in restricting or prohibiting speech-related activity simply to avert the sort of disturbance, argument or unrest . . . inevitably generated by the expression of ideas which are controversial and invite dispute."

A Bad Result

The idea of a harmonious school faculty is desirable, the court wrote, unless the result is a "teaching faculty composed of unthinking yes-men who will uniformly adhere to a designated side of a constitutional issue."

It is imperative that judges carefully differentiate between those who are violent, and those who express themselves through "peaceful, orderly means," the court declared. It noted that the union's past conduct "clearly evidences respect for the laws, and willingness to challenge them in the court" instead of through disruptive methods.

Joint Construction Unit Seeks Delay on Quotas

Unions and management in the construction industry have joined in a request to the Labor Dept. to postpone a racial quota system on federal construction contracts in the Philadelphia area.

The request was made by the Construction Industry Joint Conference, made up of six national contractors' associations and the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

The chairman of the joint conference, Richard J. Mitchell, stressed that the union-management group "has been sincerely devoted to the cause of equal employment opportunity for a number of years, both in expression and action."

But, he said, the so-called Philadelphia Plan announced by the Labor Dept. on June 27, raises "grave questions of principle, law and procedure."

He urged that its July 18 effective date be postponed until the industry and the Labor Dept. have had a chance to explore alternative, more effective and more practicable methods of assuring job opportunities for minority groups.

Under the plan outlined by Assistant Sec. of Labor Arthur A. Fletcher, bidders on government construction contracts exceeding $500,000 would have to specify the number of non-white or Spanish-surnamed workers to be used in certain skilled trades—iron work, plumbing and pipe fitting, steam fitting, sheet metal work, electrical work, roofing and waterproofing, and elevator construction. The number specified must be within a range set by the Labor Dept.'s Office of Federal Contract Compliance.

One immediate criticism of the plan was that it appeared to conflict with a specific ban on racial quotas in the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

The Labor Dept. said Philadelphia had been chosen as the tryout city for the program because it has one of the smallest percentages of Negro workers in the skilled construction trades.

The union-industry group has questioned whether the Labor Dept.'s data, "based on reports dating back to 1964, are correct in light of the extensive Apprenticeship Outreach program" which has actively recruited non-whites into the skilled trades.

Mitchell noted that the Labor Dept. has issued a number of statements pointing to the "substantial results" achieved with union and management cooperation under the outreach program.

Charles Ferguson Dies, Led Pennsylvania CSA

Harrisburg—Charles F. Ferguson, director of Community Service Activities for the Pennsylvania State AFL-CIO since 1959, died in Harrisburg Hospital after a heart attack. Burial was in Philadelphia after services there.

Ferguson, 56, was state director for the AFL-CIO Appalachian Council Job Corps project at his death. After serving as president of Steelworkers Local 2323 in Chester, Pa., in 1943-44, he served labor and the community with the Chester County Community Chest, the National CIO Community Services Committee, and Pennsylvania CIO Community Services until the merger of AFL and CIO.

Board Cites Growth:

Membership Gains Scored by Potters

Anaheim, Calif.—Delegates to the 75th convention of the Operative Potters heard that the union, despite obstacles, is scoring membership gains and negotiating "substantial improvements" in wages and benefits.

A report submitted by the union's executive board showed the organization chalked up a 5.5 percent membership growth in the past year, added to a 7 percent increase in the previous year.

The officers cited new contracts negotiated in many areas of the United States and Canada. Among those singled out were pacts with American Standard, Inc. covering members of five locals; Crane Canada Ltd.; and plants in Ohio, New Jersey, Indiana and California.

The report also described new agreements that improve pension, health and welfare programs, which have been getting major attention by the union in recent years.

Gains were made, the report indicated, even as the union continued its efforts to limit the importation of foreign pottery which has forced layoffs at some U.S. and Canadian plants.

The 220 delegates met in a mood of sadness as outgoing Pres. E. L. Wheatley, who had announced his retirement effective Aug. 1, 1969, collapsed of an apparent stroke the night before the convention opened.

Lester H. Null, who was elected to succeed Wheatley in a referendum election held in May, was appointed by the executive board to preside over the four days of sessions.

Following the convention, the board appointed Null to fill the president's post in the interim period until Aug. 1 after Wheatley's doctors reported that he would not be able to complete his term.

Null, 45, a former vice president of the union, becomes the Potters' eighth president. He is a member and former president of the union's Local 220, New Orleans. Prior to being elected a vice president, Null served as an international representative.

In the May referendum, Sec.-Treas. George Barbaree and Vice Presidents W. E. Clawges, Bernard Rowbottom, Harold Hackett, Fred Tanner, Robert Lord, George Smith and S. L. Fullerton were re-elected.

Jacob F. Schwab of Local 220 was elected to the vice presidency vacated by Null. Elected as new vice presidents were Joseph Galvin, Jr., Pomona, N.J., and Thomas A. Shuman, Tiffin, O.

The convention approved a constitutional amendment barring any member from contesting for international office or accepting appointment to any international post after reaching age 65.

In a major resolution, the convention called on Congress to enact "much-needed tax reform" to benefit workers and low-income persons who are paying more than a fair share of taxes because of loopholes that benefit the wealthy.

The delegates voted to hold the 1970 convention in New Orleans.

Canadian Nickel Plants Shut by Steelworkers

Toronto—More than 17,000 members of the Steelworkers walked out at Ontario mines and smelters of the International Nickel Co. of Canada when contract talks ended in stalemate.

Unon members refused to work without a contract when Inco management failed to ask for a contract extension, permissible under Ontario labor law.

Members of USWA Local 6500 at Sudbury, Ont., and Local 6200 at Port Colborne maintained picket lines while the provincial mediation service called the parties back to the bargaining table for further negotiations.

The USWA represents 16,000 Inco workers at 10 mines and smelting and refining operations in the Sudbury area. The remaining 1,600 work in the company's nickel refinery at Port Colborne on the Niagara peninsula.

Inco produces some 40 percent of the free world nickel supply at its Ontario operations. Nickel is an important ingredient in making stainless steel and other industry alloys.

When the old contract expired, Inco management had raised its top wage increase offer to 95 cents an hour over three years. The union seeks a pension plan increase, company-paid medical care benefits, and at least $2 an hour more in wages.

Presidents of the two local unions said "we have asked for the best heavy-industry wage rate in Canada" because "we have earned these wages" out of increased production. Management, they told members, "wants you to work for wages that would leave you even farther behind mining and basic industry wages elsewhere" in Canada.

Meanwhile, 1,200 iron ore miners at Sept Iles, Que., ended a seven-week strike against Quebec Cartier Mining Corp. They ratified a contract giving them $1.12 an hour more in wages and benefits over a three-year period.

The miners are members of two USWA locals. They had been earning an average wage of slightly more than $3 an hour. They accepted a company offer that will give them also an improved "northern allowance" worth about 16 cents more an hour for each worker, according to union estimates.

Firm Called For Balk On World Series Break

Palisades Park, Calif.—Sargent Industries violated the ground rules of a contract when it threw out a practice of giving workers an extra half-hour lunch break with pay to watch the World Series, labor-management umpire Melvin Lennard said.

The company had provided television sets and had given the additional lunch period to employes for the past 15 or 20 years. The practice was maintained even in 1966 and 1967 after the company changed hands.

When the practice was dropped in 1968, Machinists Local 1571 filed a grievance. It contended that watching the baseball championship playoff on company time "was a pre-existing condition and that the employes are entitled to watch the . . . World Series pursuant to such condition."

Arbitrator Lennard agreed but said the company did not have to provide the TV sets any more.

Grape Orders Boosted:

Pentagon Accused Of Aid to Growers

on whether the agency is violating its neutrality policy, and whether it is observing Laird's directive to department personnel to consider the domestic impact of their decisions.

The UFWOC, which has been organizing grape workers since 1965 and boycotting growers who refuse to bargain, was asked to supply evidence supporting its charges of bias by some growers in refusing to hire Negroes.

The subcommittee also agreed to seek an investigation by the Justice Dept. into what the union called company-inspired incidents of violence against the strikers.

Kircher and Mrs. Huerta also testified on a related problem—alien "green-card" workers from across the Mexican border—before a House Labor subcommittee. They backed passage of bills to ban the employment of "green-card" holders for use as strike breakers in a labor dispute.

Before the Senate hearings opened, the subcommittee had asked the Defense Dept. to answer 77 questions on the purchase of table grapes and other fruit for the armed forces.

Babione supplied a fact sheet showing that the Defense Supply Agency, which buys food for military dining halls and commissaries, increased its table grape procurements from 7.5 million pounds costing $1.04 million in fiscal 1966 to a projected 11 million pounds and $1.98 million in fiscal 1969.

Shipments of grapes to Viet Nam totaled 468,000 pounds in fiscal 1967; 555,000 pounds in 1968 and an estimated 2.5 million pounds in the fiscal year ended last June 30.

The policy of the Defense Dept., Babione told the subcommittee, is "to refrain from taking a position on the merits of any labor dispute."

He cited rulings by the General Accounting Office and the Comptroller General that an agency may consider the labor practices of a contractor only to the extent that they interfere with contract performance and has "no authority to reject bids" where an employer does not hire union labor.

Mondale asked the witness if he had read a June 30 directive by Laird calling on Defense establishments to exhibit "social consciousness." When Babione said he had not, Mondale asked if he thought an increase of nearly 400 percent in grape shipments to Viet Nam could be called a "neutral response" to the grape boycott.

"Yes, I do," Babione replied.

Mrs. Huerta noted that "many farm workers are members of minority groups—Filipinos and Mexican-Americans and black Americans" and declared that "these same farm workers are on the front lines of battle in Viet Nam."

She said "it is a cruel and ironic slap in the face to these men who have left the fields to fulfill their military obligation to find increasing amounts of non-union grapes in their mess kits, picked by strikebreakers who took the places of their relatives" in California vineyards.

UFWOC's only weapon is the boycott, she stressed, adding: "Just when our boycott is successful, the U.S. military doubles its purchases of table grapes, thus creating a major obstacle to farm worker organizing and union recognition."

The department is "obviously acting as a buyer of last resort for scab grapes and is, in effect, providing another form of federal subsidy for antiunion growers who would destroy the efforts of the poor to build a union," she said.

Mrs. Huerta charged that after 10 California employers announced they would bargain with the union, one lost 35,000 boxes of grapes in a fire, another was attacked so viciously that he almost lost his sight, and others have received telephoned death threats.

"The growers have all the economic power, and the help of government agencies, state and federal," she said. "Our union offices in Delano have been bombed, armed gunmen took our files, our auto insurance is being canceled and our pickets are beaten and arrested. Yet the growers say we are violent."

Kircher said he was "amazed and shocked" at the Defense Dept.'s purchasing policies, and at the persistent law violations by employers like J. P. Stevens & Co., Inc., which continue to violate the law and continue to win Defense Dept. contracts.

Farm workers are not protected by the labor laws, Kircher noted. But he cited the "terrible impact of employer intimidation on impoverished workers even where there is a law."

At the House Labor subcommittee hearings Chairman Frank Thompson (D-N.J.) cited evidence that some employers are using alien "green-card" workers from Mexico to depress wages and working conditions.

Kircher said the AFL-CIO strongly supports bills under which aliens admitted for permanent residence under green card permits or "wetbacks" who enter illegally "could no longer be used by employers to undercut wages and working conditions, or restrict employment opportunities, or act as strikebreakers in labor disputes on the American side" of the U.S.-Mexico border.

The AFL-CIO is not opposed to the green card in principle but only as it has been used in practice, Kircher said, as "a commuter ticket to cheap jobs, strikebreaking, substandard wages" and other practices that erode U.S. standards.

Kircher called attention also to the so-called Mexican border development program, started in 1965 by the government of Mexico. The program operates to "lure U.S. firms to avoid Fair Labor Standards Act and National Labor Relations Act provisions" by importing exploited people south of the border.

Another witness was Arnold Mayer, Meat Cutters legislative representative. He presented statements of union staff members in the Rio Grande valley of Texas about employers who use "green carders" to depress wages and working conditions.

Jehovah's Witnesses Ban Table Grapes

New York—Jehovah's Witnesses will stop buying table grapes, the church group announced at its annual convention here in Yankee Stadium.

The switch came when Dir. Cesar Chavez of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee protested distribution of non-union table grapes at the convention. "For the first time," explained Dir. John Groh, "we learned of the magnitude of the problem" of the farm workers and their nationwide grape boycott.

In the future, the Witnesses will offer nectarines to the 85,000 delegates, Groh said.

PENTAGON GRAPE PURCHASES are a "national outrage," Farm Workers Vice Pres. Dolores Huerta tells the Senate Migratory Labor subcommittee. AFL-CIO Organization Dir. William L. Kircher discusses the problems of grape workers with the subcommittee chairman, Sen. Frank Thompson (D-N.J.), right. Defense Supply Agency witnesses were called before the subcommittee to explain why table grape shipments to Viet Nam were increased more than 350 percent.

Plantation Owners Sip on Subsidies As Workers Toil at $1.30 an Hour

Houma, La.—Organized labor reinforced its drive here to raise wages of sugar cane workers above the poverty level even as some field hands were threatened with the loss of their jobs because of expected cutbacks in production brought on by federal farm subsidy payments.

The Louisiana AFL-CIO and the Meat Cutters rallied about 200 plantation workers for a "walk in" at the Agriculture Dept.'s annual wage and price hearing for the sugar industry.

The union plantation workers are pressing for a $2 minimum wage. Most now earn $1.35 an hour as tractor operators and $1.30 as common laborers.

In testimony at the Agriculture Dept. hearing, it was noted that a survey of 375 workers on 75 plantations found that they had an average income of $2,400 last year. This is substantially below the poverty level as defined by the Office of Economic Opportunity guidelines for non-farm families.

Since the plantation workers are unable to grow a significant portion of their own food, the USDA was urged to consider the field hands as non-farm workers.

Mrs. Essie Briscoe, wife of a tractor operator who earns $1.40 an hour, told the hearing committee that she had to feed her family of eight on $35 every two weeks.

"We cannot afford to buy milk and other nutritious foods that we all need for good health," she said. "I cannot serve meat to my family over once or twice a week."

Living conditions on the plantations also were decried during the nine-hour hearing. Joyce Westbrook, daughter of a tractor driver, said that housing provided by the plantations was inadequate and medical care was virtually unavailable.

Some workers live in the same houses that were used by slaves more than a century ago, said Alex Hurder, speaking for a volunteer student group called the Louisiana Summer Project.

Because of their meager wages, most sugar cane workers are debt-ridden with little personal property, the committee was told.

James Sewire, a 49-year-old plantation worker, told the New Orleans Times Picayune that he has little to show for working in the fields nearly a quarter of a century.

"I've been here 23-24 years," he recalled, "but I don't own anything. The house I live in with my family belongs to the company. It's not mine."

Yet, Sewire is in danger of losing his job because the company he works for, Southdown, Inc., is being paid by the Federal Agricultural Stabilization & Conservation Service to cut back production.

On another plantation, Felix Ledet, 52, started working in the fields when he was 10 and has not missed a harvest in 42 years.

But when sugar cane acreage is cut back again next year by the ASCS on the J. B. Levert Land Co's., Rienzi Plantation Ledet may be out of a job—and he is not entitled to any part of the $34,127 ASCS conditional payment going to his employer.

"I don't have any kind of subsidy to protect me," said Ledet, who makes $1.40 an hour.

Of the more than $3 billion which the ASCS paid out last year, $30.3 million went into the personal and corporate accounts of Louisiana farm owners and managers. These payments are made, said ASCS field manager E. D. Dixon, in return for not planting cotton, feed grains, or rice—or for curtailing sugar cane acreage—according to ASCS allotments.

Henry Pelet, of the Louisiana AFL-CIO urged that the minimum wage for the workers be raised to $2 an hour. He took issue with the contention of Louisiana State University economist Joe Campbell that the sugar cane industry cannot afford a wage increase. He charged that Campbell's report contained many misrepresentations.

Frank Lapeyrolerie, secretary-treasurer of the Meat Cutters' Agricultural & Allied Workers Local 300, called for wages of field workers using heavy equipment machinery to be put on parity with those of the construction industry.

The Louisiana Summer Project group stated higher wages are desperately needed to help free the workers from the deplorable housing conditions on the plantations.

A survey by the volunteer group revealed that 72 percent of the houses on sugar plantations had no indoor toilet facilities and many others had no running water.

Meat Cutters' Contract Settles Neuhoff Strike

Chicago—The Meat Cutters announced settlement of a 15-month strike against the Neuhoff Co. and the end of the long labor boycott against the company's Frosty Morn, Valleydale and Reelfront brand products.

Pres. Thomas J. Lloyd and Sec.-Treas. Patrick E. Gorman of the union said strikers at the Neuhoff plant in Clarksville, Tenn., ratified contract terms July 15 and offered themselves for work.

The agreement calls for 55 cents an hour in wage increases, and other standard contract features which management had previously opposed.

Under the terms agreed to by union and company negotiators, strikers at the firm's plants in Montgomery, Ala., and Quincy, Fla., also will return to work. Procedures for establishing union representation at these and other Neuhoff plants were agreed on.

Gorman and Lloyd said they believe the settlement will bring a "new era of cooperative relationship" between Neuhoff workers represented by the union and the management.

The strike at the Clarksville plant began Apr. 16, 1968, and the following September at the other two plants.

Last December, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany called on all affiliated national and international unions to put Neuhoff brands on their unfair list. Since then a national consumer boycott campaign has been supported vigorously in major cities.

Neuhoff employes said they struck for union recognition, an end to widespread unfair labor practices in the plants, and a contract correcting inequities like 50 to 100-hour workweeks at wages below those at competing plants in the same areas.

While picket lines were maintained at the three struck locations, the union pressed its organizing drive at other company plants in Bristol and Salem, Va., Union City, Tenn., Kinston, N. C., and Miami, Fla.

3 Central Bodies Merge in Detroit

Detroit—Three AFL-CIO central bodies in the Detroit area have merged into the Metropolitan Detroit AFL-CIO.

The merger consolidates the Wayne County AFL-CIO with its counterparts in Oakland and Macomb counties for a total membership of 130,000.

The Threat to Jobs

THE TIGHT MONEY, high interest rate policies of the Administration are beginning to take their toll in rising unemployment, with Negroes feeling the initial impact of the new restrictive policies.

The latest report of the Labor Dept. reveals that while the overall unemployment rate remained virtually unchanged at 3.4 percent of the labor force in June, there was a significant shift within the makeup of the unemployed over the past five months.

From February 1969 through June 1969 the unemployment rate for white workers remained unchanged. In the same period the jobless rate for non-white workers moved from 5.7 to 7 percent.

The impact was even more vivid at the teenage level. Over the same period white teenage unemployment dropped from 10.1 to 9.5 percent while non-white teenage joblessness rose from 22 to 28.6 percent.

The Administration's policies are expected to increase the rate of slowdown in the economy with continuing aggravation of the unemployment figures.

The net result is to have the poor, the unskilled, the disadvantaged paying the cost of "stopping inflation" with their misery and jobs while the profiteering that has touched off the inflationary spiral continues unchecked.

The Vacation Bit

THE SUMMER VACATION season is going full tilt throughout the country with beaches and parks and resorts of all kinds crowded by workers and their families taking full advantage of union-won leisure time.

The "now" generation may find it a bit difficult to understand the vacation bit and the excitement it stirs in most families. But one generation ago in the 1930s paid vacations for blue collar workers, or even most white collar workers, were unheard of or a rarity.

Today, vacations are commonplace, the direct result of collective bargaining and union growth. And the gains are spread throughout the economy aiding union and non-union workers alike as the non-union employer strives to keep pace with benefits won at the bargaining table.

The trend in the past few years has been to longer vacations, running to five and six weeks in some contracts, and to a general increase in leisure time through more paid holidays, shorter workweeks and other benefits.

In the terminology of the collective bargaining table these are lumped under "fringe benefits," a modern replacement for the older phrase "conditions of work." But they are not in the "fringe" category in importance to the worker and his family; they are basic to their enjoyment of leisure time, to the rest and relaxation that is necessary to every worker.

The union-won vacation is a concrete, visible result of effective collective bargaining and a strong trade union movement putting into practice democracy on the job.

It all adds up to a better life for more and more Americans and their families, who through the trade union movement are winning a fairer share of the wealth they help produce.

A Word Edgewise:

Diagnosis of Dr. Knowles Fight Reveals Dirksen's Power Play

By John P. Roche

THE AMERICAN MEDICAL Association is having its problems. On one side, a number of doctors have been accused of converting "socialized medicine" into a first-class capitalist racket, of taking Medicare and Medicaid for an incredible ride. On the other, the association is blamed for fingering Dr. John Knowles and blocking his appointment as Assistant Secretary of Health, Education & Welfare. According to the standard version, the AMA ordered Sen. Everett M. Dirksen to dispose of Knowles, and the senator, indebted to the doctors for substantial political support, put the arm on the President.

The AMA has denied this, and oddly enough its protests have a strong ring of credibility, particularly if one understands the relationship between powerful senators and lobbyists. The fact is that the AMA needs Dirksen far more than he needs the AMA. Generally speaking, there is no sight more pathetic than a mighty lobbyist cringing in the presence of a tough old Duke like Dirksen or Sen. Richard Russell.

Indeed, the whole Knowles caper has to be understood on a different level. It was convenient for Dirksen to have the AMA around to carry the can for his maneuver, but I doubt if he spent two minutes pondering their interests. After all, Pres. Nixon appointed a liberal Democrat, Dr. Roger Egeberg to fill the post.

In other words, what was distinctive was not that the AMA triumphed over HEW Sec. Robert H. Finch, but that—after an amazing amateur hour at the White House—Dirksen knocked out Pres. Nixon. That happened to be the point of the whole exercise.

Dirksen was not interested in the liberal bloodcount of the Assistant Secretary of HEW. He just wanted to establish the pecking order, to make it clear to the President that nobody, whatever his ideological credentials, was going to take high office in a GOP Administration without Dirksen's blessing.

Dr. Knowles, who must have learned a lot about politics at Massachusetts General Hospital, understood the symbolic nature of this conflict. He was just caught in the middle of a battle that had nothing whatsoever to do with him, and—as he shrewdly pointed out—it was Dr. Egeberg's luck that Knowles was up first. If Egeberg had been up first instead, Dirksen would have beaned him—and accepted Knowles. It should be added that neither man was on the AMA's list of recommendations.

IN SHORT, the name of the game was: Who is in charge here? And it is a game that goes on all the time wherever politicians gather. It can get very tricky on occasion. The late Sen. Robert Kennedy was believed on occasion to have strongly recommended men for federal office on the premise that this would lead Pres. Johnson automatically to blackball them.

The President, who knew his customers, of course realized this and the result was a parlor game in which Johnson tried to figure out whether Kennedy was trying to kill the appointment—or if Kennedy was up one level higher and wanted Johnson to think that he, Kennedy, was trying to kill the appointment. This sort of speculation could obviously go on for some time.

For the time being, Sen. Dirksen is happily in the driver's seat. While the press and commentators have been out working over the hapless AMA, the word has gone out in the bureaucracy: if it comes to a crunch, the President will fold. This, rather than contributions from the AMA, is what provides the substance of power in Washington.

Corporation Style At the White House

Both the Kennedy and Johnson Administrations were dominated by driving men profoundly suspicious of bureaucratic truth. Pres. Nixon, on the other hand, is fundamentally a corporation man.

Kennedy and Johnson were basically loners. (Kennedy's relationship to the Democratic Party in Massachusetts closely resembled Johnson's in Texas.)

Nixon is a political and administrative collectivist.

The net result of this, as I have discovered after several days of snooping around the capital is the introduction of the corporate way of life into the White House.

'Fact Finder for the Nation':

Broad Scope of Census Data Essential to Major Programs

The following is excerpted from "Fact Finding: The 1970 Census," by Alexander Uhl, which appears in the July 1969 issue of the AFL-CIO American Federationist.

THERE ARE SOME PEOPLE for whom statistics are a terrible bore. There are others who feed on them. The second group is going to have a field day when the results of the 1970 Census are published.

Based on the questionnaires that the Bureau of the Census is preparing to ask millions of Americans next year, the American people will have a picture of themselves and how they live.

For some the questions they may be required to answer are too much on the personal side. But for others the questions —personal or not— are designed to provide answers for 200 million Americans that can help them build an immeasurably richer and healthier country.

The decennial census started some 180 years ago when the very first Congress ordered a census to be held, an act that aroused the admiration of statisticians everywhere, notably the French statistician, Moreau de Jonnes. He called it a phenomenon without a parallel in history—"that of a people who instituted the statistics of their country on the very day when they founded their government."

The basic reason for the 1790 Census was to determine the number of representatives each state would have in Congress under the Constitution. But the first census went beyond that. It also called for information on sex, the color of free persons and the age of free males 16 years and upward.

Since then, the amount of information sought by the federal government has varied decade by decade.

By the time 1890 rolled around—a century later—the census questionnaire began to dig deeply into the social and economic status of Americans. It began to ask such questions as the number of families in a house, the number of persons in a house and, for a woman, the number of children borne and the number still living.

The census taker wanted to know the birthplace of those interviewed, the birthplace of their parents, profession, trade or occupation, the number of months of unemployment, school attendance, whether you could speak English and, if not, what language you spoke, whether you had an acute or chronic disease and what it was and how long you had it and how big a mortgage you had.

The appetite of the statisticians for information fell off somewhat after that and for the next four censuses the questioning was pretty well confined to the more stable questions on sex, age, kind of job and similar matters except that the census takers, keeping up with the times, wanted to know if you had a radio set (1930) and how old you were at your first marriage.

The 1940 Census was special and of great social value. It included a housing census—the first such to be made—and it asked some of the questions that are now annoying those Americans who are complaining that their privacy is being invaded. The 1940 Census asked what kind of a house you lived in, what it was built for originally, what kind of bathing and toilet facilities it had; how it was lighted and heated, how much balance was due on the mortgage, what the interest rate was and how your mortgage was being paid off.

The 1950 and 1960 census also contained housing questions including 5 percent and 20 percent samplings in addition to the overall questions asked of all persons interviewed. The questions, again keeping up with the times, asked about refrigerators, home freezers, television sets, air conditioning and similar modern developments.

One problem that the 1970 Census will be called upon to resolve is that of the great number —perhaps as many as 5 million—of residents of the United States who are never counted either because they avoid the census taker or have no fixed residence from which a record can be made either by personal interview or by mail.

New techniques have been developed in the effort to nail down census information of the "difficult-to-enumerate" areas of the nation. Test censuses made in Philadelphia in 1967 involved vigorous efforts to recruit census takers from the immediate area who were given extra training in ways to find residents who might escape normal census procedures.

The census will begin officially on April 1, 1970, although the nation's post offices will have in hand some 70 million questionnaires late in March.

Under the Bureau of the Census program, questionnaires will be sent to all households by mail. Residents of the larger cities will be asked to fill out the questionnaire and return it by mail. Census takers will visit only those families who do not respond or do not return forms properly filled out.

CENSUS TAKERS will visit residents outside of metropolitan areas for personal interviews, either to pick up the forms already filled out or to obtain answers to questions in some cases.

It is certain that Congress will not agree to limit the number of questions to half a dozen simple ones that have been proposed by critics.

One has only to read the daily newspapers, to listen to the debates in Congress and to study the nation's advertising pages, to become conscious of the immense importance of census information in our lives. The "war on poverty" for all its imperfections could never have gotten off the ground without our knowledge of the numbers of Americans below the poverty line and where they live.

"Fact Finder for the Nation," is the way the Bureau of the Census has been described. It would be disastrous to curtail the gathering of those facts of deep concern to all of America's more than 200 million.

Concern for '70 Elections:

Labor Cram Courses Stress Tax Reform and Political Action

UNION-SPONSORED summer schools this year are emphasizing the need for tax reform and the role of union members in helping to bring it about, Walter G. Davis, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education, reported in a network radio interview.

Questioned by reporters on Labor News Conference, Davis said the purpose of the courses, many of which will be held on college and university campuses, is to alert union members to issues and problems, and to give them the background needed to be "politically active" in that area.

Davis said that the labor movement is "very deeply concerned" about the 1970 elections, when the seats of 25 liberal U.S. senators will be at stake, and "possible opportunities the President will have to appoint conservatives to the Supreme Court." Loss of a number of liberal Senate seats or a "real change in the structure and composition of the Supreme Court" could have an "adverse effect on the trade union movement," he added.

Reversals of court decisions take a long time, he said, pointing to the 57 years it took the Supreme Court to reverse itself on the issue of school desegregation.

"This could also occur on economic issues and on trade union issues," he asserted, stressing the need for union members to be prepared to "respond politically."

Davis said that while many of the union-sponsored seminars and institutes will be held at colleges and universities where student protests have been most vigorous, he doubts that will have much effect on union members in attendance. He also said that the reported plan of the Students for a Democratic Society to conduct work-ins stands little chance of making an impact on union members.

By Press Associates, Inc.

ALMOST EVERY DAY the U.S. Senate is in session Sen. William Proxmire (D-Wis.) stands on the floor and makes a short statement in the hopes of galvanizing the Senate into ratifying the International Labor Organization Convention or treaty against forced labor.

Some are saying that Proxmire is engaged in an admirable but futile effort. Still, singular efforts have sparked fires in the past.

Through the years some 128 conventions have been adopted by the ILO, setting international labor standards. This nation, to the sorrow of the American labor movement, has ratified only a handful, largely relating to maritime labor.

Underlying the Senate's failure to act on ILO conventions is a fear that we would be opening the door to an international body superseding federal and state laws.

Despite overwhelming legal opinion against this, the Senate has been unmoved. And Proxmire has undertaken his one-man campaign because he feels that in the critical world picture the price is too great.

Proxmire's fight for the Abolition of Forced Labor Convention does dramatize this—how can we be a moral force for decent labor standards in the world when we refuse even to go on record against forced labor?

In one of his Senate speeches, Proxmire provided the history of the Forced Labor Convention, saying:

"In 1947 the American Federation of Labor first requested the United Nations to conduct an investigation of forced labor wherever it existed in the world. For two years the Soviet Union and its satellites strongly opposed the request for an investigation. But in 1949 the UN Economic & Social Council voted to request the ILO to investigate the practice of forced labor.

"The ILO responded to the request with vigor. In two reports subsequently issued by the ILO, the investigating committee found forced labor being practiced extensively in the Soviet Union, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Rumania and Communist China.

"These findings and the accompanying report led to the adoption in Geneva on June 25, 1957 of the convention on the Abolition of Forced Labor.

"Ten years after the American Federation of Labor began its crusade for the adoption of the convention, it was adopted. Twenty years after the AFL started the fight, 75 nations had ratified this convention. But the United States will still not be found on any list of ratifying nations."

EACH MEMBER of the ILO who ratifies the Forced Labor Convention "undertakes to suppress and not to make use of any form of forced or compulsory labor. . . ."

This includes, as Article I of the convention states, labor as a means of political coercion, for economic development, as a means of labor discipline, as a means of discrimination and "as a punishment for having participated in strikes."

As Proxmire notes, many opponents of the convention in this country are fearful of this latter provision. They see it in conflict with federal and state laws which deny the right of public employes to strike and, also, the 90-day injunction period of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Aside from spotlighting the "forced labor" nature of these laws, however, top experts do not see any legal conflict with ratification of the convention. These include former Sec. of Labor Willard Wirtz and former Labor Sec. and Supreme Court Justice Arthur Goldberg.

The most demoralizing aspect of the failure of the United States to ratify the forced labor and other ILO conventions is what it does to our image throughout the world.

Said Pres. John F. Kennedy: "The United States cannot afford to renounce responsibility for support of the very fundamentals which distinguish our concept of government from various forms of tyranny."

TAX REFORM is one of many issues and problems being stressed in union-sponsored summer schools around the country this year, Walter L. Davis, center, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education, told reporters on Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EDT, on Mutual radio. He was questioned by Neil Gilbride, left, of the Associated Press and Murray Seeger of the Los Angeles Times.

The Gap Between School and Training

Youths Unprepared for Jobs:

Vocational Education Gains Still Fall Short of Needs

Vocational education in the nation's school systems has grown greatly in the last five years. But not enough to meet current and future needs.

Millions of youths are still coming out of high school unprepared for the job market, writes Otto Pragan in the July issue of the American Federationist magazine. He is assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education.

"Relatively few persons learn the skills of an occupation in school; most learn them on the job," Pragan notes.

There are several million who lack the motivation to learn because they see no opportunities for success.

"These are the people that the education system has failed—the poor, the non-whites, the youth in the inner-city and in many rural areas, and others whose educational, economic, social and sametimes physical and mental handicaps have been neglected," Pragan observes.

Not until the Vocational Act of 1963 was the emphasis placed on people who needed skills relevant to the job market. Earlier, vocational education attempted merely to fill the needs of a few selected occupations as in agriculture, home economics, in some trades and in industries and sales.

Strengthened by '68 Act

The Vocational Education Amendments of 1968 strengthened the emphasis on providing imaginative programs for those who are hard to teach, Pragan reports.

It still has a long way to go to be totally effective. Estimates are that at least 25 million people could benefit from vocational education. Yet in the fall of 1967 only 8 million were enrolled in vocational schools.

"This means that vocational education misses 17 million people who could be trained, who are forced to rely on training on the job—if indeed they find a job at all," the author points out.

Even so, the 8 million vocational education enrollment is a vast improvement over the 4 million enrolled in 1963. It also reflects the higher expenditures over the past five years. Federal, state and local spending for vocational education rose from $330 million in fiscal year 1964 to more than $1 billion in fiscal 1968.

Congress has authorized $865 million for fiscal 1970—$583 more than was provided in all vocational education laws prior to the 1968 act, Pragan noted.

But the Nixon Administration's budget for 1970 requested only $288 million, just slightly more than was authorized by Congress for fiscal 1969.

Overall Concept Needed

What is needed is an overall concept of vocational education that guarantees an individual the opportunity to learn the skills of an occupation of his choice and makes it possible for him to advance according to his abilities, the article suggests.

Many of today's high school curricula are designed to meet the needs of college-bound students, Pragan observes, because some educators have a low regard for blue-collar jobs.

This has been a factor in the school dropout rate, since many youths see no relation between the classroom and the working world.

Citing figures of the U.S. Office of Education, Pragan notes that for every 10 pupils who entered the fifth grade in 1959 only two are likely to be graduated from college.

Of these 10 pupils, 8.5 entered the 11th grade in 1965 and 7.2 were graduated from high school in 1967. Of the four who entered college, two will drop out before graduation.

"Thus, 3.2 high school graduates went directly to work or were unemployed," he points out, and only 1.2 of these youths entered an occupation for which they were trained in vocational education courses.

The Vocational Education Amendments of 1968 take in many recommendations of the National Advisory Council on Vocational Education, on which Pragan served. The amendments come close to establishing an adequate system of vocational education, he observes.

However, labor's voice and experience is most needed on the level where the 1968 act will be actually implemented—in the state advisory councils and in the communities, Pragan stresses, adding:

"The state and local federations have the responsibility of providing knowledgable labor representatives to serve on advisory committees."

Cornell Given Historical Files Of Rail Unions

Ithaca, N.Y.—The largest known collection of materials on railroad labor history in the United States will soon be housed here at Cornell University, the gift of the United Transportation Union.

The materials donated to the university's School of Industrial & Labor Relations include convention proceedings for the four unions which merged to form UTU this year, officers' reports, financial record and copies of contracts.

Also included are old photographs, union publications, badges, posters and pins. Cornell will supplement the materials with taped recordings of interviews with UTU leaders on railroading history and events that led to the merger.

UTU Pres. Charles Luna said "the union is pleased to cooperate with Cornell in this rail labor history program." He emphasized that it will make "valuable records" available to "future generations of scholars, researchers and unionists."

Gould Colman, director of Cornell's program in oral history, is the university's representative on the project. Daniel W. Collins, UTU's assistant secretary-treasurer, represents the union.

Texas AFL-CIO Attacks Car Insurance Practices

Austin, Tex.—The Texas AFL-CIO has opened a drive against the rising cost of auto insurance in the state by attacking the accounting methods used by the insurance companies and so far accepted by the State Insurance Board.

The auto insurance industry in Texas has asked for an 11 percent increase in rates while the Texas AFL-CIO has called for a 10 percent reduction based on factual accounting.

The "so-called 'statutory' method of accounting used by the insurance companies gives a false appearance of their financial situation," State AFL-CIO Pres. H. S. Hank Brown charged at a board hearing.

If the board will look through "this accounting smoke screen," he added, it will find that the industry is in excellent financial health, that its bid for a rate increase is not justified and that car insurance costs can, in fact, be lowered.

Brown described the statutory accounting method as one in which a company reports as "income" only that portion of the premium actually earned by the passage of time while ignoring income that has actually been received.

At the same time, he said, the method permits a firm to report as "losses and expenses" the entire anticipated amount (from a premium) "even though any loss will not occur, if at all, until some time in the future."

"This method is completely contrary to the normally acceptable accounting methods used by business," Brown declared.

He urged the board to examine the "real financial situation" of the industry and particularly to include investment income in calculating insurance company profits and losses before setting rates.

In 1967, Brown noted, the auto insurance industry reported a $273 million national loss as far as premiums and claims were concerned "but actually realized a $1.7 billion investment profit."

"It is ridiculous to claim a loss, and a rate increase, when the industry profited by almost $2 billion," he pointed out.

Brown cited the example of a Texas company, Gulf Insurance Co., which reported a loss of more than $4.8 million in 1968 but then paid out over $4.5 million in dividends the same year.

"The company has increased its dividend by 500 percent since 1963 while showing a loss," he stated.

If the board grants a rate increase in view of the industry's genuine profit picture, Brown said, "it will not be fulfilling its duty to the people."

"Instead," he concluded, "it will be continuing to give the insurance industry the preferential and discriminatory position that it has enjoyed in Texas for years."

Lovell Appointed Manpower Chief

Malcolm R. Lovell, Jr., an official of the Urban Coalition and former Michigan Employment Security Commission director, has been named to head the Labor Dept.'s Manpower Administration.

Lovell, 48, replaces J. Nicholas Peet who resigned recently to return to Oregon as director of the state's Social Services Dept.

42 Unionists Go to Prison for Study Of Crime, Delinquency and Justice

The heavy steel doors of the federal penitentiary at Terre Haute, Ind., clanged shut on 42 labor union members on a recent Saturday. From teachers to printers, the men and women unionists held one-day passes to a unique event.

Crime, delinquency, the total criminal justice system and police-community relations, were the topics to be tackled by the delegates to the nation's first day-long conference on the subject held, appropriately, inside the prison walls.

Sponsored by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services in cooperation with the National Council on Crime and Delinquency, the session addressed itself to labor's potential role, in concert with community agencies, in getting people involved not as vigilantes but as social activists.

"Those who think you can have law and order without equality and justice just aren't thinking straight," CSA Director Leo Perlis told a luncheon gathering in the officers' mess, while beyond the barred windows prisoners visited with their friends and families.

Students of the pilot program car-pooled between prison buildings to a varied schedule: a slide-talk by NCCD officials illustrating the dimensions of the crime problem, a questionnaire on their opinions and attitudes related to crime, and testimony on "the system" as seen through the eyes of authorities whose credentials ranged from a college degree to a prison term, a correction career to a black skin.

After an "overview" of the criminal justice set-up and the objectives of the labor institute, other views of the system were presented.

A view from inside the prison's walls: An inmate, a former union member, spoke without constraint of his crime, his rehabilitation and the injustice of an arbitrary system in which he must still serve the remainder of his minimum term before becoming eligible even for consideration by the parole board, despite agreement of prison officials that he is deserving of immediate parole.

From the minority community: Wilma Graves, a licensed practical nurse and NAACP representative on the Terra Haute Human Relations Committee, gave vivid examples of how "justice" works differently in the black community.

The one-day institute, ending with workshops to assess information and plan for the future, was designed, Perlis said, "to find ways and means of developing effective police, labor and community relations so that a united community may go forward to serve the interests of all citizens in justice under the law."

"In addition, we hope to discover more effective ways of assisting the ex-offender in the rehabilitation process through employment, health services and readjustment to normal living."

The pilot conference received strong support from the Vigo County Central Labor Council headed by Pres. John Etling and, at the local level, from Pete Culver, labor staff representative with the United Fund of Wabash Valley.

Ed Carlin, a former police officer with a special interest in the project, represented the AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services in coordinating arrangements with the NCCD and was chairman of a workshop.

tal changes in the financing, organization and delivery of health services essential to achieve the goal of quality health care for all Americans."

The report said the government will do what it can to eliminate waste, fraud and overcharging in the Medicaid and Medicare programs, to improve hospital facilities and to develop training programs keyed to health service careers for medical corpsmen returning from Viet Nam.

But the bulk of the improvement, the report asserted, would have to come from the private sector of the economy.

It asked doctors and dentists to do a better job of self-policing their professions against abuses. It said hospitals should work with other hospitals in the community to avoid unnecessary duplication of expensive facilities, and to hold down length of hospital stays to the minimum necessary.

The health insurance industry, the report suggested, should broaden its coverage "to encourage preventive services to provide incentives to keep people out of hospitals."

Medical schools should "find new ways to expand the number of persons they are training" and to place greated emphasis on meeting "immediate needs . . . such as comprehensive medical care for the poor and near poor."

From industry and business, the report asked "programs to provide health education and preventive health care for employes at every level and their families."

And it asked "citizens' groups and consumer organizations to continue their efforts to hold the medical care industry and government responsible for good management and for constructive policies in delivery and pricing of services."

The HEW officials said that "over the coming months we will call together each of these groups to hear what they propose and to learn what they will expect of us in return."

The report was sharply critical of administration of the Medicaid program of federal matching grants to states that pay health care bills for low-income persons and families.

It said the billions of dollars spent on Medicaid have been poorly supervised and the program "has attempted to provide medical services for the poor by pushing them into the nation's already overburdened health care system."

Despite these problems, the report stressed, "we nevertheless cannot abandon our national goal of effective and dignified health care for every American no matter what his station in life or where he lives. We cannot accept anything less in this, the most affluent society in the world."

C. T. Muntain Named to HUD Labor Post

Charles T. Muntain, a former president of the Baltimore Building & Construction Trades Council, has been appointed special assistant for labor relations to Housing & Urban Development Sec. George Romney.

Muntain has been with the federal government since 1965, serving in key posts in the Post Office Dept., the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission and HUD.

A structural iron worker by trade, Muntain is a former business manager and president of Baltimore Iron Workers Local 16, secretary of the Baltimore AFL-CIO and chairman of the Middle Atlantic States Building & Construction Trades Council, among other posts.

Muntain, who also is a lawyer, teaches labor law and legislation at the University of Maryland and American University in Washington, D.C.

Romney said Muntain will serve as an adviser and help formulate HUD policy in management-labor relations and act as liaison between HUD and the labor movement.

House Unit Approves Voting Law Extention

voting and it would introduce new areas of controversial legislation which might result in failure by Congress to take any action at all.

After the present law is extended, the civil rights groups said, desirable portions of the Administration plan could be considered separately.

The bill must await Rules Committee clearance before reaching the floor so House action is unlikely until after the mid-August recess.

Both the House and Senate put a stamp of approval on the four-year-old Appalachian regional development program and a small-scale companion program involving other multi-state regional development commissions.

The Senate bill authorized higher spending ceilings than the House measure and a conference committee was named to try to agree on the final terms.

For non-highway Appalachia programs, the Senate authorized $294 million for the 1970 and 1971 fiscal years, as compared with $250 million in the House bill. For other regional commissions, the Senate two-year authorization was $285 million to the $225 million approved by the House.

Roads Program Extended

The Senate voted to extend the key Appalachian roadbuilding program an additional two years past its mid-1971 expiration date and to increase the spending ceiling to finance the extension. The House, however, merely voted a one-year extension and took the position that there is enough money already authorized to finance the extra year.

Whatever the outcome in conference, the actual amount available for the highway program would have to be appropriated by Congress in separate legislation.

The Senate bill passed easily by voice vote. The House approved the legislation, 273-103, after Democrats and Republicans from the states that had been helped spoke in glowing terms of the progress made under the regional program.

A Senate Antitrust subcommittee revived a bill that had been opposed by newspaper unions and the Administration, but supported by influential newspaper publishers.

The legislation would give immunity from antitrust prosecution to jointly published newspapers that pool profits, fix advertising rates and otherwise combine to freeze out competition.

The subcommittee, which earlier had voted to set the bill aside, took up the legislation and passed it over the objection of Subcommittee Chairman Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.).

Party Runoff For Governor Set in Virginia

Richmond, Va.—Virginia Democrats will hold a runoff primary election for governor for the first time in history after dealing a sharp setback to party conservatives.

Labor-backed State Sen. Henry H. Howell, Jr. of Norfolk, a liberal, will face William C. Battle, former ambassador to Australia and a moderate, in an Aug. 19 runoff for the gubernatorial nomination.

Howell polled 38 percent of the vote in the July 15 primary to Battle's 39 percent. Conservative Lt. Gov. Fred G. Pollard trailed a poor third with 23 percent.

There was no GOP primary for major offices. The winner of the Democratic gubernatorial nomination will face Republican candidate Linwood Holton of Roanoke and Conservative party candidate Beverly McDowell of Richmond in November.

In the Democratic primary for lieutenant governor, State Sen. J. Sargeant Reynolds, 33-year-old heir to the Reynolds Metals fortune, amassed 64 percent of the vote in sinking the organization candidate, State Sen. W. Carrington Thompson, and three other rivals. Reynolds ran as a liberal.

For attorney general there will be a runoff between liberal Andrew P. Miller, a labor-backed Abingdon attorney, and conservative Delegate Guy O. Farley, Jr., of Fairfax. Miller got 41 percent to Farley's 36 percent in a four-way race.

Retired People Prodded To Flex Political Muscle

Los Angeles—Political activity by retired persons is essential to winning major improvements in social security benefits, AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bertrand Seidman emphasized.

If the elderly will work to get out the vote and elect friends to Congress "they will have a strong ally in the labor movement," Seidman told a conference of retired union members here.

The conference on the problems and potential of retirees was sponsored by the Los Angeles AFL-CIO's senior citizen committee. More than 150 participants heard major addresses and engaged in workshops aimed at organizing retirees.

Winston Churchill once said "you can measure the civilization of a people by the way they treat their older folks," Seidman recalled. "By this standard," he added, "our nation flunks the test."

"This judgment may seem a little harsh," he continued, "but not overly so if we see the statistics not as impersonal digits but remember they represent human beings—in this case, victims of low income, poor health care, bad housing, inadequate recreation and inferior food and clothing."

For millions of the elderly, the situation is one of "misery and loneliness—living out their lives in quiet desperation in a nation where youth is worshipped," Seidman said.

The biggest problem for the elderly is income and the largest income program for the elderly is social security, he noted. "Unfortunately," he said, "the importance of its benefit is in stark contrast to its adequacy."

He outlined the chief points of the AFL-CIO's recommended changes in Social Security including an increase of payments by 50 percent in the next few years, and a minimum benefit of $100 a month for a single person and $150 for a couple.

The federation's program, he added, which would include expansion of Medicare for prescription drugs and eye-glasses, "would virtually wipe out poverty among social security beneficiaries."

While labor is doing its best to get the program through Congress, Seidman said, "these efforts will never be fully successful unless we are backed up by a growing and politically active senior citizens movement."

He expressed hope that there would be further expansion of political activity by the aged and cited the National Council of Senior Citizens as an example of the "expanding influence" of those over 65.

Nelson H. Cruikshank, NCSC president, described his organization's drive for improved social security benefits and the role it played in helping achieve Medicare.

Also on the list of the council's achievements, he said, are programs established for insurance, prescription drugs, legal aid and a number of government services for the aged.

Cruikshank stressed that the council has supported programs that go beyond the elderly to benefit persons of all ages, such as minimum wage legislation, job training and consumer protection.

"We are not a separatist group but a part of the mainstream of life sharing the same goals with many segments of society," he declared.

Other speakers included Dr. James Birren, director of the Center of Gerontology, University of Southern California; and Rep. James C. Corman (D-Calif.).

James Carbray, chairman of the Los Angeles federation's senior citizens committee, was chairman of the conference.

Adequate Funds Urged In Program for Elderly

The AFL-CIO urged the Senate to remove a major roadblock from the nation's efforts for the aging by providing adequate funds for the Older Americans program.

The amount authorized by a Senate bill to extend and expand the Older Americans Act "represents major progress toward an adequately funded program," said AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller in a letter to Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on the Aging.

Biemiller cited AFL-CIO objections to another Senate bill that would establish a new "senior companions" program. He recalled that differences over similar provisions last year prevented passage of amendments to the act.

"Because the proposal does not talk about employment," he said, "it is easy to get the impression that it is a volunteer program."

But all such projects, whether called "service opportunities," "retirement roles," or "senior companions," pay wages, usually for part-time work, Biemiller said.

"The primary purpose of a service program should be therapeutic, to enhance the well-being of the elderly by having them do useful and satisfying work and by giving service to the community."

Biemiller said that the AFL-CIO supports bona fide service programs for senior citizens conducted by the Administration on Aging. It also strongly believes, he added, that any programs intended primarily for employment should be administered by the Labor Dept. along with training and manpower programs.

He said a "major impediment to the employment of older workers is the lack of coordination and the overly proliferated efforts that now exists."

Because the Labor Dept. is already efficiently operating similar programs, Biemiller said, "it would be unwise to establish duplicating programs elsewhere."

He urged Kennedy to continue his efforts to improve the Older Americans program and said the bill to extend and expand it would be a major step "toward the goal of providing dignity and comfort to all our aged population."

'No Surtax Without Reform':

Meany Asks Senate To Delay Tax Vote

mittee to act on a major overhaul of the tax laws.

Mansfield retorted on the Senate floor that the Finance Committee can report out a surtax bill whenever it wants. But "no one should be under any delusion" that the leadership will be in any hurry to schedule it for floor action. The current ABM debate, Mansfield noted, has "a long, long way to go."

He chided Senate Republican Leader Everett M. Dirksen for having described tax reform as "perhaps desirable" but really "not so urgent."

Tax reform is not just desirable, Mansfield insisted, it is "imperative."

Dirksen mourned, "I know the sound of the death knell when I hear it."

Actually, Dirksen and Long split on the Finance Committee vote. The committee's seven Republicans, aided by the votes of Democrats Clinton P. Anderson (N.M.) and Abraham A. Ribicoff (Conn.), insisted on approving the House surtax bill without considering amendments Long intended to offer.

Nevertheless, Long said, "my vote against reporting the bill does not mean that I'm opposed."

While the Senate political infighting continued, the House Ways & Means Committee reported steady progress in its almost daily closed door meetings to draw up a tax reform bill.

The committee is scheduled to send a reform bill to the House floor for a vote before the mid-August recess. The Senate leadership's plan has been to continue the temporary extension of the surtax withholding rate until the Senate has before it comprehensive tax reform legislation as well as the surtax bill.

Progress reports from the Ways & Means Committee indicated that its reform bill will partially close most of the major loopholes, although probably not as completely as most tax reform supporters would like.

The committee has announced a few tentative decisions, still subject to revision.

It gave preliminary approval to a cutback in the big capital gains tax exemption. It voted some restrictions on charitable deduction gimmicks. And it proposed a token tax on the portion of interest from tax-exempt municipal and state bonds that exceed an individual's taxable income.

To allay the fears of mayors and governors that this would force cities to offer higher interest on their bonds, the committee proposed a federal subsidy of part of the interest cost on taxable bonds issued by government units.

The committee pledged quick action on tax reform to avert defeat of the surtax bill when it was up for a House vote. Opponents had argued that once the pressure of the surtax extension was lifted, tax reform would be put on the back burner. As it was, the surtax extension bill squeaked through by a mere five votes.

NO SURTAX until there is tax reform, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller and Research Dir. Nathaniel Goldfinger, right, urged at Senate Finance Committee hearings.

Hall Opposes Weakening of Cargo Policy

Seafarers Pres. Paul Hall has urged the Senate Banking Committee to strengthen, not weaken, present policy guaranteeing that American-flag vessels will carry half the U.S. grain sold to the Soviet Union and its satellites.

A subcommittee wrote into a bill extending export control legislation a provision that would end the President's authority to require the use of American ships to transport part of the cargo sold to the Soviet bloc.

The full committee reopened hearings on the bill to permit testimony opposing this provision.

Hall, who is also president of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept., urged the committee to write into law language that would "clearly set forth that at least 50 percent of all this cargo—and more, if possible—should move aboard American-built, American-owned and American-manned merchant vessels."

He charged that the subcommittee provision would be "the opening wedge" to abandonment of all cargo preference programs and the virtual elimination of the U.S. merchant marine.

It would also, he noted, worsen the U.S. balance of payments and "give new impetus to the Soviet drive for world maritime supremacy."

But if the law were strengthened by guaranteeing a share of shipments for American vessels, Hall said, "this would mean more jobs for American seamen, more jobs for American shipyard workers, more jobs in scores of related trades and services."

5 Drug Firms to Pay $100 Million Refund

Consumers who bought certain antibiotics between 1954 and 1966 will be able to share in a $100 million refund if they search their memories and take action.

The money represents a settlement reached in a damage suit against five drug manufacturers. The suit involved charges that the manufacturers illegally agreed to fix prices and overcharge buyers over the 12-year period.

Many states, cities and other groups joined in the legal action. Consumers in 43 states could benefit from refunds for overcharges. Also, drug wholesalers and retail pharmacists are eligible.

The five companies, which have denied any liability while making the settlement, are American Cyanamid Co., Chas. Pfizer & Co., Bristol-Myers Co., Upjohn Co., and Squibb Beech-Nut, Inc.

The drugs involved include Aureomycin, Terramycin and Tetracycline, sold under the brand names: Achromycin, Mysteclin, Panalba, Panmycin, Polycycline, Steclin, Tetracyn and Tetrex.

The drugs are used in treating respiratory infections such as tonsillitis, sinusitis and bronchitis; certain urinary tract and skin infections; and viral infections, the most important of which is pneumonia.

Instructions on how to file claims and where to send them have appeared in many local newspapers as part of a nationwide advertising campaign announcing the settlement.

To collect a refund, a consumer must check his records and memory to determine approximately how much he paid for the drugs during the years involved.

The next step is to total the amounts for each year and write out a statement explaining the figures.

The statement must be taken to a notary public and signed in his presence. This will certify that the claim is true to the best of the claimant's knowledge. A druggist may also certify that the drugs were purchased in the amount stated.

The notarized statement, including totals for each year separately, must be sent to Post Office Box 752, The Bronx, New York 10451. Claimants are not to send along records of purchases unless asked to do so. The deadline for filing claims is Aug. 16.

In another development, the Justice Dept. announced that it has filed an additional suit against Pfizer and American Cyanamid seeking $25 million in damages and cancellation of the patent for Tetracycline.

In this latest suit, filed in U.S. District Court in Washington, D.C., the government charged the two companies with failing to disclose that Tetracycline had been produced during the manufacture of Aureomycin, an identical antibiotic, and therefore was not eligible for a patent.

Pfizer was accused of making false and misleading statements to the U.S. Patent Office, while Cyanamid was charged with aiding Pfizer in getting the patent by sending the office similar misleading statements.

The government, a big purchaser of antibiotics, estimated its damages at $25 million because of having to pay higher prices on Tetracycline based on the fact that it was supposed to be non-competitive.

HEW Urged to Correct Rules on Nursing Homes

Federal regulations recently announced by the Health, Education & Welfare Dept. to improve nursing home standards under Medicaid "completely fail to meet that objective," the AFL-CIO emphasized.

Without changes, it warned, the regulations will "perpetuate inadequate health care for the most disadvantaged Americans, the needy and medically needy."

Criticism of the regulations and proposed changes was expressed by AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bertrand Seidman in a letter to Administrator Mary Switzer of HEW's Social & Rehabilitation Service.

Amendments to the Social Security Act adopted in 1967 called for regulations to upgrade nursing home standards under Medicaid. Draft regulations were released in February and specific proposals were recently published in the Federal Register.

The basic defect in the regulations, Seidman wrote, "is that they establish significantly lower standards for skilled nursing homes" under the Medicaid program for the poor than are required under the law for Medicare.

"Yet," he continued, "there is no evidence that Medicaid patients in skilled nursing homes require less intensive care than Medicare patients in extended care facilities."

The "grossly inadequate" standards would add to already high Medicaid costs, Seidman charged, by requiring reimbursements to substandard nursing homes and "unnecessary" hospitalizations of patients unable to get skilled nursing care.

Moreover, he said, failure to require appropriate standards will remove any incentive for substandard nursing homes to raise skill levels as was intended by the 1967 amendments.

To raise nursing home qualifications to the necessary level, Seidman and the AFL-CIO urged the following changes in the proposed regulations:

- An immediate requirement that either a professional registered nurse or a licensed practical nurse be on duty at nursing homes at all times. The regulations would postpone this requirement until at least July 1, 1970.
- If there is to be a provision permitting waiver of educational requirements for licensed practical nurses, the regulations should authorize "only the state agency responsible for licensing of nurses" and not simply any "appropriate state licensing authority" to grant the waiver.
- Similarly, the authority to waive other requirements for nursing homes should be given only to the State agency responsible for licensing nursing homes.
- Provision should be made for minimum ratios of nursing and auxiliary personnel to the number of patients, with separate ratios for nurses and other personnel—a requirement clearly intended by the 1967 amendments.

Syracuse, N.Y.—Maintenance and custodial workers at Syracuse University voted for representation by Service Employes Local 200 in an election the university unsuccessfully tried to block through an injunction.

More Women Join Apprentice Ranks

Nearly 1,100 women are learning highly skilled trades in programs registered with the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training, Sec. of Labor George P. Shultz reports.

Although this number is low in proportion to men in the apprenticeship ranks, it is 500 more women than were enrolled in June 1968.

Almost one-third of the women apprentices are in cosmetology. But many others are in fields that once were predominantly held by men. They include printing trades, bookbinding, upholstering, automotive trades, drafting, mechanics, embalming and others.

Administration Favors Limited Fish Inspection

The Nixon Administration was accused of bowing to "pressures from the fish processing industry" by opposing a strong fish inspection bill.

At issue is whether a fish inspection law should require the same type of continuous, full-time inspection that the government requires for meat and poultry.

Administration officials told a Senate consumer affairs subcommittee that normally spot inspections would be sufficient.

This was termed "a shameful retreat in consumer protection" by the Meat Cutters, the union that has spearheaded the drive for a strong inspection law.

"Full-time inspection, under which a government inspector checks product wholesomeness and plant cleanliness during all times of processing, is a critically essential protection for consumer health," the union said.

Pres. Thomas J. Lloyd and Sec.-Treas. Patrick E. Gorman charged that "the Administration's joining with the fish processing industry will make the fight for effective and meaningful fish inspection more difficult."

Testifying for what they termed "continuous surveillance" rather than continuous inspection were officials of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare, the Interior Dept., and Mrs. Virginia Knauer, the President's special assistant for consumer affairs.

Sen. Frank E. Moss (D-Utah), who presided at the Senate hearings, termed the Administration proposal "much weaker" than the fish inspection legislation proposed by the Johnson Administration.

Earlier, the AFL-CIO had urged the subcommittee to require continuous inspection of fish processing "to fill a serious—indeed a dangerous—gap in consumer protection."

Emergency Action Urged To Meet Housing Crisis

Living Cost Rise in June Saps Wages

The cost of living shot up sharply in June and workers' pay checks continued to buy less than they did last year, the Labor Dept. reported.

A six-tenths of 1 percent jump in living costs sent the Consumer Price Index to 127.6. That means it cost $12.76 to buy goods and services that cost $10 in the 1957-59 base period.

Arnold Chase, assistant commissioner of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, said that the index increased 3.2 percent in the first half of 1969, compared with a 2.3 percent rise in the first six months of 1968. The index is up 5.5 percent from last June.

Gross average weekly earnings of production and non-supervisory workers rose by $1.58 in June to a new high of $115.06, attributable primarily to a four-tenths of an hour increase in the workweek and a 1-cent gain in hourly earnings.

For the worker with three dependents, weekly take-home pay rose by $1.21 to $100.34. For the worker with no dependents the increase was $1.13 to $91.29. Both figures were new highs.

When expressed in 1957-59 dollars, to take account of price changes, the take-home pay of the worker with three dependents in June was $78.64 and $71.54 with no dependents. Both of these figures averaged about 46 cents higher than in May.

However, these real spendable earnings were down over the year by 39 cents for the worker with three dependents and 16 cents for the worker with one dependent. The figure for three dependents was down 1.2 percent from its September high.

The sharp rise in the cost of living in June stemmed largely from big increases in prices for meat, poultry and fish, BLS said. The increase for meats was the largest since June 1965.

Charges for all types of consumer services were higher in June and accounted for about one-fourth of the index rise. Costs of mortgage interest and home maintenance and repair services continued to climb.

Higher physicians' fees contributed mainly to a five-tenths of 1 percent increase in medical care costs, and boosts in public transportation fares pushed the cost of transportation services up.

Prices of commodities other than food rose by four-tenths of 1 percent during the month. Consumers paid more for clothing, gasoline, cigarettes and used cars.

In looking over the index, BLS reported commodities were up 4.7 percent over the year and services were up 7 percent.

Food prices were up 3.2 percent seasonally adjusted over the first

Hospital Pact In Charleston Ends Strike

Charleston, S.C.—Hospital workers here won a second agreement with a local medical institution winding up nearly four months of strife and turmoil that found the labor and civil rights movement united in common cause.

The 113-day strike at Charleston County Hospital ended with an agreement that would send nearly all strikers back to work at a higher wage level immediately and a commitment to employ the rest within a three-month period. The union, Local 1199B of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, also won a grievance procedure and other basic union contract provisions.

Miss Rosetta Simmons, chairman of the negotiating committee of the local, said "we gained recognition as human beings in this community. It has accomplish a lot for the poor people of the city."

The County Hospital settlement followed by three weeks the agree-

$100 Million Expansion:

School Lunch Bill Passed By House

Legislation to expand the nation's school lunch program this year to reach the neediest among 3.5 million needy children still outside its scope has passed the House of Representatives.

The measure, approved by 352-5, authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to distribute $100 million in fiscal 1970 to the states to provide free or reduced price meals in schools and day-care facilities.

In a letter sent to each member of the House prior to the vote, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller expressed labor's strong support of "this important and needed legislation."

Passage of the bill by Congress, Biemiller said, would "improve significantly our national effort to meet the nutritional needs of American children."

The measure passed by the House now goes to the Senate. A similar authorization was passed by the House last year but failed to receive Senate approval. However, the near-unanimous vote in the House this year improves the prospects for Senate action.

The $100 million authorization would be in addition to an appropriation for school lunches in fiscal 1970 which is now the subject of a Senate-House conference.

However, Chairman Carl D. Perkins of the House Education & Labor Committee, the bill's main sponsor, stressed that the additional $100 million would help feed children not covered under the current program.

Under the bill, which amends the National School Lunch Act, portions of the $100 million would be allotted to states in such a way as specifically to help needy children from families of less than $3,000 annual income who do not have a sufficient diet.

The legislation also provides for payments directly to schools to permit them to acquire the food and service equipment needed to provide adequate and nutritious meals.

The debate, led by Perkins, emphasized not only the need for the bill but the fact that it is a start toward feeding "only the neediest of the nation's hungry children."

Of the 51.2 million children enrolled in the nation's elementary schools, 32.5 million do not have school lunch programs at the present time, it was pointed out.

"Three and a quarter million children not now participating in the programs need a free lunch," Perkins said, "and approximately 19.5 million of those not now par-

Labor Cites Interest Rate, Land Costs

The AFL-CIO called for a top-priority, emergency program to meet the nation's "unpostponable housing needs."

Wage-earners have been priced out of the homebuying market by the soaring cost of money and land, the federation testified at Senate hearings.

John Evans, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Urban Affairs, said the interest rate on mortgage money "has moved from being a serious problem to that of a national disaster."

He told a Senate Banking subcommittee:

"We have watched interest rates skyrocket . . . and we have watched much-needed housing slip further and further from the grasp of those who need it most.

"We have watched government programs of assistance, so hopefully conceived, become badly eroded. We have watched wage-earners abandon their aspiration to escape substandard dwellings and, concurrently, we have seen a halt in the traditional upward mobility from renter to small home owner to bigger home owner.

"A terrible stagnation is settling over America, blighting the housing hopes of all but a fortunate few."

Evans urged the Senate panel to write into its extension of the federal housing legislation two provisions to ease the mortgage money squeeze.

One would authorize $5 billion of GI insurance funds to be used for veterans' mortgages at a 6 percent interest rate. This, he noted, would both help meet housing needs of returning veterans and bring a greater return to the insurance fund than it presently receives.

Higher Rate of Negro Unemployment Accented in Poverty Neighborhoods

For the second time this month, the Labor Dept. has released figures showing that the job picture for Negroes is worsening and the unemployment gap between whites and blacks is widening.

First evidence of this came when the Bureau of Labor Statistics announced that the national jobless rate for whites was unchanged in June at 3 percent, but the rate for non-whites rose five-tenths of 1 percent to 7 percent.

The regular monthly report also revealed that the non-white rate increased by 1.3 percent between February and June, while the white rate remained virtually unchanged.

Now the development is further sharpened by the latest BLS survey of the job situation in the poverty neighborhoods of the nation's 100 largest cities.

Poverty neighborhoods are defined by the government as the poorest one-fifth of the neighborhoods in each urban area.

The overall jobless rate in these neighborhoods was 5.7 percent in the second quarter of 1969—unchanged from the same quarter last year. But a breakdown of the rate showed that significant changes had taken place.

The unemployment rate for blacks in the poverty neighborhoods increased from 7.3 to 8 percent over the year while the rate for whites dropped from 4.6 to 4 percent during the same period. The increase in the rate for blacks re-

$3.5 Billion Slash Ordered by Nixon

High interest rates and rising medical bills are hurting the government's budget too, Pres. Nixon disclosed.

He ordered federal agencies to slash spending by $3.5 billion this fiscal year to compensate for unpredicted expenses.

Two of the biggest single items of "uncontrollable" added expense were the higher interest rates that the government has to pay on the national debt and the rise in Medicare costs.

The Treasury recently had to pay an interest rate of close to 7.5 percent — the highest in its history—to borrow money on a six-month bill.

Wages Sapped By Sharp Rise In Living Costs

six months of this year. That compared with 1.8 percent increases in food prices in both the first and second halves of 1968.

The cost of housing rose 3.3 percent in the first six months of 1969 compared with a 2.2 percent increase in the first half of last year and a 3 percent increase in the last half of 1968.

Chase translated the price trend into some readily understandable market-basket prices:

20 Cents a Pound More

Round steak in June cost $1.33 a pound, 20 cents higher than a year ago; celery at over 20 cents a pound was up more than 3 cents; tomatoes cost 48 cents a pound, up more than 10 cents; a six-ounce can of orange juice, at 24 cents plus, was up 3 cents.

Chase shrugged off questions about the effectiveness of Pres. Nixon's anti-inflation program, but he saw "some hope in the slowing down in the rise in apparel prices and possibly medical care services."

Approximately 77,000 workers will receive cost-of-living pay boosts based on the June CPI. For 40,000 employes, mostly in aerospace, the increase will be 8 cents an hour; 22,000 workers, mainly in public transit, will receive 4 to 6-cent an hour hikes; and 6,000 California metal workers will get a 7-cent an hour increase. About 6,300 workers in varied industries will receive raises ranging from 1 to 5 cents per hour.

Jobless Rate Accented in Black Ghettos

versed over-the-year declines reported for the past five quarters.

The rise in the jobless rates for blacks in the poverty areas between the second quarters of 1968 and 1969, "primarily reflected an increase in joblessness among teenagers," BLS said.

More than one in three black teenagers in poverty neighborhoods was unemployed in the second quarter of 1969, while only one in seven white teenagers in these neighborhoods was jobless.

This factor also appears to mesh with one contained in the BLS monthly report. It brought out that the national unemployment rate for white teenagers decreased from 10.1 to 9.5 percent between February and June, while the non-white rate rose from 22 to 28.6 percent.

These were other highlights in the poverty neighborhoods report:

- The overall unemployment rate for adult men was 3.4 percent in the second quarter of 1969, down six-tenths of 1 percent over the year. The rate for non-whites rose from 4.1 to 4.3 percent; the whites' rate dropped from 4 to 3.2 percent.
- The rate for adult females rose between the two quarters from 4.9 to 5.7 percent. The rate for non-whites climbed from 6.9 to 7.5 percent; the whites' rate went from 3.3 to 4.1 percent.
- Unemployment in the poverty neighborhoods totaled 363,000 in the 1969 quarter, down about 10,000 over the year. The neighborhoods' unemployment level in 1969 represented 13.2 percent of the total unemployment in the nation. In 1968, the level accounted for 13.3 percent of the total unemployed.

RETIREMENT GIFT to William F. Schnitzler is the car to go with the keys presented by Lane Kirkland, his successor as AFL-CIO secretary-treasurer. More than 1,200 persons attended the dinner in Washington to honor Schnitzler.

Pilots Offer Solutions To Safety Hazards

Atlanta—The aviation industry "is very late" in facing up to mounting safety problems and it cannot expect continued progress until it solves them, Pres. Charles H. Ruby of the Air Line Pilots warned.

ALPA insists that these problems be solved and it will continue to propose solutions at safety meetings and before congressional hearings, Ruby told the union's annual Air Safety Forum.

The four-day forum, which Ruby keynoted, dealt with such critical problems as air traffic control, congestion, certification of airports and airport managers, collision avoidance and cabin safety.

The forum was attended by more than 400 pilots and representatives of aircraft manufacturers, airlines and government. The union's Steward & Stewardess Division also held its annual forum here at the same time.

Until the industry develops collision prevention techniques, Ruby pointed out, the collision hazard must be minimized by enlarging old airports and building new ones.

The airport danger, he noted, is demonstrated by the fact that jet aircraft are regularly being squeezed into 4,500 and 5,000-foot runways when ALPA's analysis, based on pilot experience, dictates 6,500 feet as a safe minimum.

The forum received a number of reports from ALPA's various committees which function throughout the year in assembling material on safety and seeking ways to improve it.

Capt. Clyde Muirheid, Jr. reported that congested voice frequencies, inefficient use of airspace and an intermix of planes with widely varying performance capabilities are parts of the air traffic control problem "in most urgent need of correction."

As chairman of ALPA's air traffic control committee, he stated that controller and cockpit workloads are "intolerable." The control system, Muirheid said, is converting pilots into parrots, "which are birds that talk a lot but don't fly well."

Capt. Earl R. Waggoner, chairman of the union's objects detection committee, said a reduction of airplane hijacking calls for defensive equipment on aircraft and a means of returning hijackers for criminal prosecution.

He expressed an opinion that frequency of violence on planes is directly related to the publicity it gets and urged news media to "realize the disservice they do" by playing up hijacking.

Capt. Vic Hewes, chairman of the rescue and fire committee, announced that the National Fire Protection Association has for the first time set requirements for fire and rescue equipment at airports that meet ALPA standards.

He said a committee survey revealed that 22 airports handling twin-engine jet service and nine handling three-engine jets had no fire and rescue equipment as of March 1969.

Ruby, on the recommendation of the union's board, has notified the managers of the 31 airports, that ALPA members will make every effort to discontinue operations at these airports by May 1970 unless fire-crash equipment is installed by then.

The Steward & Stewardesses Division forum heard Robert J. Serling, an aviation author and air safety consultant, urge airlines to strengthen the safety messages delivered by cabin attendants to passengers.

Pleading for safety consciousness, he said, "If you tolerate carelessness, indifference, lack of responsibility, you have no right to criticize any one else in aviation for compromising safety."

1,200 Pay Tribute:

Schnitzler Saluted For Long Service

More than 1,200 AFL-CIO friends of William F. Schnitzler, including top leaders of labor and government, gathered in Washington to honor the secretary-treasurer emeritus of the AFL-CIO.

The testimonial dinner which attracted the dignitaries from across the nation marked Schnitzler's retirement.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany led the list of speakers which included Schnitzler's successor, Lane Kirkland, and Labor Sec. George P. Shultz.

It was an evening of affectionate tribute to an old friend—and of rededication to the goals of the labor movement he served.

Meany saluted Schnitzler for his 45 years of service to the trade union movement and his contribution to the social progress of the nation during the past 17 years, first as secretary-treasurer of the AFL and later as second highest officer of the merged AFL-CIO.

"He has seen much progress in that time," Meany said, "the progress of the AFL-CIO measured by the only measurement that is worth anything and that is the measurement of human values."

Meany added: "Better wages, better contracts, better conditions on the job, higher pensions, welfare benefits, more effective political action and an enhanced reputation and standing as a peoples' lobby here in Washington, lobbying for legislation that benefits all the citizens of this great country—education, minimum wage, civil rights—all of these enactments of the last few years bear the AFL-CIO label."

But the AFL-CIO can't be content to rest on past performance, Meany stressed.

He called for the creation of a massive new job program to eliminate hard core unemployment, and an improved educational system with fully funded programs, scholarships and facilities, with a better-paid staff of teachers.

"We need 26 million new housing units between now and eight years from now," Meany declared.

"We need lower interest rates for mortgages so the people of this country can buy homes," he added.

The nation's unfinished business, Meany said, includes better consumer protection, a 50 percent boost in social security benefits, safety for workers on the job and an attack on inflation at its base—the profit squeeze by big corporations. "And we need fair tax laws."

In the 1970 elections, Meany noted, "all of the things we believe in will be at stake . . . and I hope it is true that they say we have the best political machine in America. I hope that it is true because it is going to be needed in 1970."

Schnitzler, responding to Meany's salute, stressed the labor movement's accomplishments in the fight for social justice.

"Long before other organized groups in America took affirmative action to abolish racial discrimination and eliminate prejudice, labor was at work in the field doing it," he recalled.

Today's labor movement, he noted, can learn from past struggles and victories.

Unity was the keynote to victory in those past struggles and it can be used just as effectively now, Schnitzler said.

"If 3 million union members could win legislative battles for the betterment of America in the 1930s, then why can't 13.5 million union members win the battle for the perfection of America in the 1970s?" he asked.

Kirkland, who said he represented all of Schnitzler's colleagues, presented Schnitzler keys to a new automobile.

Schnitzler also received an engraved scroll of an Executive Council resolution of tribute.

Shultz praised Schnitzler both for his outstanding record as a labor leader and his contribution as a citizen who gave his time to serve on numerous government advisory boards. He presented Schnitzler a Labor Dept. Award of Merit and delivered a special letter from Pres. Nixon.

Arrangements for the testimonial dinner were made by a committee of AFL-CIO Executive Council members headed by Vice Pres. M. A. Hutcheson. Other members of the special committee were Vice Presidents Hunter P. Wharton, Paul Jennings, Matthew Guinan and James A. Suffridge.

Texas AFL-CIO Charts Programs For '70s Keyed to Youth, Services

Corpus Christi—The Texas State AFL-CIO charted a "program for the space age of the '70s" that included a new youth affairs program and a much-expanded community services program.

Federation Pres. H. S. Hank Brown set the tone for the 11th convention in his opening remarks by saying that "organized labor had always been in the business of closing gaps—and the generation gap is but one that needs bridging now."

He also said that despite such gains in the last session of the legislature as the state's first minimum wage law and a workmen's compensation reform act, much more is needed to be done.

The convention called for legislation to guarantee 500,000 state and local government employes the right to organize and bargain collectively. Presently, Texas law forbids public employe organizations to be recognized by state agencies or subdivisions.

The convention also urged an increase in the new minimum wage, creation of a corporate income tax, establishment of a state Public Utilities Commission and a state Labor-Management Relations Act.

Another theme that was repeated in several resolutions and by a number of speakers was opposition to climbing auto insurance rates.

The federation has been campaigning to change the rate-making formula to include investment income in figuring insurance companies' gains and losses.

The keynote speaker at the convention was Sen. Ralph W. Yarborough (D-Tex.), who is chairman of the Senate Labor Committee.

He told the delegates that the construction safety bill, which he is co-sponsoring, is ready for floor action in the Senate.

He also said that he was opposed to continuing the 10 percent surtax, and that he proposed an excess war profits tax in its place.

Yarborough was honored at a reception attended by over 1,000 delegates and guests. A resolution praised Yarborough for his opposition to the proposal to turn the Post Office into an independent, nonprofit corporation.

Other speakers included Texas Congressmen Jack Brooks and John Young.

Brown was re-elected president without opposition and Roy R. Evans was re-elected secretary-treasurer in a race against Jesse Sapp, formerly president of the Waco AFL-CIO Council.

For the first time, the convention had a youth affairs committee and most of its members came from delegates who were under 30.

James Middleton, Jr., of the Laborers, who is 21, and Larry Sartin, 24, of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, headed the group.

The convention's Political Education Committee placed heavy emphasis on the voter registration drive which opens Sept. 1.

Growers Seek to 'Muzzle' Union:

Wages, Dispute on Pesticides Snarl California Grape Talks

Delano, Calif.—An employer ultimatum on the use of hazardous pesticides in the vineyards, coupled with a wage disagreement, has snarled peace talks between a group of table grape growers and the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee.

High hopes had been held for a historic model contract after the group of 10 prominent table grape growers, admitting for the first time that the worldwide boycott was hurting them, sued for peace with the union and called for unprecedented intervention by the Federal Mediation Service late last month.

But the hopes were dashed last week when the growers abandoned the bargaining table and called on Pres. Nixon to appoint a fact-finding committee to investigate the dispute.

UFWOC Dir. Cesar Chavez immediately blasted the grower proposal as "attempted blackmail, an attempt to muzzle us on the dangers of pesticides."

Chavez said the growers had proposed a clause in the contract which would read: "The union agrees that it will not embark on any program which will in any way harm the industry to which the employer is a member."

"That clause would prevent us from lobbying in Sacramento or Washington for better laws on the regulation of pesticides, or even safety and sanitation laws," said Chavez.

He added that the union, which has filed suit in Bakersfield and Riverside to force agricultural commissioners to disclose pesticide formulas in order for farm workers to be adequately treated for illnesses caused by the economic poisons, will continue to publicize the facts.

"We're concerned about harm done to people, much more than harm done to an industry," he said.

Meanwhile, a bill to ban all use of the controversial pesticide DDT in California within three years was approved unanimously Tuesday in the state Senate.

In the contract talks, the union had proposed a clause which would have banned the use of DDT and certain other poisons. The clause would have specified procedures for applying and using other chemicals, and would have provided protection to workers coming in direct contact with the poisons, and consumers endangered by residues on the fruit.

Chavez pointed out that "over 1,000 people, mostly farm workers, are injured and poisoned every year in California alone from misuse of the pesticides."

On another front in the long drawn out battle, unprecedented legal action has been started to punish growers who use Mexican aliens as farm workers.

The California Court of Appeals ruled July 22 in Sacramento that attorneys for California Rural Legal Assistance, an anti-poverty agency, may take statements from illegal aliens to show whether growers knowingly hired them.

The court also said the unusual legal procedure invoked by CRLA is "at least an open question" which could end up in forcing growers who use the aliens to pay damages and fines.

Currently, when growers are found using illegal aliens, the aliens are deported but there is no further action.

The CRLA is proceeding against the growers in such cases by invoking California's civil code which prohibits "unfair competition" by businessmen.

The legal group contends it is "unfair competition" for U.S. farm workers to have to compete with illegal "wetbacks" employed at cheap wages.

In another aspect of the farm conflict, Sen. Alan Cranston (D-Calif.) has called upon the Defense Dept. to show "true neutrality" in the table grape boycott by immediately cutting back on grape purchases which have soared since the boycott was launched.

Appealing to defense Sec. Melvin R. Laird's recently announced "social consciousness" policy in the department, Cranston also urged a freeze in the level of department purchases whenever a defense contractor is involved in a bona fide labor dispute.

In a letter to Laird, Cranston said the Defense Dept. concept of neutrality in the grape dispute reflected "either incredible ineptitude or surprising naivete."

The grape strike in the Coachella Valley, near the Mexican border, wound up this week with the union hailing it as a victory.

Over a half-million lugs of grapes were estimated to have been left to rot on the vines as the boycott cut off markets and forced the bottom to fall out on the price of table grapes.

Organizers for the union immediately moved their operations to the Arvin-Lamont area, south of Bakersfield, where a strike is set as soon as picking begins.

Growers who have been insisting that the boycott isn't hurting at all, have filed a $75 million lawsuit in U.S. District Court in Fresno to recover losses they now say they have suffered.

Attorneys for the farm workers union, against which the suit was filed, labeled it a hoax—"their annual attempt to scare chain stores."

The suit, brought by 81 vineyardists, claimed triple damages for $25 million losses they say they suffered.

It accuses the union of conspiring with retailers to prevent sale of table grapes in violation of antitrust laws.

AGVA Wins Court Test On Honoring Picket Line

The Variety Artists were not guilty of a secondary boycott in advising entertainers to honor a Musicians' picket line at two Nevada gambling casinos, the National Labor Relations Board ruled.

Reversing a trial examiner's February ruling, board members Gerald A. Brown, John H. Fanning and Sam Zagoria dismissed a complaint against AGVA on a charge of illegal secondary boycott. The charge was filed by Harrah's Club, Sparks Nugget and other casinos in the Reno-Lake Tahoe resort area.

The dispute arose when AGVA sent telegrams urging support for striking "house bands" to Dinah Shore, Tennessee Ernie Ford, Sid Caesar and other union members scheduled to appear in Tahoe area shows.

In its decision, the board applied what it called "one important test of the lawfulness" of picketing.

That test, the panel said, is "the identification of such picketing with the actual functioning of the primary employer's business at the situs of the labor dispute."

The board cited a recent Supreme Court decision affirming NLRB findings based on the general rule. The justices held that appeals to withhold their services directed "to all those approaching the situs whose mission is selling, delivering or otherwise contributing to the operations which the strike is endeavoring to halt" constitutes primrary activity outside the scope of T-H and is therefore lawful.

In applying these "traditional principles" to the case, the board said that no one can contend AGVA's appeals to its members "called for anything but the refusal of the entertainers to cross the picket lines of the striking musicians at the clubs."

"The picket lines were established in furtherance of a primary strike," the board continued, "and the telegrams advised the stars that AGVA supported the strike and instructed them to honor the picket line."

The union's conduct, it said, "was not substantially different from that of the AFM itself in picketing" at the site of the disputes, namely the clubs themselves.

The record demonstrates that the shows "are an important means of enticing the public to the clubs in the . . . reasonable expectation that once inside the club they can be induced to try their luck" in the casinos, thus "enhancing the financial success of the gambling enterprise."

Accordingly, the board concluded, the work of the performers was necessary to the normal operation of the casinos and AGVA appealed for action "only at the situs of the dispute."

Shell Boycott Called Off In Oil Union Settlement

Denver—The Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers announced the end of a nationwide consumer boycott against the products of Shell Oil Co. after reaching "satisfactory agreements" with the company at its California installations.

The Shell boycott, supported by the AFL-CIO, was launched Mar. 17, 1969 after 2,000 striking union members returned to work in Shell California plants without a contract. The OCAW had earlier won new gains with all major oil companies with which it has contracts.

OCAW Pres. A. F. Grospiron said "we have had splendid support from organized labor and from our friends outside labor in this effort. We have won our dispute. We now urge our friends who find it convenient to do so to resume buying Shell products in the United States."

The union has a separate dispute with Shell in Canada where workers at the refinery in Vancouver are on strike.

Contractors Solicited For Strike Insurance

A Bermuda insurance company is soliciting building contractors throughout the United States to sign up for a strike insurance program endorsed by the Associated General Contractors of America.

The program was approved by the AGC at its March convention and designed to indemnify contractors for losses from work stoppages due to any type of labor dispute.

Five-year individual policies are being offered by Arch Insurance Co. Ltd. of Hamilton, Bermuda. Policy applications accepted by Oct. 31, 1969 will become effective Jan. 1, 1970 if there are enough applications to constitute a "sufficient spread of risk." However, no claims will be payable before July 1, 1970.

Contractors can select policies that will give them insurance indemnities of from $300 to $120,000 a day, with premiums ranging from $900 for the minimum coverage to $360,000 for the maximum, plus a minimum premium retained by Arch Insurance Co.

J. N. Matich, of Colton, Calif., who headed an 18-month study by an AGC committee, is chairman of the Policyholders' Advisory Committee. He said that the insurance plan should expedite settlement of labor disputes and bring about "less exorbitant increases in construction labor costs."

The policy defines a labor dispute as including any union organizing, union recognition drives, various forms of boycotts and picketing, strikes during the term of an agreement or during negotiation of a contract and lockouts of a multi-employer group.

In promoting its policies in the United States the insurance company stresses the advantage of a non-U.S. company as "beyond the reach of American labor unions or political pressures."

ment at the Medical College of South Carolina where 375 workers returned after 100 days on the picket line with their major goals won.

The settlement at County Hospital followed the general pattern set at the Medical College, with wage increases of from 30 to 70 cents an hour plus other benefits.

The union and civil rights groups led by the Southern Christian Leadership Conference worked together with community leaders to help win recognition for the nonprofessional, low-paid hospital workers, mostly Negro and women.

The strike received wide support from the labor movement across the nation with the AFL-CIO Executive Council establishing a strike fund and contributing $25,000.

Chamber Sees Threat From Job Safety Law

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce has come up with a new line in its fight against federal job safety legislation.

The Chamber, in its "Washington Report on Labor," now contends that if federal safety laws are passed "unions may try in the name of on-the-job safety to force the closing of a plant being operated during a strike."

Its apparent position is that plants should be permitted to operate during strikes with strikebreakers whether they are safe or not.

The recent nationwide strike of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers against the oil industry, the Chamber said, illustrates its point.

The business group complained that the OCAW issued public statements saying that operation of struck facilities by management personnel was extremely hazardous to those in the plants as well as nearby residents. State and local officials were urged to move to curtail the plant operations.

"Adoption of proposed federal occupational safety legislation would be an open invitation for unions to use this same tactic as a stranglehold on an employer at the bargaining table," it claimed.

The Chamber is also upset that since federal job safety rules were recently set for government supply contractors some unions have announced that they are planning to use their own equipment to measure noise, dust and chemical levels in plants.

Unionists, on the other hand, note that the Chamber has pointed with pride at the U.S. industrial safety record which shows 14,000 on-the-job deaths last year and some 2 million injuries.

Space Age Irony

JULY 20, 1969, will be marked forever as the day man transcended the bonds of his nature and his environment, and the human race entered a new era leading to realms beyond comprehension and even beyond imagination. Man has realized the unrealizable because he dared to conceive the inconceivable; now one can believe that the limitations to the accomplishments of man are set only by the limitations of the human spirit.

And therein lies the irony inherent in this most extraordinary expression of man's prowess. As man gains another world—with the prospect of adding another and still another, literally ad infinitum—he stands in imminent danger of losing his own.

Transfixed by the glowing vision of the stars, he too easily turns from his ugly failures on this earth. He cannot afford to do so, least of all at this moment of his triumph in the skies.

The godlike quality of his better nature must not blind him to the dismal realities of life today, marked as they are by vicious struggles of men and nations for power and control over each other, as they have been from the beginning of time.

For all his resplendent glory as he steps forth on another planet, man is still a pathetic creature, able to master outer space and yet unable to control his inner self; able to conquer new worlds yet unable to live in peace on this one; able to create miracles of science and yet unable properly to house and clothe and feed all his fellow men; able eventually to colonize an alien and hostile environment and yet increasingly unable to come to terms with the nurturing environment that is his home.

The great question for the decades to come is not how or why or when man will continue his excursions under the arch of heaven, as he certainly will; but whether the magnificent accomplishment celebrated throughout the world today will at last inspire him to achieve the age-old goals of which he is capable and for whose realization he has yearned so long: life in harmony with nature, peace with his fellow man and a just society on this no longer lonely planet earth.

—From an editorial in the New York Times, July 21, 1969.

The Housing Crisis

MORE HOUSING, more adequate shelter, more healthy, happy families could be achieved by bringing the price of money down from the skies and within reach—perhaps more than can be provided by federally subsidized housing programs, vital as these programs are. Public housing serves a need that connot be fulfilled in the marketplace, regardless of money rates. But homeownership and decent rental housing in great quantity would come closer to realization if the costs of financing were brought into rein.

The greatest problem in housing today is the availability of money: money available at low rates of interest; money available free of points; money available to home builders and home buyers spared from the unfair competition they must face from commercial and industrial borrowers, from defense contractors, from road builders, from shopping center contractors and from luxury high rise developers.

As a nation, we are suffering a calamity of near-unattainable housing while our society measures its affluence in the new office buildings, motels, hotels, and commercial structures it is building at a record pace. In every urban area, these new structures now rise like monuments over the slums, ghettos and substandard housing of the city's people.

Draft Case Points Up Dangers In Conspiracy Prosecutions

By John P. Roche

FOR MOST PEOPLE, who do not read the small print in an indictment, Dr. Benjamin Spock and his three associates were convicted by a jury in Boston federal court for interfering with the draft, encouraging draft evasion, etc. This was not, in fact, the substance of the indictment.

Just as Communists convicted under the Smith Act were not put away for attempting to overthrow the government of the United States, Spock & Co. did not stand accused of direct criminal behavior. The Communists were put in jail for conspiring to teach and advocate the violent overthrow of the United States. Spock was sentenced for conspiring to undermine the selective service system.

To this the average layman will inquire "So what?" The answer is "plenty." In normal criminal prosecutions, an individual is accused of committing a crime and evidence is introduced to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that he did in fact do it. In conspiracy cases, on the other hand, we start with the conclusion that a crime has been committed (in Spock's case, men were burning draft cards), then note that a number of people have been advocating this crime, and proceed to argue that the crime has emerged from the advocacy.

In other words, the United States Attorney in Boston did not prove to the jury (nor did he have to under the procedure governing conspiracy convictions) that any one draft card burner lit the match at Spock's urging. What he demonstrated was that some defendants undoubtedly favored draft card burning, that some made speeches supporting draft evasion, and that various members of their audiences got out their matches, turned in their cards, etc.

To oversimplify, the four accused men were put in a package, with each contributing one-fourth, and the prosecutor went on to deal with this "conspiracy" as a single offender. Maybe Spock didn't say one thing, but the Rev. William Sloane Coffin did. Perhaps Coffin favored "legal defiance," but Michael Ferber supported direct action. And so on.

The late Justice Robert Jackson summed it up tersely in 1948. "A co-defendant in a conspiracy trial occupies an uneasy seat. There generally will be evidence of wrongdoing by somebody. It is difficult for the individual to make his own case . . . in the minds of jurors who are ready to believe that birds of a feather are flocked together."

Elsewhere in the same opinion Jackson observed that "the modern crime of conspiracy is so vague that it almost defies definition. . . . As a practical matter, the accused often is confronted with a hodgepodge of acts and statements by others which he may never have authorized or intended or even known about, but which help to persuade the jury of existence of the conspiracy itself.

"In other words, a conspiracy often is proved by evidence that is admissible only upon assumption that conspiracy existed."

Obviously criminal conspiracies do exist and merit prosecution, but the law of conspiracy has traditionally been a lazy prosecutor's shortcut to a conviction. Some years ago, for instance, an alleged Mafia "family" met for a birthday party in Apalachin, N.Y. As the hamburgers were broiling, the cops descended and arrested all hands. They inquired what was going on (above and beyond the birthday celebration) and everyone present subsequently took the Fifth and sent for his lawyer.

THEY WERE INDICTED and convicted (a conviction later reversed) for conspiring to commit unknown offenses. Their reliance on the Fifth Amendment was adduced as proof of the conspiracy, and of the existence of the offenses.

In the different but related area of civil conspiracy, the trade unions were penalized for generations as illegal combinations engaged in coercive behavior. The extraordinary reach of the law can be judged by the fact that group action may be an offense, where if an individual did the same thing, it would be perfectly legal. A boycott falls into this category.

One hopes that the Supreme Court, if it reviews the Spock decision, will take the opportunity to tighten up the standards of conspiracy in the United States. We have lived too long with this relic of the Tudor Star Chamber, this almost infinitely flexible instrument for evading normal legal standards of guilt. The French and other nations with a Roman Law inheritance get along very nicely without it. Why don't we try that experiment? Prosecutors may have to work harder, but that is a tolerable price to pay for progress.

To Live in Peace:

Challenge of Worldly Problems Still Faces Moon-Walking Man

The following is excerpted from an editorial in the Washington Post of July 21, 1969 entitled "One Small Step—One Giant Leap."

THE CREATURE who once stood blinking at the door of his Paleolithic cave has come a long way. No longer is he tied to the area or even to the world where he was born. The heavens lie open now. The time nears when he will roam his solar system. At long last, man is on the brink of mastering the universe.

The technological and scientific achievements demonstrated yesterday in the landing of a manned spacecraft on the surface of the moon surpass all that have gone before. The three-man team of Armstrong, Aldrin and Collins has shown that man can travel incredible distances, land safely on non-earthly bodies, devise equipment to sustain human life where nature has not provided for its existence, and prepare to return to earth. Few of their forerunners who explored the planet earth reached their goals with so good a chance of returning to tell of it.

The exploits of these brave men, and of the tens of thousands whose work has made them possible, open new vistas for exploration and thought that end man man knows not where.

The implications of their voyage for religion, philosophy and even human behavior can be foreseen only dimly for they have done the impossible. Man has safely landed in a vehicle, emerged, and walked upon the moon.

This is the third great scientific achievement in an era full of achievements—military, political, and technological. Within the lifetime of most Americans alive today, man has split the atom, broken the genetic code, and conquered space. In each of these, men have pried out of nature some of the very fundamentals of creation. By doing so, they have extended the horizons of all mankind by holding out the promise of unlimited energy, perfection in reproduction, and new knowledge of what life itself is all about.

But each of these magnificent achievements holds also the seeds of disaster. Few greater evils could befall mankind than for men to carry their earthly disputes to the stars.

There is, however, something humbling about the landing of men on the moon. Six men have now seen the earth as it really is—a speck in the infinity of space. In that context, man's exploits must seem puny and his egocentric view of the universe must disappear. He is merely baggage on a planet in a solar system that is a tiny part of something he can scarcely begin to understand.

Thus, while this is no doubt a day for national rejoicing and thanksgiving, it is also a day for national renewal. It is true that the United States has won the race to the moon and has thrown back into the face of the Soviet Union the boast of then-Premier Khrushchev, just seven years ago, that his country's space achievements would "demonstrate the great advantage of the socialist system." But it would be tragic if Americans viewed this great event in a nationalistic framework.

If this nation stands taller in the world today, it does so because it stands on the shoulders of men of many countries—the men who from Copernicus and Galileo through Goddard, Von Braun, Tsiolkovsky and Oberth dreamed of such a day. Armstrong and Aldrin landed on the moon not just as Americans but as representatives of the human race.

The hope of Apollo 11 is that this achievement, along with the others in space, past, present and future, Russian as well as American, will rekindle man's dreams and revive his lagging spirits. The world needs men now who believe in their dreams of prosperity and brotherhood at home, peace and good will on earth, and adventure and cooperation in space.

THE RECORD OF HISTORY makes it possible to believe that this hope of Apollo 11 is not in vain. Writing of a part of the world at the time this last great frontier was opened, Samuel Eliot Morrison said:

At the end of 1492 most men in Western Europe felt exceedingly gloomy about the future. Christian civilization appeared to be shrinking in area and dividing into hostile units. Institutions were decaying, well-meaning people were growing cynical or desperate . . . Islam was expanding at the expense of Christendom. Every effort to recover the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem, touchstone of Christian prestige, had been a failure. The Ottoman Turks, after snuffing out all that remained of the Byzantine Empire, had overrun most of Greece, Albania and Serbia; presently they would be hammering at the gates of Vienna.

Then came the voyages of Columbus and the other captains who pursued the vision of Henry the Navigator. As word of their exploits spread, Morrison wrote, "new ideas flared up throughout Italy, France, Germany and the Northern nations; faith in God revives and the human spirit is renewed."

It was not without good reasons that historians arbitrarily selected the year 1500 as the beginning of modern history. After the discovery of a New World, Will Durant has written, "A pride of achievement inspired the human mind just when Copernicus was about to reduce the cosmic importance of the earth and its inhabitants. Man felt that the world of matter had been conquered by the courage of the human mind. The medieval motto for Gibraltar—ne plus ultra—was denied by abbreviation; it became now plus ultra—more beyond. All limits were removed; all the world was open; everything seemed possible."

That, then, should be the spirit in which this nation and the world celebrate the achievement of our astronauts. A new frontier has opened. New worlds are there to be conquered. But success brings responsibility as well as glory. The landing of men on the moon is a challenge as well as a triumph—a challenge that men get on with the task of solving earthly problems as well as confronting nature in space, that he learn to live in peace as well as to compete for supremacy.

15,000 Abuses in 1968:

Violations of Child Labor Laws Bring Appeal for Crackdown

CHILD LABOR, thought by most Americans to be a "dead issue" in the United States, is a serious and growing problem, an AFL-CIO economist declared, as he called for stepped-up enforcement of laws to protect children from "dangerous and detrimental employment."

Rudolph Oswald, of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, cited a recent Labor Dept. report that nearly 15,000 violations of federal child labor statutes were uncovered in 1968. The full scope of the problem is "actually much larger, since the Labor Dept. investigates only about 4 percent of the total number of establishments covered by the law," he said on Labor News Conference.

The bulk of the violations, he said, occurred in non-agricultural jobs in the manufacturing and service industries where there was no union contract. He said that one case involved 11 youngsters ranging in age from 12 to 15 hired by a metal bracket manufacturer at an average wage of 40 cents an hour.

Unlawful employment of youngsters on farms figured in some 2,000 violations found by the federal wage and hour investigators, Oswald said, noting that some cases have involved "children under age six."

Oswald renewed the AFL-CIO's call for congressional action to increase the number of wage-hour investigators to enforce the laws. He also said that the Labor Dept. itself should step up its efforts to provide "safeguards and regulations . . . in industries where it has not acted since the responsibility was added by the 1966 amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act."

THE UNION ECONOMIST said that the labor movement rejects the notion of a "sub-minimum wage" for young workers—a proposal advanced by some employers who contend they would hire more young workers if they could pay them less.

"If a job is worth doing, it is worth the minimum wage" of $1.60 an hour, he asserted.

DESPITE THE VAST educational machine that has been created in the United States, higher education is not as available to the poor as to the wealthy and the better off.

To a highly troubling degree high school boys and girls who go on to college still are mostly representative of high family income and a background of parents who themselves have gone to college.

Latest statistics compiled by the Bureau of the Census on the percentage of high school graduates who go on to college show that the "dollar sign still stands at the college gate."

The study was a follow-up on one made of high school seniors in 1965 and what happened to them by 1967. A number of important facts were found: only 8 percent had dropped out of high school before graduation and the rate for girls was even less. But the most important fact to emerge was the educational and economic background of those students who finished high school and of those who went on to college:

1. Among seniors whose fathers had not completed elementary school, 15 percent dropped out of high school as compared with only 5 percent for those whose fathers had at least an elementary school education.

2. Among seniors whose family income was under $4,000, 13 percent failed to graduate compared with only 6 percent of those whose family income was higher.

3. Among high school graduates whose fathers were college graduates, 82 percent went on to college compared with only 22 percent of those whose fathers had not completed elementary school.

4. "High family income is associated with the likelihood of college attendance," the report said. "Of those high school graduates who were from families whose income was $5,000 or more, 87 percent went on to college."

As family income went up, so did college attendance: 19.8 percent for those with family incomes of less than $3,000; 32.3 for income of $3,000 to $4,000; 36.9 percent for $4,000 to $6,000; 41.1 percent for $6,000 to $7,500; 51 percent for $7,500 to $10,000; and 61.3 percent for $10,000 to $15,000.

5. Nearly half of the white high school graduates went on to college compared with only a third of the Negro graduates.

All of these findings indicate clearly that despite our many free and partly free colleges and the scholarship programs that have been pushed so hard by some foundations and the labor movement, the chances of a poor boy getting a college education are infinitely lower than those of a boy from a well-off family.

Actually, at a time when sending a boy or girl to college can cost between $3,000 and $4,000 a year, as it does now, the children of even relatively well-paid middle class workers and professionals find college difficult without extreme family sacrifice.

THIS NEED NOT BE. The United States proved it could reach into the ranks of all of its citizens and provide higher education to the veterans of World War II, a program that added immeasurably to the nation's wealth and growth. It has not been as successful with its program for its Viet Nam veterans or with its program to aid students get higher educations.

In the mid-60s Congress sought to provide economic aid to college students to continue their scholastic careers. Organized labor supported legislation that would have extended direct federal subsidies and loans to students at low interest rates. Instead, Congress settled for a compromise that merely guaranteed loans to be made by banks at low rates to needy students.

Unfortunately the banks have failed to live up to their end of the bargain. At a time when interest rates have been mounting steadily, banks have shown little interest in low-interest loans to students even with government guarantees. The result has been a sharp drop in such loans which have become extremely difficult to get.

The American people cannot afford to place the "dollar sign at the college gate" and thus lose the potential contributions that so many of its young—but poor—sons and daughters can make to the national welfare.

CHILD LABOR remains a serious and growing problem in the United States 30 years after the adoption of protective legislation, AFL-CIO Economist Rudolph Oswald, center, declared on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Alexander Uhl, left, of Press Associates, Inc., and Alan Adams of Business Week magazine. The public service interview is broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

HIGH SCHOOL students from Duluth, Minn., visit the AFL-CIO headquarters, above, during a tour of Washington to learn about "the American legislative process." Susan Ellis of the federation public relations staff briefs them on the AFL-CIO legislative program. Austrian school teachers, left, also make a stop at the federation's conference room to hear about the labor movement's role in education. They were welcomed by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, briefed by the staff of the federation's Dept. of Education and Pres. David Selden of the Teachers union. The 93 teachers are on a tour sponsored by the Austrian trade union federation.

Drive on Compliance

Labor Dept. Cites Wage-Hour Abuse

The Labor Dept. is initiating an educational campaign on the provisions of the federal Wage-Hour law to achieve fuller compliance by employers.

Even after 31 years of enforcement, many firms are still not complying fully with the Fair Labor Standards Act and many workers are unaware of the protection it gives them, said Wage-Hour Administrator Robert D. Moran.

"We intend to make sure that employers understand their obligations and workers their rights under the act," Moran stressed in announcing the educational drive.

He attributed the lag in compliance with wage and hour requirements to "a deplorable lack of understanding by employers and workers alike of the law's provisions and applicability."

The Labor Dept.'s enforcement program has been hampered by a lack of funds to hire wage-hour inspectors—and the current budget calls for leaving the jobs unfilled to save money.

Without adequate manpower to crack down on violations, the Labor Dept. has apparently decided to put the stress on "education."

Moran said the informational drive has been given "top priority" in the Wage & Hour and Public Contracts Divisions aimed at thousands of workers—including many of the low-wage poor.

The drive will be keyed to these areas, Moran said:

- Easy-to-understand television commercials, posters, pamphlets, press releases and films to explain the more complex points of the law.
- An appeal to news media to help explain the employers' obligations and employes' rights in news and features stories and in editorials.
- Stepped-up communications from the Wage-Hour division to trade organizations whose members are affected by wage-hour activities of the Labor Dept.
- Increased public information activities by federal wage-hour representatives to explain the programs of the two divisions.

Moran said that compliance with the law through education offers the most effective and reliable means of guaranteeing that all workers will be able to enjoy their rights.

"Obviously, it is impossible for the government to make a weekly audit of the paychecks of some 50 million wage earners covered by this law," he observed. "While we'll continue to prosecute those employers who deliberately violate the law, costly litigation isn't the most effective way to achieve compliance."

Japan Urged to Aid Textile Conference

Presidents of four AFL-CIO unions have urged Japan to join with the United States in convening an international conference to work out a voluntary agreement regulating the flow of textile and apparel imports.

"Such an agreement," they said, "would enable all nations to share the benefits of the increased demand for clothes and textiles without imperilling work opportunities and labor standards in any one of them."

The statement was signed by Presidents Louis Stulberg, Ladies' Garment Workers; Jacob Potofsky, Clothing Workers; William Pollock, Textile Workers Union of America; and George Baldanzi, United Textile Workers.

Strong Standards Urged to Spur Lagging Workman's Compensation

Strong federal standards are needed to shore up the nation's antiquated workmen's compensation system, an AFL-CIO staff expert emphasized in an insurance trade publication.

A myriad of state laws have "glaring deficiencies," some of which go all the way back to when the system was set up more than 50 years ago, writes James R. O'Brien, an assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security.

O'Brien expresses labor's view in one of three articles on workmen's compensation and its outlook for the future in the weekly magazine, Business Insurance.

The other writers are M. Roscoe Lowery, president of the International Association of Industrial Accident Boards & Commissions, and Paul S. Wise, president, American Mutual Insurance Alliance.

Workmen's compensation was society's first major legislative response to the human and social needs of industrial and technological change, O'Brien points out. However, he adds:

"After 50 years the results are disappointing. Technological and industrial progress has proceeded at breakneck speed but state workmen's compensation laws have not kept pace."

He cites examples of deficiencies in such terms as these:

- Depending upon your source, estimates of workers covered by laws "range from a low of 60 percent to a high of 80 percent."
- A number of laws that allow employers to accept or reject them and provide wide exemptions "are indefensible anachronisms in the system."
- Strict limitations on medical benefits contained in 18 state laws "are inexcusable" and limits on occupational disease coverage "in a like number of state laws is tragic."
- Death benefits in too many states "utterly fail to provide adequate protection for a surviving widow and children."
- Disability benefits "are even worse" under the system with a majority of states providing payments so low that the family of the injured worker "is forced to live below the poverty level."

In other areas, O'Brien points to a lack of permanent total disability benefits under many laws and harsh limitations on the duration of benefits that violate "the original intention of our workmen's compensation system."

He sets forth the AFL-CIO's program of minimum standards for state laws to include:

Coverage of all workers and all occupational injuries and diseases, full medical benefits, rehabilitation benefits, benefits for the totally disabled for the period of disability, death benefits for a widow until death or remarriage, choice of physician by a worker, double benefits for illegally employed minors who are injured on the job and maximum temporary total disability of not less than two-thirds of the injured worker's average weekly wage.

Other Changes

The article describes some improvements made in the Federal Employees' Compensation Act by Congress in 1966 and pending bills to establish national standards and protect workers in certain industries, such as coal and uranium mining.

"All of these proposals," O'Brien declares, "stem from the conviction of responsible people that state legislatures cannot be relied upon to modernize the workmen's compensation system."

A greater federal voice in the system is needed, and it is "being demanded by injured workers and their families," he concludes.

Lowery and Wise, while opposing federal standards, acknowledged deficiencies in state workmen's compensation laws.

Lowery said that the states must meet their responsibilities at "a more rapid pace." States that lag, he said, "must be made aware that the alternative to their inaction is strong federal legislation."

Wise conceded that inadequacies in state laws require "quickly accelerated progress" toward improvement or there will be "burgeoning federal intervention."

Kirkland Named To Defense Panel

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland has been named by Defense Sec. Melvin R. Laird to a 16-member panel that will make a year-long study of the Pentagon's management, research, procurement and decision-making machinery.

The panel, headed by Gilbert W. Fitzhugh, chairman of the board of Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., will then make recommendations for reforms. Educators, attorneys and business executives make up the bulk of the panel.

Its formation comes at a time when the Defense Dept. has been under criticism from Congress for underestimating costs of major programs.

In announcing the panel's makeup, Laird said he was confident that its work "will enable the department to perform its national security mission better, and save the taxpayer money by eliminating wasteful practices of the past."

Insurance Union Wins Right to Address List

New York—The Insurance Workers are entitled to a mailing list of Prudential agents to fulfill the union's duty of representing all the agents fairly, a U.S. Court of Appeals has ruled.

The 2nd Circuit Court of Appeals here voted 2-1 to enforce a National Labor Relations Board order that the Prudential Insurance Co. of America must give the union a list of all its agents with their addresses.

The union has been trying for 10 years to get an up-to-date list of the agents, who at the end of 1967 totaled 16,795 in 34 states and the District of Columbia. When management again refused a union request for the list, the IWIU filed an unfair labor practice charge; the NLRB upheld the charge and the company appealed.

Judges Irving R. Kaufman and Paul R. Hays concurred in upholding the NLRB's requirement that the company supply the information on the ground that it was needed by the union to carry out its legal duties as bargaining representative of all the agents.

It is "beyond question," the majority said, that the employer's duty to bargain in good faith includes an obligation to provide the union with "information that is necessary and relevant to the proper performance of its duties."

The employer obligation, the judges said, applies not only to information needed by the union for the effective administration of an existing agreement but also to information it needs to negotiate a new contract.

The union had cited a yearly 25 percent turnover in Prudential agents as one example of the problems it has in communicating with its bargaining unit. The company said it has other means of communication—bulletin boards, grievance committees, hand distribution and union meetings. The court majority called them all insufficient.

Judge Henry J. Friendly dissented from the majority opinion. His argument that the union wants the list to solicit more members was rejected by the majority as "simply of no moment." Such solicitation is "hardly an evil" where a union already is the exclusive bargaining agent for all the employes, the majority said.

IWIU Pres. William A. Gillen said he expects the company to appeal the decision.

Edwin Lahey Dies, Top Labor Reporter

Edwin A. Lahey, one of the nation's outstanding newspaper reporters for more than 40 years, died in Washington, D. C., of emphysema. He was 67.

He was a labor reporter for the Chicago Daily News in the 1930's and covered labor and national affairs in Washington since 1941. Lahey served as bureau chief of the Chicago Daily News and the Knight newspapers and was chief correspondent of the Knight papers at the time of his death.

National Health Insurance Pressed:

Remedies for Medicare Urged To Heal 'Gaps' in Program

Medicare has contributed "very significantly" to meeting the health needs of the elderly but the program has "glaring gaps" that must be corrected, AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bertrand Seidman told Congress.

He testified on Medicare—its accomplishments and changes needed—as a member of an advisory committee to a Senate subcommittee headed by Sen. Edmund S. Muskie (D-Me.).

A key recommendation in the advisory committee's report to the subcommittee was a call for a national health insurance program, which has become an important goal of the AFL-CIO.

Seidman said that Medicare has made it possible for millions of the elderly "to obtain necessary health care that they could not have obtained otherwise." But, he added, the program must be improved to "fulfill its original purpose of assuring medical care of high quality to all elderly Americans."

"Moreover, if we make Medicare the success it can be," he pointed out, "we will also be demonstrating that through a universal system of comprehensive national health insurance we can assure high quality health care to all the American people."

To assure that the elderly will no longer be denied adequate health care due to any lack of money, Seidman proposed the following changes in Medicare:

- Coverage of all medical services, mainly doctors' fees, under the social insurance feature of the program. As it now stands, retired persons must pay a share of medical services.
- Elimination of the coinsurance and deductible features.
- Extension of the program to cover the cost of prescription drugs, dental care and eyeglasses.
- A requirement that half of the program's total cost be met out of general revenue to meet the additional costs involved in the recommendations.

The advisory committee's report said "physicians' fees cannot remain subject to the whims of individual providers of service" if Medicare and the federal-state Medicaid program for the poor are to be fiscally responsible and "gross abuses stopped."

"The same is true of hospital costs," the committee added.

In calling for a comprehensive, compulsory health insurance program "for all age groups," the committee said the program should have built-in cost controls, standards for health care, incentives for prepaid group practice and "other badly needed reforms."

Such a program, it concluded, "offers the best hope this nation has for living up to the oft-expressed declaration that good health care is the right of every man, woman and child who lives in the land."

Advisory panel members, in addition to Seidman, were Mrs. Agnes W. Brewster, a medical economics consultant; Dr. S. J. Axelrod, director of public health economics at the University of Michigan; and Melvin A. Glasser, Auto Workers' social security director.

The Senate subcommittee also heard from Dr. John H. Knowles, who had been slated for the Nixon Administration's top health services post. His nomination was withdrawn after it came under heavy fire from the American Medical Association.

Knowles, director of the Massachusetts General Hospital, said that "it's inevitable in this country that there will be a comprehensive medical care program for all Americans, whether it takes two years or 20."

Nelson H. Cruikshank, president of the National Council of Senior Citizens, testified along with four senior aides who described a community service program being carried out by the council in ten U.S. cities.

Cruikshank explained the council's program of striving to "build a better America and winning a better life for all older Americans," including protection from illness.

"Because adequate health care is so essential," he said, "the idea of limiting it to those who can afford it is no longer acceptable to a nation which can put a man on the moon."

REVISIONS IN MEDICARE to close the "glaring gap" between its promise and performance were called for by AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bertrand Seidman in testimony before a Senate subcommittee. Nelson H. Cruikshank, left, president of the National Council of Senior Citizens, also emphasized the need for improving and expanding the program.

Company 'Persuaders' Must File Full Reports

New Orleans—Company lawyers and labor consultants who perform "persuader" services for an employer must file annual reports listing all income and expenditures for all labor relations clients, not only those who paid for "persuading," the 5th U.S. Court of Appeals ruled in a 7-5 decision.

The court settled a conflict in opinions by other courts on what Congress intended when it passed the Landrum-Griffin Act in 1959. It reversed a 1966 ruling by a three-judge appeals panel, and followed the lead of another appeals court—the 4th Circuit at Richmond, Va.—whose 1965 ruling in another case was refused review by the Supreme Court.

The Landrum-Griffin amendments to the labor law require company "persuaders" to file 30-day and annual reports of income and expenses with the Secretary of Labor. One lawyer—R. D. Douglas, Jr., of Greensboro, N.C.—refused to file a full financial statement, but lost his fight when the Supreme Court let the 4th Circuit decision stand.

The current case involves three labor relations lawyers who sued former Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz. They lost in the Dallas, Tex., district court, but won a tentative victory from an appeals court panel here. The full court has now ruled against the lawyers.

A "persuader," under the L-G law, is any person hired by an employer to persuade employes as to their right to organize and bargain collectively, or hired by the employer to supply information about the concerted activities of employes or unions.

Chief Judge John R. Brown, writing for the majority in the latest case, said "It boils down to this. As long as the attorney limits himself to [non-persuader] . . . activities he need not report. No report is set in motion by reason of his doing these things. What sets the report in motion is performing persuader activities."

The dissenting judges said the ruling flashes the spotlight of publicity on the "private and confidential, if not privileged, affairs of . . . innocent persons who chanced to receive advice or information in the area of 'labor relations,' whatever that is . . . from an attorney who happened . . . to engage in 'persuader activities,' whatever they are."

Nixon Seeks Congress OK To Realign ICC

Reorganization of the Interstate Commerce Commission to give the President authority to name the chairman and strengthen his administrative powers has been proposed by Pres. Nixon.

The reorganization plan would take effect unless vetoed by Congress within 60 days. As set forth in a message to Congress, the proposal calls for:

- Presidential appointment of a permanent chairman as of next Jan. 1. At the present time, the chairman's post is rotated annually among the ICC's 11 commissioners.
- Establishment of administrative authority in the ICC chairman. In 1961, the ICC delegated such powers to the chairman but Nixon said the authority requires statutory expression.

Earlier speculation had it that the President also would seek to reduce the number of commissioners to seven, but he did not do so.

In summary, Nixon said the reorganization was designed to provide "continuity" of leadership in the ICC, make the chairman more responsible and "result in more efficient operation of the commission."

The plan won immediate support in Congress and in the industry. A spokesman for the Railway Labor Executives Association recalled that railroad labor "went on record several years ago" in favor of a permanent chairman.

Clothing Union Opens Home for Retirees

Philadelphia—Retired Clothing Workers and their families are moving into the new Sidney Hillman Apartments in downtown Philadelphia.

The 17-story apartment house, dedicated earlier this year, contains 278 family units. Other accommodations include recreation and social rooms and a sun plaza.

The $4 million project was co-sponsored by the ACWA and the Philadelphia Clothing Manufacturers Association, backed by a loan through the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development.

Rents range from $75 to $115 a month. The selection of the tenants is based on financial needs and adaptability to the project.

About half of the residents are from the ranks of the ACWA. The remainder are from the Ladies' Garment Workers and other AFL-CIO unions. The building is near full occupancy.

The project has efficiency apartments and one-bedroom units, each with individual air conditioning and heat controls. Kitchens and bathrooms are specially designed for older persons.

The apartment building was named for the founding president of the ACWA, who died in 1946. It is situated near the union's medical center which was opened in 1951, and around the corner from the ACWA Geriatric Center, a recreation and cultural facility for the union's senior citizens.

At the dedication ceremonies, ACWA Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky said the Sidney Hillman Apartments are "testimony to the fact that we in this union are not standing still. We passed our 50th anniversary five years ago, but we are always looking forward to new challenges."

Albert R. Ettelson, who represented the manufacturers' association, described the apartment building as a "manifestation of social conscience," adding that "we dared to care about the people who work in this industry."

Anthony Cortigene, head of the union's Philadelphia Joint Board, said "the spirit of Hillman and the Amalgamated prompted this building to be erected. It's a home, not an institution."

TAX REFORM and "hunger in Maryland" were key topics in the 10th annual Maryland State and District of Columbia AFL-CIO Labor Institutes held at Goucher College, Towson, Md. The speakers and staff included, from left, William Pollard, AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights; Pres. Charles A. Della of the Maryland and D.C. AFL-CIO; Mohunpersad Shurmak Jagdambi, president of the Mauritius Labor Congress, and his escorts, Harold L. Walker of the Labor Dept., and Robert L. Kappler, business representative of Carpenters Local 101.

UFWA Wins First Pact at Casket Firm

Pine Bluff, Ark.—Striking members of the Furniture Workers returned to work at the Pine Bluff Casket Co. with a first contract, achieved with the aid of a nationwide labor boycott.

Thanks for the help of other unions and the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. were expressed by UFWA Pres. Morris Pizer, who announced the end of the strike and the Don't Buy campaign. The strike started Mar. 19.

The 50 strikers ratified a one-year contract with wage hikes, a dues checkoff and the first paid holidays ever granted by the casket manufacturer. Union members approved the contract only after management agreed to the strikers' return without penalty, Pizer said.

The UFWA won a National Labor Relations Board election last January, and was certified as the legal bargaining agent. The casket workers walked out after failing to get the company to bargain in good faith, according to UFWA Union Label Dir. James Griesi.

The union put the casket firm on its unfair list and launched the boycott against the company and its major customers in Oakland, Calif., Dallas, Terre Haute, Ind., St. Cloud, Minn., Shreveport, La., Kansas City, and other cities. It was the second UFWA campaign in which the consumer boycott played an effective role. An earlier strike, against the Grinnell Piano Co., Holly, Mich., ended after five months.

Tentative Votes Taken:

House Panel Shapes Bill for Tax Reform

A tax reform bill partially closing loopholes in the revenue law is rapidly taking shape in the House Ways & Means Committee.

All of the committee's decisions are still tentative, subject to second thoughts in the final drafting of the legislation.

But indications were that the committee expects to meet its deadline and bring a bill to the House floor for action before the Aug. 13 congressional recess.

If the tentative decisions hold up, the legislation would be stronger than the Nixon Administration proposals—but still short of the AFL-CIO's "tax justice" program.

The committee took a modest step to pare down the long sacrosanct oil depletion allowance.

It voted to reduce the 27.5 percent depletion allowance to 20 percent and to prohibit its use on foreign production. The AFL-CIO had urged complete abolition of the tax-free allowance.

Small as the step was, it nevertheless marked a victory for committee liberals who had balked at a staff recommendation to trim the allowance only to 23 percent and permit it to continue to be claimed on foreign oil production.

The committee also approved a provision aimed at preventing wealthy Americans from escaping virtually all taxation through the smorgasbord of loopholes.

It voted to limit the amount of tax-exempt income that could be claimed to 50 percent of a taxpayer's income plus $10,000.

The balance would be added to his taxable income. This would still allow considerable tax exemption but would reach at least part of the income now excluded because it comes from tax-free municipal bonds, the untaxed half of capital gains profits, depletion allowances, fast property depreciation benefits, hobby farm losses and dubious claims for charitable deductions, among others.

Still to be considered by the committee is the issue of tax relief—using part of the extra revenue from loophole-closing to ease the burden on taxpayers generally.

In a new gambit in the tax reform versus surtax extension priority, the Ways & Means Committee cleared legislation to continue the surtax withholding rate an additional 15 days until Aug. 15. The withholding rate previously had been extended 30 days, through July.

The Senate Democratic Policy Committee, in a shift of position, was considering an extension of the surtax to Nov. 1.

The Administration has been keeping up intensive pressure on Senate Democratic leaders to agree to act on the surtax extension before a tax reform bill is on the floor for action.

On the Senate floor, in between the continuing debate over the missile system, the political jockeying got even hotter.

At one point, a shouting argument broke out after Sen. Lee Metcalf (D-Mont.) had challenged Republican claims that immediate extension of the surtax was necessary to give foreign bankers confidence that the United States was going to do something to curb its inflation.

Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.) warned that bankers would not be satisfied with a delay in passing the surtax extension until tax reform were assured. "I tell you we're making a disastrous mistake" in holding up the surtax bill, Javits shouted.

"Now wait a minute," Sen. John O. Pastore (D-R.I.) shouted back. "It's the American people who will have to pay this tax. They have every right to ask, 'If we have to pay it, why don't you make it equitable, why don't you pass tax reform?' "

Pastore warned against going ahead with the surtax extension on the basis of "promises"

"If you let this occasion pass," he told the Senate, "you will never never, never have tax reform."

Stepping Stone

Full Funds Held Key To School Aid Goals

Congress has shortchanged many of the nation's neediest youngsters by failing to provide the money necessary to carry out the federal aid to education program, the AFL-CIO charged.

AFL-CIO Education Dir. Walter G. Davis emphasized the point in telling a Senate subcommittee that labor strongly supports legislation to extend the Elementary & Secondary Education Act another four years.

The four-year extension, he testified, "will constitute a firm commitment on the part of the federal government and make it possible to press for forward funding of the annual appropriations."

Under a House passed two-year extension, he warned, forward funding "would be impossible," thus hampering school administrators in making long-range educational plans and preventing effective use of funds.

Davis appealed to lawmakers to "use all the moral power at their command" to secure full funding of ESEA and other education programs even though this issue was not before the subcommittee.

"Adequate funding of ESEA is a national—not a partisan—issue," he declared, adding:

"The failure of Congress to fund these programs at authorized levels has meant that urgent needs have gone unmet and that in many cases the effectiveness of the programs has been seriously impaired."

He stressed that "it is not programs and services which are eliminated by underfunding, but children who are eliminated altogether from the benefits."

Davis cited a number of cities in which special aid to school districts with concentrations of poor children has been reduced because of lack of funds: Washington, D.C.; Columbus, Ga.; San Jose, Calif., New Orleans and Ft. Worth, among others.

Even full funding would not meet the needs of these and other cities, he said. "But, at the very least, the case for full funding of present authorization is compelling."

Davis also reiterated the AFL-CIO's firm opposition to any consolidation of aid programs into block grants on grounds it would set educators to competing for already inadequate funds and hamper the poorest school districts in getting money to meet their needs.

When the ESEA extension bill was before the House, Republicans and southern Democrats threatened to rewrite legislation on the floor to apply block grants all through the program.

The threat never materialized but the House committee's bill was amended to consolidate federal aid programs involving allotments for textbooks, library materials and other equipment into a single block grant to states.

Davis warned that the amendment by the House "subjects the entire program of educational innovation to unbearable pressures."

He explained, for example, that under the House bill it would be possible for a state to apply all of its grant toward buying textbooks and equipment for which there are powerful lobbies.

"There is no counter-lobby to press for the continuation of innovative programs," Davis said. "Funds needed for economically deprived children could be turned into a bonanza for publishers and equipment manufacturers."

In conclusion, he called upon the Senate to enact the four-year extension bill without substantial amendment, to keep all of the law's current programs intact and assure their full funding.

Labor Urges Steps to Meet Housing Crisis

In addition, Evans urged that the Federal Reserve Board be directed to purchase up to $5 billion in government-insured mortgages—thus freeing an additional amount for new home mortgages.

Evans charged that the accelerated tax depreciation loophole for real estate has forced up land costs by encouraging speculation.

"It should be ended forthwith except for low and moderate income rental housing," he urged. "Here, a tax break can direct the construction industry toward great national purpose."

Because of the limited supply of urban land, Evans said, the federal government should develop a national land reserve, with provisions for acquiring land and earmarking portions for low and moderate income housing similar to that in the urban renewal program.

"The best overall job of answering the needs of low income families is public housing," Evans said.

He praised provisions in an Administration bill to continue and improve the public housing program and urged that serious thought be given to public transportation subsidies to open up new areas for low-cost housing.

Evans told the subcommittee that volume production is the only means of bringing down the cost of housing.

He said that the AFL-CIO and its building trades unions "have readily accepted and adapted to hundreds of changes . . . aimed at faster, more economical methods."

There is, he said, no opposition on the part of AFL-CIO unions to innovations in the housing industry.

Bill Passed to Raise Government Pensions

The House by a vote of 358-48 passed and sent to the Senate a bill to strengthen the Civil Service retirement fund and to improve pension benefits.

The changes, if finally enacted, would give federal workers their first major benefit improvements in 13 years.

The bill has the support of unions representing a majority of federal government employes. It was passed after members of the House defeated three amendments to strike out liberalizing provisions, and a motion to recommit.

Rep. James J. Delaney (D-N.Y.) said the bill would improve the financing and funding practices of the Civil Service retirement system, maintain its soundness and assure that the necessary moneys are available when needed to pay the annuities of government retirees and survivors.

It would also, Delaney said, provide "needed improvements" in the retirement benefits.

Rep. Delbert L. Latta (R-Ohio) warned that "the retirement fund is in trouble" unless something is done. While federal employes have "fully met their share of the cost, the government has not met its obligation."

The bill, as introduced by Rep. Dominick V. Daniels (D-N.J.), would increase the contributions of the government and employes in the federal civil service from 6.5 percent to 7 percent effective next January. The rate for congressional employes would go to 7.5 percent, the same as that of members of Congress also covered by the retirement system.

The existing unfunded liability is to be eliminated over a 30-year period by federal payment of annual installments, beginning in 1971.

The proposed bill also would:

- Change the present payment formula base from the high five-year average to a high three-year average income.
- Eliminate the 15-year period on which to apply the average yearly rate for congressional employes.
- Recompense employes for unused sick leave by increasing the total actual work service credited to the employe by the calendar value of his unused sick leave time.
- Add 1 percent to all future automatic cost-of-living increases for retirees.

Latta told the House that "the Administration supports the bill" but Rep. H. R. Gross (R-Iowa) cited a Bureau of the Budget letter stating it would have to "seriously consider recommending" that the President veto the bill if it increases benefits.

House Votes to Expand School Lunch Program

ticipating require a reduced price lunch."

He estimated that it would take an appropriation of at least $225 million to serve adequate lunches to all of the needy children not presently covered by the program.

Rep. Michael A. Feighan (D-Ohio) pointed to hearings on the legislation that brought out these other statistics on the problem of malnutrition among America's school children:

More than 6,600 schools in economically needy areas are without food services; nearly 3 million "economically deprived" children go to school without an adequate breakfast; 750,000 children from families with incomes above $3,000 a year also are in need of food programs.

The bill had bipartisan support.

Rep. Albert H. Quie (R-Minn.) described the legislation as being "urgently needed." Rep. James H. Scheuer (D-N.Y.) said the $100 million appropriation is a "bare-bones start" in meeting a critical problem.

Rep. Dominick V. Daniels (D-N.J.) warned, "If today's children are hungry, tomorrow's America is the loser."

House Overrides Nixon on School Aid

Votes Hike Of $1 Billion In Key Bill

By David L. Perlman

The House rebelled against the Nixon Administration's bare-bones education budget and voted to add more than $1 billion extra in federal aid to schools—and school children.

It marked the first big step towards closing the huge gap between the broad-ranging aid to education programs Congress has enacted in recent years and the money appropriated to carry them out.

The Nixon budget provided $5 billion less for education programs than the school aid laws authorized and $375 million less than the Johnson Administration's budget.

The AFL-CIO played an active role in forming a coalition with education, community and religious groups and leading the fight for higher appropriations.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller told House members before the vote that "these increases are vitally needed if congressional promises to our nation's youth are to be fulfilled."

The appropriations actions were still tentative as the AFL-CIO went to press, since the House had not yet reached a final passage vote.

Here's how the floor battle shaped up:

The House Appropriations Committee boosted the Nixon budget request by $123 million.

There were strong indications that the House would, with little controversy, add additional funds for "impact" subsidies to schools attended by children of servicemen and civilian federal employes.

But this would have still left gravely under-financed the basic program of federal grants to provide better education for children in poverty neighborhoods, urgently needed vocational education, school libraries and guidance services, among others.

School aid supporters decided to make their stand behind a package amendment proposed by Rep. Charles S. Joelson (D-N.J.).

This provided $894.5 million more than the Appropriations Committee had recommended. It added $398 million to the impacted area schools, $180 million for poverty area education aid, $131.5 million more for vocational education and $40 million more for student loans, in addition to other increases.

But to get the Joelson amendment

'Law-and-Order' Shields Rightist Bid, Says Meany

CONGRESSIONAL ELECTION next year is "when the chips are really down" for the labor movement, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told delegates to the Seafarers convention in Washington.

Key Target Is Liberals In '70 Vote

By Eugene A. Kelly

Conservatives are using the "law-and-order" slogan as a smokescreen to defeat liberal candidates and capture control of Congress next year, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany warned.

So far as labor is concerned, Meany said in a speech to the Seafarers convention, the 1970 congressional election is "when the chips are really down."

Many of the 33 Senate seats to be filled are held by labor-supported senators with good records who will face "tremendous opposition" in the election.

The AFL-CIO president charged that "high-powered publicity people have converted the so-called law-and-order slogan into something that is antiliberal in every sense of the word."

The labor movement is "all in favor of law and order," Meany said. "We know that we need safe streets. We know that we need the security of people in their home."

Meany emphasized that "we have got to do something about the mounting crime rate." But he warned that the radical right is using the law-and-order slogan to attack "all those who have any liberal viewpoint."

Those who mouth the law-and-order slogan are also "talking against anything that is new . . . that is progressive . . . that is liberal."

The tactic has been "very effectively used in a few recent city campaigns, and we are con-

AFL-CIO Survey Shows:

State Legislatures' Record Falls Short of Labor Goals

By Duane Emme

Labor's scorecard in state legislatures across the nation added up to modest progress in some areas—too modest in the opinion of many AFL-CIO state federations.

The labor movement had more success, however, in resisting new anti-labor legislation and defeating attempts to cut back on social programs enacted in past years by more liberal legislatures.

With nearly all legislative sessions adjourned, an AFL-CIO News survey showed that only a small part of labor's program was enacted in legislatures that became generally more conservative as a result of the 1968 elections.

There were exceptions, of course. The New York State AFL-CIO said workers made "some important gains." Oregon labor said it achieved "more than expected." Hawaii, Idaho, Nevada, Maryland, and Louisiana federations reported more progress than in recent years.

Nineteen states improved workmen's compensation benefits and nearly as many raised unemployment benefits. But most of these improvements fell far short of what labor sought. Some of the boosts amounted to little more than cost of living adjustments.

At least six states made some improvements in minimum wage laws. Measures to require safer working conditions appeared to receive more emphasis than ever before but gains in this area were nominal. Civil rights laws were strengthened in a few states.

At least 10 states adopted measures to increase benefits granted to public employes. Five of them granted stronger bargaining rights. However, three states imposed greater restrictions on public employes' bargaining rights.

Iowa petitioned Congress to call a constitutional convention to rescind the U.S. Supreme Court's one-man, one-vote ruling. Labor is aligned with farm, religious and voter groups to dissuade Wisconsin lawmakers, still in session, from doing likewise.

It takes 34 petitioning states to secure such a convention and although 33 states have passed some sort of constitutional convention

Convention Call Urges Drive for Unmet Goals

Organized labor must move into the 1970s prepared to help the nation fulfill all of the unrealized goals of this decade, the AFL-CIO declared in its convention call mailed to all affiliated organizations.

Noting that the "aspirations of the '60s have not been fulfilled," the call stressed that the 1969 AFL-CIO convention will meet in a "time of trial for all America."

The federation's Eighth Constitutional Convention will begin on Thursday, Oct. 2, at the Traymore Hotel in Atlantic City, N.J. It will bring together delegates from 121 international and national unions, six trade departments, 51 state organizations (including Puerto Rico), and 764 local central bodies representing 13.6 million trade union members.

The call was signed by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland. (Text on Page 5.)

The call emphasized the importance of the 1970 elections and called for the election of progressive congressional and state candidates.

"Whether America chooses the road of progress or turns to the right and doubles back into the ruts of reaction," the call declared, "will depend upon our ability to get out the vote and elect progressive and liberal congressmen and senators."

The call noted that the AFL-CIO had helped elect liberal candidates

Senate Votes to Extend Surtax for Six Months

The Senate approved a compromise six-month extension of the 10 percent surtax—a move that was opposed by the AFL-CIO as easing the pressure for major tax justice reforms.

But the Senate voted down a Republican attempt to add on the other half of the Administration surtax proposal—an additional six-months extension, until June 30, 1970, at a 5 percent rate.

The House-passed surtax bill had included the extra six months. The Senate voted 51-48 to continue the surtax through December, then rejected an additional six months extension, 59-41. It then sent its bill back to the House by a 70-30 vote.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany wired all senators before the hastily-scheduled series of votes urging defeat of all the extension proposals.

Labor still "firmly" believes, he stressed, that the surtax "should only be continued when it is combined with immediate, substantial, equitable tax reform."

The surtax actually expired at the end of June, but Congress had continued the payroll withholding an additional month. The Senate in special 1969 congressional elections in Tennessee, Wisconsin and Montana.

AFL-CIO Call To Convention Keyed to Goals

"We must make this trend carry over into next year's crucial elections," the call observed.

The call outlined legislative victories that have been won since the last convention despite the "revived conservative coalition in the 90th Congress."

Victories in 1968 which indicated that this coalition "had been unable to completely halt the march of progress" were listed.

But, the call cautioned, "our warning in 1967 that America is seriously beset with problems, remains valid. Worse, the problems are essentially the same now as then."

The call then outlines the basic needs of the 1970s which require immediate and positive legislation.

They include a $2 minimum wage; a massive new jobs program in the public sector; expanded and fully funded educational programs to insure educational opportunity for all youth; 26 million new dwelling units by 1978; low interest and mortgage rates for low and moderate income earners; urban health care centers and hospitals as well as rural health services; a 50 percent increase in all social security benefits and a minimum monthly payment of $100; uniform, adequate unemployment compensation; expanded workmen's compensation with minimum federal standards for injured and disabled workers; a welfare program based on need; and adequate public transportation systems in the cities.

Noting that AFL-CIO affiliated unions will be negotiating contracts covering 7 million workers during the 18-month period following the convention, the call said:

"Much will be said—much already is being said—about the so-called wage-price spiral. But the facts show current inflation is interest rate-fed and profit-fueled.

Turning to the record of the present Administration, the call said:

"It promised an end to inflation; to achieve tax reform; to improve and liberalize health, education and welfare programs; to vigorously enforce civil rights laws; to cure the urban crisis and achieve peace.

"None of these promises have been realized."

CSA Staffer Bob Rosekrans Dies at 60

Robert A. Rosekrans, long active in the community services of the AFL and AFL-CIO, died following surgery for a gall bladder condition. He was 60.

Rosekrans was assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services at the time of his death. He entered the labor movement's community services as chairman of the New York chapter of the Servicemen's Temporary Lodging during World War II. He also was a member of the AFL's New York War Labor Fund Committee.

Before his appointment to the Community Services staff, he was associate director of the Labor Participation Dept. of the United Community Funds & Councils of America.

Rosekrans was a board member of the American Social Health Association and National Council on Alcoholism. He also served on committees of the American Heart Association, American Cancer Society and the National Social Welfare Assembly.

DELEGATES ARE WELCOMED to the 14th convention of the Seafarers by SIU Pres. Paul Hall as they prepared to tackle a far-reaching agenda on the affairs affecting 85,000 SIU members.

Seafarers Cite Rights Of U. S. Fishing Fleet

The Seafarers urged the State Dept. not to submit to "blackmail" in negotiating with Latin American nations over the illegal seizures of American fishing boats.

SIU Vice Presidents Frank Drozak and Steve Eddy reported to the SIU's 14th convention on their meeting with State Dept. officials in connection with talks now under way in Buenos Aires with representatives of Ecuador, Peru and Chile about disputed waters.

The American delegation should be concerned, the union said in a statement, solely with "resolving the problems caused by the denial to American fishermen of their rights on the high seas. We oppose any discussions on Latin American requests to reduce U.S. tariffs on tuna fish shipments or requirements for packing and marketing bonita."

Delegates from the SIU's Cannery Workers & Fishermen's Union told the convention that 128 West Coast tuna vessels have been illegally seized by Latin nations at sea since 1951.

"The seizure of American vessels," they said, "has become a most profitable business for these countries. Fines, fishing license fees and other illegally imposed tariffs amounting to $1.6 million have been paid by American fishermen and the U.S. government to Latin countries to secure the release of our fishermen and their vessels."

A former U.S. tugboat, on loan to the Peruvian government by the United States, shot and wounded a U.S. captain and first mate, the delegates reported. Peruvian Air Force planes, many of them jets given to Peru under the foreign aid program, are used to locate American boats in international waters, they said.

The three countries have been enforcing a claim to exclusive fishing rights for their own ships in waters within 200 miles of their own coasts. The United States and most other nations recognize a 12-mile zone.

After SIU Pres. Paul Hall opened the convention, the 300 delegates tackled an agenda including the future of the American merchant fleet, the need to close tax loopholes that encourage runaway-flag operations, the promotion of increased traffic on the nation's inland waterways, and other problems affecting the SIU and its 85,000 members in 30 affiliated unions.

At the opening session, House Speaker John W. McCormack (D-Mass.) pledged his support for the SIU's goal of an independent Maritime Administration, and the enactment of legislation designed to revive the fast-vanishing American merchant marine.

Rep. Gerald R. Ford (R-Mich.), House minority leader, said the Nixon Administration's maritime program will be ready for action by Congress in the fall.

"I can assure you of this," Ford said. "The Maritime Administration has no intention of proposing that U.S. merchant ships be built in foreign yards." Ford also advocated building ships in series of 10 or 15, instead of one at a time, to reduce the cost "by roughly $1 million per ship."

The union's Staff Officers Association sent a fact-finding team to Europe last year and found most other countries had superior medical care for shipboard workers. Eight of every nine U.S. vessels, they found, do not provide adequate care for crew members.

Great Lakes delegates reported that the U.S. Public Health Service closed its Detroit hospital April 2—the last such hospital for lake seamen—and now pays almost three times as much for care of maritime workers in private hospitals.

Labor Backs Program:

Foreign Aid Held Vital to Freedom

The nation's foreign aid program must be continued and expanded if America is to further its "humanitarian goals" for the world—and protect its own interests, the AFL-CIO told Congress.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller emphasized the importance of foreign aid and reported on labor's role in helping underdeveloped nations in testimony before the House Foreign Affairs Committee.

He expressed the AFL-CIO's general support of the Administration's foreign assistance bill which would authorize more than $2.2 billion in fiscal 1970 for development loans, technical assistance and other economic aid.

Biemiller said that the goals of U.S. foreign aid "and the costs of our program in terms of sacrifice reflect great credit upon the American people."

"The continuing presence of these goals—peace, freedom and securing social justice—urge us to continue to make the sacrifices this program requires," he added.

He submitted the AFL-CIO Executive Council's statement of last February which urged that expansion of foreign aid is "essential" if the United States is to advance its own economic growth and check the spread of communism.

Past economic assistance, it emphasized, has helped create areas of economic progress that otherwise "would today be pockets of political chaos and pawns in the hands of aggressors bent on world domination."

The statement noted that the United States is now providing a smaller percentage of its national income for economic aid to other nations—than the average for 16 other leading industrial nations.

Biemiller observed with satisfaction that the current bill provides for continuation of foreign aid to democratic institutions and social projects, such as those being carried out by unions.

He described the work being done, with foreign aid help by the American Institute for Free Labor Development, the African-American Labor Center and the Asian-American Free Labor Institute.

AIFLD, he noted, has strengthened democratic unions in the nine years of its existence and has helped develop social projects, cooperatives, credit unions, medical units, schools and community organizations throughout Latin America.

The African program, he pointed out, started in 1965 with a vocational training program in Kenya, branched off into human resource development and now operates in 28 countries.

As for the Asian institute, Biemiller said, it has made great strides in training workers and developing social projects since it was incorporated as a non-profit organization in January 1968.

In Viet Nam, "where our program must have a double priority," the institute has expended thousands of dollars on relief of unionists and their families affected by the war, Biemiller reported.

Settlements End Boycotts Of 3 Firms

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has notified all affiliates that labor-supported consumer boycotts against the products of three companies had been terminated after the successful conclusion of strikes.

The companies are Shell Oil and Shell Chemical companies, Coleman Co., Inc., and Neuhoff Meat Packing Co.

"In all cases," Meany wrote, "the AFL-CIO affiliate has been successful. Therefore, the national boycott against products manufactured or processed by these companies, instituted by the unions involved and officially endorsed and supported by the AFL-CIO is over.

"In each case," he continued, "the boycott provided concrete help to the strikers. Now that the strikes have been won, your members should be informed of the fact that these products are being manufactured and processed under satisfactory union conditions."

Meany noted that the unions involved had asked that he convey their appreciation to all affiliated officers and members for "this display of unity and full-scale cooperation." Meany added his personal thanks for "their efforts on behalf of their fellow workers."

Meany Warns of Rightist Motives Behind 'Law-and-Order' Slogans

cerned about this," the federation president said.

"The conservative groups, the John Birchers, the so called right-wing forces, would like to take control." He added: "And the place they would like to take control is in the Senate of the United States under you-know-who-I-mean."

In the House "we have a similar picture," Meany said. "We have at least 30 of our most liberal members—all with good voting records. All support the AFL-CIO in its liberal, progressive program, and all were elected in 1968 by less than 55 percent of the vote" in their district.

Praising COPE Dir. Al Barkan and his staff, Meany told the convention "we did a tremendous job in 1968, even though the party of our presidential candidate was woefully ineffective and torn asunder by internal strife. But it is no guarantee that because we did well in 1968, we are going to do well in 1970."

He warned that labor could be hurt badly in 1970 "if we lost a few friends in the Senate and a few more in the House."

On Capitol Hill while the legislative situation is not favorable, he said, "we still think that we can make progress despite the fact that we have an Administration that is not oriented, or not sympathetic" to labor's needs.

As to inflation, Meany said "we are told that the basis for it is the high-wage structure." Research studies show "something different—the profit-price push, the tremendous profits made by these great corporations, is the basic cause of inflation."

Among other problems he listed slum conditions, tax favoritism for the rich, housing prices that make it difficult for even a family making $20,000 a year to buy its own home.

The basis for the cost crisis, Meany declared, is not high wages which are "a very, very small part of the real problem."

The key factor, he said, "is the money rates, the high interest rates. . . . We need reasonable rates of interest and we can't measure our progress by magnificent office buildings, by wonderful hotels" and roads.

"We have got to measure our progress by the yardstick of human values, and there is nothing greater in that yardstick than a person's home," he declared.

The housing needs of the country, he said, "cannot be met under present conditions, even with a 'whiz kid' like George Romney" in charge of federal housing.

Meany called for improvement also in the unemployment insurance system by means of "federal standards that we are now pressing the Congress to enact." He urged a 50 percent increase in social security benefits. As badly as things look, Meany said, "they could get worse unless we prepare this year, 1969, to do our job in the elections of 1970."

NLRB Examiner Upholds Union Claim:

United Aircraft Machinists Due Backpay, Reinstatement

An estimated 2,500 members of the Machinists who struck five Connecticut plants of United Aircraft Corp. nine years ago are entitled to reinstatement and backpay, a National Labor Relations Board examiner has ruled.

Union attorneys said the total amount due could exceed $15 million.

NLRB Trial Examiner Lee J. Best ruled after a mammoth five-year hearing that United Aircraft was guilty of unfair labor practices when it refused prompt reinstatement to union members in violation of a strike settlement agreement and filled their jobs with promotions and transfers of nonstrikers and hiring of new employes.

Union attorney Mozart G. Ratner and IAM Counsel Plato E. Papps cautioned that it will almost certainly be some time before the issue is finally resolved. The company will ask the NLRB to overrule the examiner's decision—and the union will ask the NLRB to strengthen it by acting on related unfair labor practice complaints that the examiner dismissed. Then the question of enforcement of the NLRB decision will undoubtedly be fought in the courts.

The issue involves United Aircraft's treatment of IAM members during and after a five-week strike and a settlement agreement in effect from Aug. 11, 1960 through Dec. 31, 1960.

Between 1963 and 1968, 363 days of testimony were heard by the NLRB examiner. Appeals to the labor board over procedural issues lengthened the hearings to the five-year period. There have also been related court actions.

Best ruled that United broke the law at its Pratt & Whitney and Hamilton Standard locations by illegally depriving IAM strikers of their reinstatement and recall rights after the 1960 strike as follows:

- By transferring and promoting other employes . . . to the jobs of strikers who had registered for reinstatement under terms of the strike settlement agreements.
- By terminating the employment of strikers after Jan. 1, 1961, unilaterally changing their right to reinstatement, seniority and other conditions of employment by treating them as new applicants for employment and by hiring new employes to fill their pre-strike positions.

The examiner further ruled that United violated the labor law during the strike by "threats of economic reprisal for engaging in union activities . . . interrogation creating the impression of surveillance of their union sympathies . . . and offers of benefit conditioned upon their ceasing to engage in union activity."

Besides ordering United to stop its unfair labor practices, Best directed the company to offer registered strikers, according to seniority, all positions filled prior to May 1, 1961, discharging if necessary the present occupants, and to make each of the strikers whole for any earnings loss.

The examiner cited company records showing that the employment of 853 registered strikers at Pratt & Whitney and 844 at Hamilton Standard was terminated as of Dec. 31, 1960, when the strike settlement agreement expired. These employes are entitled to reinstatement with backpay, the examiner ruled.

Company records also showed that from Aug. 11 through Dec. 31, 1960, some 1,056 employes at Pratt & Whitney plants and 396 at Hamilton Standard were promoted or transferred to positions which 1,524 strikers were waiting to fill. All strikers who were blocked from available jobs by such transfers and promotions are entitled to reinstatement with backpay.

The trial examiner dismissed charges by the union that United refused to furnish employe address lists, refused to permit stewards to represent employes in processing some grievances, refused to submit many types of grievances to arbitration, concealed information on operation of its merit rating system, and sued the union for millions of dollars in damages to force the union to abandon its charges.

The strike started, the IAM said, over the union's inability to get the information it needed to represent its members in collective bargaining and grievance processing.

BUDDY TRAINING conference of the AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute was held recently at Loyola University in New Orleans. Hattie Carter, center, of HRDI's manpower staff, briefs two participants in the two-day training program. Representatives from the Steelworkers, Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers and the Clothing Workers attended the sessions. The HRDI Buddy program recruits co-workers on a volunteer basis to help new employes—many who were formerly hard-core unemployed—to get through their probationary period.

New Step in Steel Pact Raises Pensions, Wages

Pittsburgh—A 30-percent increase in pension benefits, and wage hikes of 12 to 21.3 cents an hour are among the improvements that went into effect Aug. 1 for 400,000 members of the Steelworkers in the basic steel industry.

The new round of benefits starts the second year of the three-year agreement negotiated in 1968 by the USWA with 11 major steel firms.

Other benefits went into effect a year ago and on Jan. 1, 1969. Additional improvements will become effective Aug. 1, 1970.

USWA Pres. I. W. Abel said the contract provisions are "part of the largest and best settlement ever negotiated by the union with the industry" and will "provide our basic steel members with some of the outstanding contract provisions" in the country.

Abel said that besides the wage and pension gains, the contract provides a pension for a surviving spouse of all USWA members covered by the 1968 settlement.

Another provision effective Aug. 1 calls for a program to protect the earnings of workers whose jobs are affected by changes in technology. The agreement establishes a joint union-industry committee to develop a program costing up to 2 cents per hour, with payments due to start Oct. 1.

Abel said he expects the earnings protection program to provide a major breakthrough in easing the impact of automation on union members. Its details will be announced soon, he said.

The pension raise is from the previous $5 a month per year of service to $6.50, an increase of 30 percent. The new minimum pension for those retiring with 35 years of service is $227.50 a month, plus social security benefits, the union said.

Wages Boosted 6.1% In Union-Won Contracts

Unions negotiated contracts with wage increases averaging 6.1 percent a year for more than 1 million members in the first half of 1969, the Labor Dept. announced.

Adding 1.1 percent for pensions and other "fringe" benefits, the department put the value of settlements at 7.2 percent a year on the basis of a Bureau of Labor Statistics study.

Labor Sec. George P. Shultz, questioned at a press conference about the settlements, did not claim the average increase was too high. But he said both labor and management should take note that the economic climate will be "different" a year or two from now.

Employers may find themselves in a profit squeeze or some other difficulty if they ignore the Administration's anti-inflation policy and negotiate increases they may not be able to pass along in future price increases, Shultz said.

"We have a policy on the control of inflation, and that policy will work," he said. "We reiterate to people who are bargaining, on one, two or three-year contracts, they ought to take the policy seriously."

The future will be "different," Shultz declared, because the rate of inflation will be less than it is now. From the union viewpoint, "it is possible to price labor out of the market, too," he said.

BLS released preliminary estimates of the value of key settlements negotiated by unions with employers of 5,000 or more workers. The settlements included those made this year in construction, transportation, lumber, metalworking, apparel and petroleum.

Considering wage rates separately from benefits, annual increases during the entire life of the contract averaged 6.1 percent of straight-time hourly earnings, compared with 5.2 percent for the full year 1968 and 5.5 percent for the first half of last year.

In manufacturing industries, the median increase was 5.5 percent, compared with 4.9 percent in 1968 and 5.1 percent for the first half of that year.

In nonmanufacturing enterprises, large wage gains in the construction and transportation industries raised the median annual rate of increase to 8.4 percent from 5.9 percent in 1968.

BLS said the reported settlements featured a first-year wage hike of 7.4 percent, compared with 7.2 percent of straight-time hourly earnings for all of 1968. In manufacturing industries alone, first-year raises averaged 6.6 percent, and in nonmanufacturing, 10.1 percent, largely because of construction settlements averaging 15 percent a year.

BLS said that, if construction settlements were excluded, the first-year wage rate increase would drop to 7 percent for all industries.

For wage changes averaged over the life of the agreement, the all-industries median would drop to 6 percent, and for nonmanufacturing alone to 7.1 percent.

The 1969 averages for nonmanufacturing occupations, excluding construction, were substantially higher than those reported for 1968.

Freeman Renamed To Handicap Unit

Gordon M. Freeman, president-emeritus of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, has been reappointed by Pres. Nixon as a vice chairman of the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped.

Established in 1947, the committee promotes employment opportunities for the physically and mentally handicapped. It has drawn strong support from labor through the years. Freeman was first appointed a vice chairman by Pres. Eisenhower in 1956.

Harold Russell was previously reappointed as committee chairman.

Backpay, Overtime Wages Ordered For Grape Packers in California

San Francisco—California table grape growers must give backpay and overtime due since 1963 under the state minimum wage law to several thousand packing shed workers, Superior Court Judge Joseph Karesh ruled here.

The decision crowned a long legal fight on behalf of the workers by the California AFL-CIO and State Attorney Gen. Thomas C. Lynch, who successfully fought the growers' claim of a three-year statute of limitations on payment of the wages due the packers.

Sec.-Treas. Thomas L. Pitts of the state AFL-CIO said the court's ruling upholds the workers' right to the overtime pay and wage differentials due them since Aug. 30, 1963. The state Industrial Welfare Commission raised the wage minimum from $1 to $1.25 an hour on that date and to $1.30 a year later.

"It is now the division's duty to seek contempt of court actions promptly against any growers who try to flout or evade the law," Pitts said.

The court ruling blocked a maneuver by the California Grape & Tree Fruit League to escape the consequences of a stipulation it agreed to in September 1963. League representatives agreed in writing to retroactive payment of the wage and overtime orders if the courts ultimately upheld them.

But early this year the league's executive officer advised members that "a three-year statute of limitations applies and . . . there is no duty to pay back wages for the years 1963, 1964, and 1965 nor for January 1966."

Judge Karesh rejected this argument and upheld the attorney general's contrary position. He ordered the league and growers Castiglione Brothers, P. J. Divizich Fruit Corp., Grimm Orchards Co., Nelson Roper and Airdrome Orchards to take these actions:

- Pay all those employed by them since Aug. 30, 1963, any differential due between the wages actually paid and those that should have been paid, plus interest.
- Pay the amounts due to the State Division of Industrial Welfare if the worker cannot be located. Such amounts shall be held in a special deposit fund in the state treasury until claimed.

The principal beneficiaries of the court's ruling will be thousands of employes who work seasonally in packing shed operations on and off the farm, Pitts said.

Many such workers are entitled to retroactive pay of 25 cents an hour from Aug. 30, 1963 to Aug. 30, 1964, and 30 cents an hour from the latter date to Feb. 1, 1966, when the federal minimum wage was raised to $1.40.

The state's wage orders fixed overtime pay at time-and-one-half for all hours worked in excess of eight, and up to and including 12 hours in any one day, and for the first eight hours' work on the seventh consecutive day of work and each day after that until the employe gets 24 hours off.

Affected employes are entitled under the orders to twice their regular rate of pay for hours worked in excess of 12 on any one day, and in excess of eight on the seventh day.

The victory was the third for the California AFL-CIO on behalf of farm workers. State Appeals Court judges upheld new and higher minimum wages for 100,000 women and children on farms last November. In February, Superior Court Judge W. A. O'Brien restrained Gov. Ronald Reagan and other state officials from violating a state law against use of convict labor to harvest California farm products.

Losing the Race

THE CURRENT inflationary surge, triggered by a drive for higher and higher profits and fueled by a capital goods boom and highest-in-history interest rates, is taking its toll of the average worker's weekly pay check.

Despite wage increases contained in contracts negotiated in the first half of 1969, the worker is losing ground in terms of purchasing power. The Bureau of Labor Statistics in the Department of Labor, which produced the study showing a 6.1 percent average gain in wages negotiated in the first half of the year, produced also the figures showing spendable earnings lagging behind a year ago.

Earlier in 1969 the average worker's real purchasing power was running lower than in 1965, and in the past few months has shown only small gains.

With the Consumer Price Index at mid-year running 5.5 percent higher than a year ago, workers and their families are having an increasingly difficult time staying even—and as the figures show are slipping behind in terms of real spendable dollars.

The Administration's tight money, high interest rate policies are feeding the rise in costs all along the line. The rates should be rolled back before further damage is done.

The capital goods boom can be slowed, removing one of the major inflationary factors. And a good long look must be taken at physicians' fees and other items in the services sector of the CPI that has for a number of years now been pacing the upward trend in living costs.

Policies that eat away at the basic purchasing power of the American worker can only bring on an economic downturn that will engulf the entire nation.

Standoff in the States

THE CONSERVATIVE GAINS in the 1968 election in the state legislatures paid off as expected in the 1969 sessions with little if any progress on economic and social welfare programs.

The AFL-CIO News' survey of the state legislative sessions discloses some moderate progress in a few areas in a few states. But overall, when the losing battles on tax legislation and other issues are taken into account, the result was no perceptible gain.

It is against this background that the Nixon Administration's proposals for improvement of unemployment compensation and other programs must be measured. Most of the Administration proposals put primary emphasis on state action rather than a federal initiative and federal standards.

The failure of the states in past years to act on critical problems has led to federal initiatives. There is no reason to believe on the basis of the record in 1969 that the states are either politically or economically capable of handling these problems.

Federal programs and federal standards coupled with stepped-up and more effective political action at the state level are the answers to the state legislative record.

A Word Edgewise:

Campus 'Revolutionaries' Only Trivial Minority of a Minority

By John P. Roche

A SPECTRE seems to be haunting Congress and various state legislative bodies. Everywhere one turns, he finds some investigating committee busy tracking down the subversive influence of Students for a Democratic Society.

Without for a moment underrating the nuisance power of SDS, particularly on the nation's campuses, it is simply absurd to react as though the United States were confronted by a massive Viet Cong preparing a Tet offensive. Despite all the noise, we live in one of the most resilient, durable societies in the history of mankind. There are a few inches of topsoil that blow around, but then you hit rock.

A real problem is created by the fact that, for very sensible reasons, most Americans haven't the foggiest interest in the wild sectarian squabbles that energize the extremists. Thus when someone announces that we are dealing with a sinister conspiracy, funded by Moscow, Havana or Peking, and demonstrates by use of SDS pamphlets that a plot is afoot to overthrow the Republic, the average citizen is a bit startled.

If he were told that some kids with water pistols were conspiring to rob the mint, he would laugh it off. But in this area he has no sense of perspective; after all, he is told, Lenin seized power in Russia with only a handful of Communists.

Now I am sure that any dues-paying member of SDS (an estimated 6,000) would be delighted to overthrow the government of the United States. And there are perhaps another 50,000 fellow travelers who cheat SDS out of dues but share its goals.

Before we double the FBI's budget, however, let us recall that there are today more than 6.5 million college students in this country, most of whom are busy at school work, and roughly another 10 million in the age group who are not in college. Political activists in any generation are a small minority, and SDS is a trivial minority of the politically active.

What happened at the recent SDS convention in Chicago provides an interesting commentary on the theory that we are dealing with a monolithic conspiracy. (I'm sure that if Lenin had been at Chicago, he would have retired from politics in despair.)

For openers, it should be noted that the press coverage was appalling. While a number of journalists had a good deal of cloying sympathy for these young people "doing their own thing," they simply did not understand what was going on. For this I don't blame them—the convention did in some ways resemble three-dimensional chess, but they then had to fill space with uncomprehending analyses.

The standard story went roughly as follows: there were two factions, one, the "moderate" National Office group, and the other the "extremist" Progressive Labor/Worker-Student Alliance, a vigorous, disciplined band of well-shaven, neatly dressed Maoists. The "moderates" (including the Black Panthers), faced by Communist totalitarianism, split the group to prevent an "extremist" takeover.

There are several things wrong with this. In the first place, virtually all hands claimed to be Maoists. The National Office group had a testimonial to its ideological purity from Anna Louise Strong, who has been Mao's leading American worshipper for a good 40 years.

MORE IMPORTANT, the difference between the National Office faction and Progressive Labor was not that the former were "moderates" while the others were extremists. They were all extremists, but Progressive Labor was disciplined. As a friend who was there wrote, the press was hard on Progressive Labor because the National Office group "glorifies individualism, anarchism, sex-on-the-streets, drugs and all the un-Marxist things which fascinate alienated middle-class reporters."

Curiously then, the disciplined PL faction offers hope to those of us who are concerned about the young human beings involved, and do not lie awake nights worrying about revolutions.

In the words of the same private communication, "PL salvages large numbers of young people from the really extraordinary degradation . . . of extreme individualism, dope-worship, and irrationalism . . . it operates as a kind of Salvation Army of the New Left—many PL converts speak quite frankly of how PL's emphasis on discipline, responsibility and hard work 'saved' them."

We shall continue to have problems with alienated youth, but let's stop the hysterics. The prerequisite for dealing sensibly with disruptions is to understand that we are dealing with a psychiatric blow-up, not a political conspiracy.

AFL-CIO Call to 8th Constitutional Convention

Following is the text of the AFL-CIO call to its Eighth Constitutional Convention mailed to all affiliates.

Two years ago, this convention met in a "time of trial for all America."

It was true then and it is even more so now. The intervening years have not brought an end to the trials of America.

The trial of democracy and freedom continues in Viet Nam.

The trial of Western Hemisphere solidarity has intensified.

The trial of Communist encroachment continues to disrupt the international community.

America is first in space after achieving the phenomenal feat of putting a man on the moon. Each citizen shares the pride of this extraordinary achievement.

But if the trial of a moon landing has ended, the domestic trials facing this nation have not.

Two years ago, this convention had high praise for the legislative record of the 89th Congress. But we warned of the obstinacy of the conservative-bent 90th Congress.

However accurate our assessment of the state of the union was in 1967, we were not prepared for the events of 1968. Nor was America as a whole.

The President of the United States, in order to isolate the cause of peace in Viet Nam from personal and partisan politics, withdrew from the presidential campaign. Thus the President, who had the greatest social welfare and civil rights legislative record in the history of the nation, sacrificed his political career in the name of peace.

Only a few days later, a great American black leader, Martin Luther King, Jr., was senselessly slain. Two months later, that American tragedy was compounded by the brutal murder of Sen. Robert F. Kennedy.

This double tragedy, the rioting and violent reaction in American cities across the land, the increase in violence and crime which America experienced in 1968, was not confined to this nation. Civil wars, guerrilla raids, violent demonstrations and militant civil disruptions occurred in a score of countries in that year.

The route Americans would choose to travel in the following months was an open question. The 1968 election, vital to the nation's future course, was deeply affected by the year's record of chaos.

The emergence of a third party blatantly trading on the fears and uncertainties of the times, and overtly exploiting racial bigotry and prejudice, added to the turmoil.

As "law and order" became the watchwords of the right wing and some conservatives, rational men responded with appeals to reason.

We in the AFL-CIO noted that ". . . law and order, alone, without regard for justice, can be corrupted into a pretext for tyranny."

The AFL-CIO position was simple. We said: "Let there be law and order in the cities, but not by creation of a garrison state.

"Let there be law and order in the enforcement of civil rights statutes and the application of other social welfare legislation. Let those who cry for more police in the slums cry also for more jobs, more housing and more schools for the prisoners of slums.

"Those, too, are tools of law and order. . . ."

Union men and women the nation over responded affirmatively to this call to reason. While Vice Pres. Hubert Humphrey narrowly lost the presidential election, by just six-tenths of a percentage point, demagoguery and racism were rejected.

The House of Representatives remained essentially unchanged in the balance of liberals and conservatives. In the Senate, with but a few exceptions, new Republican senators are moderate or relatively liberal.

The conservative forces did not achieve the landslide victory they had predicted. But the bold new legislation and the funding of existing programs which America desperately needs had been slowed down.

On the legislative front the revived conservative coalition in the 90th Congress had been unable to completely halt the march of progress. During 1968 the liberal forces passed:

- A major civil rights law with strong "fair housing" provisions.
- A far-reaching $5.3 billion housing bill with new programs to help low and moderate income families get decent homes.
- Four major consumer protection laws—truth-in-lending, meat inspection, poultry inspection, and a new commission on product safety.

But our warning in 1967 that America is seriously beset with problems, remains valid. Worse, the problems are essentially the same now as then.

As this nation prepares to move into the decade of the Seventies its basic needs, requiring positive legislative action, are great and growing.

Those needs include:

- A $2 minimum wage to provide all workers with an income above the poverty level.
- A massive new jobs program in the public sector to eliminate hard core unemployment.
- Expanded and fully funded educational programs that will provide scholarships, classrooms, dormitories, libraries, laboratories and decent salary levels for teachers in order to insure educational opportunity for all youth, regardless of race, color, creed, national origin or family income.
- 26 million new dwelling units by 1978.
- Low interest and mortgage rates that will permit low and moderate income earners to pay for the housing they need and want.
- Urban health care centers and hospitals as well as rural area construction and health services.
- A 50 percent increase in all social security benefits paid and a minimum monthly benefit of $100.
- Unemployment compensation that is uniform and adequate both as to benefits and coverage.
- Expanded workmen's compensation with minimum federal standards for injured and disabled workers.
- A welfare program for those who cannot work that is based solely on need and which will provide a decent standard of living.
- Public transportation systems in our cities which will be accessible, swift and inexpensive.

In addition, America's unions have their own needs as we stand at the crossroads of the '70s.

Unionism, as a secure and democratic institution, needs repeal of Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Farm workers need the right to free collective bargaining under the National Labor Relations Act.

Thousands of state, county and municipal workers need to be removed from the whims of the ancient political spoils systems of local politicians and given the right of union recognition and collective bargaining.

Workers across the land need new and improved occupational safety laws.

Building tradesmen need situs picketing rights.

Each of us needs to prepare to withstand a major attack on the basic rights of labor by reactionary employer groups, that awaits only a small shift in the political balance and a legislative opportunity.

Finally, all of the affiliates of the AFL-CIO need to stand shoulder-to-shoulder with those unions that will bear the brunt of contract negotiations, covering 7 million workers, during the next 18 months.

Much will be said—much already is being said—about the so-called wage-price spiral. But the facts show current inflation is interest rate-fed and profit-fueled.

The average American worker is caught in a price-profit squeeze. Between 1960 and 1968, his after-tax weekly take-home pay increased only 31 percent. His purchasing power increased merely 11 percent.

Total after-tax corporate profits in the same period skyrocketed 91 percent.

And dividend payments to stockholders soared 84 percent.

The current dangerous imbalances in the nation's economy are clearly due to long-range federal income tax inequities, exorbitant interest rates and a disproportionate share of income being shifted from wages and salaries to profits through higher prices.

The way to curb inflation without recession is to roll back interest rates and curb profits.

Confronting us also at the crossroads of the '70s are next year's congressional and state elections. Whether America chooses the road of progress or turns to the right and doubles back into the ruts of reaction, will depend upon our ability to get out the vote and elect progressive and liberal congressmen and senators.

We must elect like-minded governors and state legislators, too.

We helped elect liberal candidates in Tennessee, Wisconsin, and Montana in special congressional elections this year. We must make this trend carry over into next year's crucial elections.

At the crossroads, we in labor must be prepared to take the lead. The aspirations of the '60s have not been fulfilled.

It may be too early to tell the course the present Administration is prepared to take in the '70s.

It promised an end to inflation; to achieve tax reform; to improve and liberalize health, education and welfare programs; to vigorously enforce civil rights laws; to cure the urban crisis and achieve an honorable peace.

None of these promises has been realized.

As we convene in national convention, let us resolve to move ahead and make progress in the '70s.

Let us reflect on the tragedies of the past two years and pay tribute to those Americans who have given their lives in service to brotherhood, justice and freedom, and to the men in the armed services who valiantly have borne the largest burden and the greatest sacrifices in the service of their country.

Finally, let us pay tribute to those who have served the labor movement in other times of great stress. Their long and able service helped make this movement strong enough to meet the challenges we face, as we call this Eighth Constitutional Convention of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations.

In Medical Care Crisis:

Hill-Burton Improvements Stressed

BROADER AND RE-DIRECTED priorities of the Hill-Burton Act are needed to help meet the health and medical care crisis of the inner cities as well as the nation at-large, an AFL-CIO legislative representative suggests.

The 23-year-old law has done a good job in aiding hospital and medical facility construction, largely in rural areas, said Clinton Fair, who noted that the federation supports continuation of such aid where it is still needed.

But, he added, "on the whole," the program has overcome the "tremendous lack in . . . rural neighborhoods," and emphasis should now shift to the creation of medical and health care delivery systems in the inner-city neighborhoods.

Fair appeared on Labor News Conference, an AFL-CIO-produced public affairs program.

Fair praised the approach of the Hill-Burton extension bill introduced by Sen. Ralph Yarborough (D-Tex.). He said the Yarborough bill, rather than the measure passed recently by the House of Representatives, meets the real and growing needs of today. The House-passed bill restricts federal assistance for the establishment of neighborhood clinics to hospitals, while Yarborough's bill would authorize aid to group practice and other non-hospital groups, Fair said.

LIMITING ASSISTANCE to hospitals, he pointed out, "means that a doctor who is on the staff of the hospital and has a private practice is now being urged to apply for aid to build a neighborhood health center which may very well compete with his practice." He said: "We feel that money should be allowed to go to groups that are ready to establish their own facility, the same as it goes to a hospital."

He stressed that pre-paid group practice in neighborhood clinics can help reduce both the demand of hospitals and the cost of illnesses, by treatment of diseases and conditions before hospitalization becomes necessary.

Reporters questioning Fair were Eve Edstrom of the Washington Post and Harry Conn of Press Associates, Inc.

BROADER PRIORITIES and re-directed emphasis are essential for the Hill-Burton Act to help meet the medical and health crisis of the inner cities and the nation at-large, AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Clinton Fair, center, declared on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Eve Edstrom of the Washington Post, left, and Harry Conn of Press Associates, Inc. The public service interview is heard Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EDT, on Mutual radio.

BOYCOTT APPEAL of the striking and locked out Los Angeles Herald-Examiner workers is being carried by more than 100 Rapid Transit buses in the southern California area. This is part of a major advertising campaign by the unions of the Herald-Examiner Joint Strike-Lockout Council.

Mental Health Program Extension Termed Vital

Continuation and strengthening of a Community Mental Health Centers program is essential to helping lift "the heavy burden of mental illness from millions of Americans," the AFL-CIO told Congress.

Testimony to a Senate Labor & Public Welfare subcommittee was delivered by Legislative Rep. Clinton Fair on behalf of Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller. Appearing with Fair was AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman.

The federation strongly urged passage of a bill by Sen. Ralph W. Yarborough (D-Tex.) which would extend the 1963 Community Men- [illegible] is scheduled to expire in 1970.

One of the provisions of Yarborough's amendments increases the share of federal funding for construction and staffing of centers in rural and urban poverty areas. The bill would permit 100 percent federal financing up to $50,000 per service area, for initiation and development of programs for community mental health service.

Other provisions extend and increase authorizations for construction and staffing of centers, permit staffing grants for up to 10 years, allow land costs in construction grants and remove restrictions on staff grants to "professional and technical" personnel.

Noting that it had supported the mental centers program "since it was first proposed," the AFL-CIO cited figures to show that the pro- [illegible] of expensive hospitalization for mental patients.

At the same time, the federation stressed the need for expanding the program, declaring:

"The mentally ill still occupy 40 percent of the nation's hospital beds; at least 60,000 Americans are drug addicts; and an additional hundreds of thousands misuse the drugs.

"A third of the population suffers symptoms of depression and more than 5 million persons are unable to control their use of alchohol.

"Fewer than 5 percent of America's children with emotional disturbance and mental illness of varying intensities receive the treatment they need."

Extending the program for five more years and authorizing $975 million for this period—$595 million for construction and $380 million for staffing—"is a modest effort when measured against the problem's dimensions," the AFL-CIO added.

Its statement emphasized that labor "has a direct interest in this program" because community mental health centers coordinate services that are readily available to workers" and can be tied to negotiated health care programs.

Further, the federation pointed out, "there seems to be a double standard of treatment for mental illness"—the rich can get psychotheraphy while the poorer receive chemical therapy and hospitalization which are "less desirable and less effective."

It noted that research in recent years has found that when mental illness shows up in workers, 80 percent are already psychotic. The percentage is 55 percent in middle class families and 35 percent in upper class families.

Fortunately, the AFL-CIO said, this situation because of the Community Mental Health Center program "is in the process of change" and enactment of Yarborough's bill will speed up the process.

ULLICO Chief Edmund Tobin Dead at 64

Rye, N.Y.—Edmund P. Tobin, chairman and former president of Union Labor Life Insurance Co., died after a long illness at the age of 64.

The labor-owned insurance firm was founded 42 years ago and Tobin's career spanned all but one of those years. His interest in unions came naturally. He was the son of the late Teamsters Pres. Daniel J. Tobin.

He joined ULLICO as an actuarial clerk after graduating from Harvard, later became the company's first agent and was elected its president in 1955. In 1967 he was elected chairman for life.

In a message to Tobin's widow, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland said Tobin "served the trade union movement in a valuable and unique role and contributed much to the success" of ULLICO.

A solemn requiem Mass was celebrated by the Rev. Edmund P. Tobin, Jr., at the Resurrection Roman Catholic Church in Rye, N.Y. on July 30 and burial was at Greenwood Union Cemetery in Rye.

Jurisdiction Over Professionals:

Labor Board Asked to Field Rights of Baseball Umpires

Baseball umpires should have the same rights as other workers, the AFL-CIO said. It asked the National Labor Relations Board to protect the right to organize by taking jurisdiction over professional sports cases involving both the umpires and the players.

In a "friend of the court" brief, the AFL-CIO urged the NLRB to act in a case involving two veteran baseball umpires abruptly fired last year by the American League for "incompetence" after they attempted to form an umpires' association similar to the one in the National League. The umpires have asked the NLRB to take jurisdiction over the dispute.

The AFL-CIO brief, prepared by Associate General Counsel Thomas E. Harris, cited "the increasing importance of professional sports" in the economy. It urged the labor board to accept the case "both to safeguard the industrial peace in this sector of the economy and to protect the rights of employes to form unions and bargain collectively if they so choose."

The question before the board, the AFL-CIO said, "is not whether such groups as professional athletes and umpires should form unions, for they have and will."

The key issue, the AFL-CIO asserted, is whether labor relations in baseball will be regulated by national labor law and administered by the NLRB or instead governed by state laws and agencies.

Leaving the jurisdiction to the various states would be absurd, the brief maintained.

For example, "the New York Labor Relations Board will certainly take jurisdiction over disputes involving the Yankees and the Mets, and possibly over other teams as they come through town one by one.

"However, the Yankees and [illegible] that union negotiations and any strike (Heaven forfend!) would probably take place. Florida has no labor board, but it has lots of anti-union statutes and courts that are eager to take jurisdiction when the board doesn't."

Harris suggested that if the NLRB declines jurisdiction, "the Yankees and Mets will initially be subject next spring to Florida law, with its provision for strike votes and licensing business agents, then they will be subject successively to various other state laws as they move north, with the weather getting progressively worse and law better until they reach New York."

"While baseball is entertainment, we don't think its labor relations should be reduced to comedy," the AFL-CIO said.

The absurdity of what would happen in professional sports if jurisdiction were left to the individual states is the second half of the argument in the AFL-CIO. The first half of the contention is that the NLRB cannot legally refuse to take jurisdiction.

Citing in detail the congressional debates which took place over the NLRB's jurisdiction in 1959, the brief says the will of Congress was that the NLRB refuse to take jurisdiction only in cases involving "insignificant" local businesses which do not affect interstate commerce.

With multi-million dollar gate receipts, professional sports are obviously big business, the AFL-CIO stressed.

An argument was submitted to the NLRB by the American League contending that "effective and uniform" regulation of professional baseball by the national act is not possible because there are teams in Canada and Mexico.

Terming this "highly imaginative," the AFL-CIO brief said, "This would be highly persuasive if there were an international treaty governing baseball labor re- [illegible] administered, say, by the World Court. Absent such arrangements, the argument displays the nakedness of the employer's legal position."

The same is true of the American League's contention that "Congress won't like it if the board takes jurisdiction," the AFL-CIO said. "When Congress doesn't want the board to take jurisdiction, as in the case of farm workers, it knows how to say so. But it hasn't said any such thing about professional baseball.

"Despite the owners continual effort to identify professional baseball with Mom and Apple Pie, Congress just doesn't seem to be impressed," the AFL-CIO said. "It has repeatedly refused to give baseball a special partial exemption from the anti-trust laws, while granting exemptions to insurance, railroads and, most recently, banks."

In all, the argument by the American League shows "the club owners want to be free to combine together against their employes, as by the 'reserve clause,' without regard to antitrust laws, but don't want their players to combine for their own mutual aid and protection." Baseball's reserve clause virtually allows one club to own a player for life.

The AFL-CIO also dismissed the contention that umpires are in any sense supervisors. Instead, the AFL-CIO brief compared their legal status to plant guards, who have long been unionized even though the guards may not, by law, be in the same union with other employes.

Besides, the AFL-CIO brief points out, "neither umpires nor players have shown any wish to be in the same union."

The umpires involved in the appeal before the NLRB are Al Salerno and Bill Valentine, whose competence never was questioned until they sought to organize.

Pact Proposals Charted At AFTRA Convention

New York—Delegates representing the nation's television and radio performers spent most of their five-day union convention in closed-door sessions hammering out contract proposals to be submitted to the networks this fall.

They then concluded the 32nd annual convention of the American Federation of Television & Radio Artists with a unanimous resolution praising their bosses. The resolution hailed the network coverage of the historic moon flight—even though the moon programs squeezed out shows on which AFTRA members appear.

The convention unanimously re-elected AFTRA Pres. Mel Brandt, an NBC staff announcer, to a third term and returned all other officers without opposition.

Earlier, delegates heard AFTRA's full-time executive secretary, Sanford I. Wolff, report that active membership had increased 10 percent during the past year, going beyond the 20,000 mark. The number of locals increased from 35 to 42.

Most of the membership gains were outside of the big city centers of the union's strength. Wolff noted, indicating success in new organizing efforts.

Among the resolutions adopted was a call for meetings with advertising agency representatives to make "non-white employment more of a reality" in the television industry, including commercials.

In addition to the economic demands discussed at the convention, the union will seek provisions in the new contracts assuring the right of AFTRA members to respect picket lines of other unions in the industry and banning the showing of taped programs using the union's members during any AFTRA labor dispute.

Three years ago, during the nationwide network strike, AFTRA members on the picket lines complained that they were in effect "scabbing on themselves" when programs on which they had appeared were reshown on the networks because of the lack of live programs.

Principal speakers at the convention were New York Mayor John Lindsay and Herbert Klein, the White House communications director.

Federal Rules Urged to Curb Gun Ownership

Federal standards to restrict ownership of hand guns to those who can demonstrate reasonable need for the weapons has been strongly urged by the National Commission on the Causes and Prevention of Violence.

The commission, headed by Dr. Milton S. Eisenhower, said that if the states do not act to meet federal standards in four years, federal hand gun licensing would take effect.

The commission said the standards should be established so that about 90 percent of the 24 million hand guns in the nation would be confiscated, with the government buying up the weapons no longer found necessary under the proposed law. The report estimated the purchase of the weapons would cost $500 million.

The commission, created by Pres. Johnson in 1968, also urged a federal set of standards under which the states would require identification of the owners of an estimated 35 million rifles and 31 million shotguns in the United States.

Presently all but five states place some restriction on ownership of hand guns, but only two—New York and Massachusetts—have licensing laws similar to the commission proposals.

The AFL-CIO is on record as favoring federal gun control legislation that would provide for registration of all guns in private possession, prohibit the interstate sale or shipments of rifles and shotguns as well as pistols, revolvers and ammunition and ban the sale of guns to persons under 21 or persons convicted of major crimes, drug addicts or those of unsound mind.

Record of Legislatures Short of Goals

Survey Reveals 'Modest' Gains In Some States, Lag in Others

call, there is doubt as to the legality and permanency of many petitions.

Illinois and North Carolina Houses this year voted to rescind their previous call for a convention. But the state Senates did not go along.

Taxation was the commanding subject in state legislatures this year just as it has been in Congress. At least 21 states imposed new levies or increased old ones. Labor waged campaigns not against taxes per se, but for tax reform to close loopholes that benefit the wealthy. Unfortunately, it lost most such efforts.

Labor won a big victory over "right to work" in New Mexico. Both the House and Senate rejected moves to put over the union shop ban by attaching it to a civil rights bill. The legislature also rejected a measure to bring "right to work" before the electorate as a constitutional amendment.

A bill which threatened unions with harsh penalties under the Kansas 10-year-old "right to work" law was vetoed by Gov. Robert B. Docking (D) and an attempt to override his veto failed.

Open shop forces made overtures in several other states but failed completely. Oregon defeated a bill to outlaw the union shop for workers under 21.

In California, Massachusetts, Ohio, Pennsylvania and Wisconsin, the legislatures remained in session with the fate of labor's major programs still to be determined.

Here is a cross-section of reports covering states in which legislatures have either adjourned or acted on labor's most important bills:

ALABAMA — Workmen's compensation maximum was increased to $47 this year and $50 on July 1. 1970. Improvements were made in allowances for medical expenses. Ceiling on jobless benefits raised from $44 to $47 in two steps. Four percent tax on consumer utility bills enacted over labor's opposition. The legislature is still in session.

ARKANSAS—The legislature passed a "little Davis-Bacon Act" to set prevailing wages on state, county and municipal contract projects of more than $75,000. Weekly hours of firefighters were reduced from 72 to 64. Labor helped defeat Gov. Winthrop Rockefeller's proposal to increase the state's sales tax from 3 to 4 percent.

COLORADO—Maximum weekly benefit under workmen's compensation was raised from $54.25 to $59.50. Unemployment compensation maximum was increased from $57 to $70 a week. A public employes' bargaining law recommended by the Legislative Council after a one-year study, was killed by a House Labor Committee "dominated by Farm Bureau ranchers."

CONNECTICUT — Labor's gains were limited to legislation to make it easier to register citizens to vote and two consumer measures. The "most galling defeat" was the Senate's failure to pass a bill providing jobless benefits for workers unemployed by a labor dispute. The bill had passed the House, 82 to 78. Labor proposals for a state income tax and bills to improve collective bargaining machinery for municipal employes were rejected. There were some improvements made in workmen's compensation.

FLORIDA—A "very conservative" legislature refused to improve workmen's compensation and unemployment benefits. Equal pay for women legislation backed by unions was passed.

GEORGIA — Maximum unemployment benefits were increased from $45 to $50 a week over two and one-half years. Minimum weekly benefits also were raised. Labor secured an amendment to the workmen's compensation law making general contractors responsible for compensable injuries of employes of sub-contractors who fail to meet their obligations. Unions successfully opposed efforts of Gov. Lester Maddox to increase the sales tax from 3 to 4 percent.

HAWAII—Through labor's efforts, Hawaii became the fifth state to enact a temporary disability insurance law. Employes will get 55 percent of their normal pay up to a maximum of $72 a week if they are sick or injured in a non-job connected accident and cannot go to work.

The state minimum was raised from $1.25 to $1.40 and will go to $1.60 on Jan. 1, 1970.

The legislature improved workmen's compensation, strengthened consumer protection and made Hawaii the first state to have an ombudsman—an official to protect the public interest.

IDAHO—A bill giving the State Dept. of Labor the right to close an unsafe plant was looked upon by labor as one of its chief gains. Workmen's compensation benefits were increased, but modestly. A harsh restriction on long-term unemployment benefits was removed.

ILLINOIS—The general assembly adopted a state income tax of 2.5 percent on individuals and 4 percent on corporations. Labor supported an income tax but wanted it set at 1.5 percent on individuals and 3 percent for corporations.

Improvements less than labor had sought were made in workmen's compensation and occupational diseases laws. Unemployment insurance benefits were increased by approximately 10 percent.

On the negative side, labor proposals defeated included minimum wage, anti-strikebreaking and a 44-hour week for women workers bills.

INDIANA—Small improvements were made in workmen's compensation and occupational diseases benefits. A printing error resulted in the veto of a slight increase in jobless benefits.

Labor's chief goal, a State Labor Relations Act, "didn't get out of the House Labor Committee." And "in terms of human suffering, a major setback was the governor's veto of increased aid to dependent children."

IOWA—"First session of the 63rd general assembly, 131 days, total cost $1.8 million, labor's gain —zero," was the way the Iowa AFL-CIO summed it up.

Negatively, it reported that lawmakers repealed a sales tax credit for low income families, called for a national constitutional convention which could repeal the U.S. Supreme Court's "one-man, one-vote" ruling and passed a reapportionment plan which deviated from that ruling.

LOUISIANA—In a 30-day fiscal session of the legislature held this year, appropriations for mental retardation programs were increased and more money was provided for salaries of state employes. In a 30-day special session held late in 1968, previously vetoed improvements in workmen's compensation were again passed by the legislature and this time signed by the governor.

MAINE—Labor obtained passage of bills to increase unemployment benefits by $6 per week, assure truth in advertising, provide for a labor relations law covering public employes and establish an occupational safety code.

MARYLAND — All state contracted construction was placed under a prevailing wage law. The state's minimum wage was raised in two steps from $1.30 to $1.60 an hour. The maximum weekly jobless benefit was raised from $56 to $60. The maximum weekly workmen's compensation benefit for permanent and totally disabled was increased from $70 to $85. New benefits were enacted for public employes. "One of our best years," the State AFL-CIO said.

MICHIGAN — Some improvements were voted in the state's harsh garnishment law and programs were enacted to help build more low-cost housing.

A Republican-sponsored move to weaken the state's law covering bargaining by public employes was defeated. A labor-backed bill to provide arbitration in disputes involving firemen and policemen became law.

Noting that the legislature increased the interest rates that can be charged by small loan firms, the State AFL-CIO added, "Michigan's legislature took good care of the special interests but nothing for the unemployed and those workers struggling to live on the state's $1.25 an hour minimum wage."

MINNESOTA — Benefits under workmen's compensation were increased up to $10 a week, and the maximum weekly unemployment benefit was boosted from $50 to $57.

Labor led a successful drive to defeat a so-called uniform consumer credit code which would have permitted higher interest rates.

MISSOURI—Maximum benefits under workmen's compensation were raised up to $10 a week. The prevailing wage law was strengthened. A teacher tenure bill was passed, as was a measure to recognize heart and lung diseases as a disability for firefighters. Labor supported an increase in the income tax, which lost. The legislature refused to increase jobless benefits.

NEBRASKA — Lawmakers have enacted increases in workmen's compensation, unemployment compensation, stronger bargaining rights for public employes and improvements in a safety law in a legislature scheduled to run through August.

NEVADA—The legislature enacted a minimum hourly wage increase to $1.30 this year, $1.45 in 1970 and $1.60 on Feb. 1, 1971. It approved increases in both workmen's compensation and unemployment benefits. Labor successfully opposed increases in interest rates and prohibitions on picketing. A public employe collective bargaining bill died in committee.

NEW YORK—On the plus side was legislation banning firings based on pay garnishment, stronger job-safety provisions in construction, a minimum wage law covering farm workers and new health protection for workers on tunnels and bridges.

The State AFL-CIO rated "minuses" to enactments that impose new penalties on public workers who strike, fines on strikes by hospital and nursing home workers in the private sector and an increase in the state sales tax from 2 to 3 percent.

A labor-supported bill was passed to bring students working part time under the state's unemployment insurance law. Gov. Nelson Rockefeller vetoed a bill that would have shortened the waiting period for disability benefits under workmen's compensation from two weeks to one week.

NORTH CAROLINA — State minimum wage was increased from $1 per hour to $1.25 and 30,000 additional workers were covered. Maximum unemployment and workmen's compensation benefits were increased from $42 to $50 a week.

OREGON—Benefits for temporary injuries under workmen's compensation were increased 28 percent; permanent injury benefits were raised by 19 percent. The unemployment insurance maximum benefit was raised from $49 to $55 a week.

Other new laws shortened the workweek for firefighters, brought fringe benefits under consideration in State Davis-Bacon Act, made meat and poultry inspection conform to federal law. The legislature referred a 3 percent sales tax to the people. It was vigorously opposed by labor and defeated by a margin of 8-to-1 in a June election.

SOUTH DAKOTA—Workmen's compensation was expanded and the state minimum wage of $1 an hour was established. The legislature also enacted a law to impose fines and jail sentences on striking public employes. It does, however, contain some guidelines for collective bargaining by these workers. The state sales tax was increased from 3 to 4 percent over strong opposition from labor.

TENNESSEE — The legislature, "under the heavy influence of financial interests" increased maximum interest rates from 7.5 to 10 percent. On the plus side, labor won increases in both workmen's compensation and unemployment insurance from $42 to $47. A measure to outlaw public employes unions was defeated.

UTAH—The maximum benefit under workmen's compensation was increased from $62 to $65 a week. Utah AFL-CIO reported, "Most of our time was spent on efforts to defeat anti-labor legislation. We were fortunate in blocking restrictive bills."

WASHINGTON — Public employes, a majority of whom belong to AFL-CIO unions, were gainers through enactments of pay increases, improvements in retirement benefits and full collective bargaining rights. Labor also won job protection for workers whose wages are garnished.

WEST VIRGINIA — "Black lung" disease and a host of other pulmonary ailments were made compensable under workmen's compensation. A $47 weekly maximum on workmen's compensation benefits was changed to a level of 45 percent of the average weekly wage now, 50 percent in 1970. A special session killed a civil service bill; granted manufacturers a 10 percent investment credit on their taxes. The latter action "compounded an already atrocious tax structure," the State AFL-CIO said.

WYOMING—A health and safety law, sought by labor, was enacted. Two bills were passed to strengthen workmen's compensation law. One measure empowers courts to extend benefits for total disability beyond the law; the other makes occupational diseases compensable. Wyoming was the only state without any disease coverage.

'Whoa, Not So Fast'

Hawaii Installs Nation's First State Ombudsman

Honolulu—America now has its first state ombudsman.

Herman S. Doi, former director of the Hawaii Legislative Reference Bureau, was named by the legislature to fill the post it created in a bill enacted earlier this year—with strong labor support.

The ombudsman concept, pioneered in Sweden, has increasingly received attention in the United States. The ombudsman serves as a "public protector" who may have varying degrees of power to intervene on behalf of citizens who feel they are aggrieved by government. Doi refers to his new role as "a challenging opportunity to work a creative change between ponderous government and frustrated citizens."

In aiding a citizen who feels himself wronged by a state agency, Hawaii's ombudsman is empowered to bring a court suit, subpoena witnesses or compel any person to produce papers or objects which may relate to a matter under investigation.

Labor Hits Administration Plan:

Post Office Reforms Favored Over Corporation Proposal

Labor wants to see "substantial reform" in the nation's postal service but it strongly believes that the government must continue to "carry the mail," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany testified.

He told the House Post Office Committee that the AFL-CIO is "firmly opposed" to a bill to reorganize the Post Office Dept. into a government-owned corporation, removed from congressional control.

Meany and the AFL-CIO Government Employes Council attacked provisions of the Administration-backed corporate structure bill which would "drastically undercut the bargining power of postal employes and their unions."

The AFL-CIO and GEC supported a second bill before the committee to provide postal reforms without altering the department's public service functions. It has been introduced by Committee Chairman Thaddeus J. Dulski (D-N.Y.)

Despite valid criticisms of the Post Office, Meany pointed out, it handles over 80 billion of pieces of mail a year—millions of pieces each day—with a smaller "error factor" than any giant corporation can boast in its operations.

"Certainly America's big car manufacturers, now calling back thousands of defect-marred automobiles—can't claim such a record," he said.

While there are delays in delivery and operations are not always efficient, he continued, "the Post Office performs this service with such a high degree of integrity and honesty, that America's trust in the mails is legendary."

The postal problems, he said, spring from the fact that the Post Office "is woefully undercapitalized," forced to use old structures in traffic-jammed streets, and burdened by "unrealistic rates" for circular mail —so-called junk mail.

"It is also burdened by a high rate of employe-turnover," Meany added, "reflecting poor working conditions and inadequate wages in today's job market."

He then stressed that these and other problems can be resolved by adequate financing of the Post Office and improved postal management—reforms that can be achieved within the present structure.

He warned that the "widely advertised" efficiency of a postal corporation could be achieved only by eliminating services, such as home delivery of mail.

"We opposed the abandonment of such service," he added. "Substantial reform—rather than a corporate setup—is the prudent, realistic and workable approach to the problem."

Worst Features

The corporate structure legislation's provisions pertaining to employes, Meany said, "combine the worst features of public and private labor laws" in that they would wipe out civil service while continuing to deny workers the right to strike.

"If the Administration has decided that postal employes should no longer be considered government employes," he said, "then it should go all the way and grant them the right all private employes have in a free country—the right to strike."

John A. McCart, operations director for GEC, charged that other language in the bill could be used to "severely restrict the right of collective bargaining" by postal workers.

He pointed out that Dulski's bill contains reforms while retaining Congress' right to "oversight" of postal operations, as well as financing them through appropriations.

Stripping Congress of its continuous right of review of postal operations, he stated, "would work an injustice on American mail users and taxpayers because they would lose a highly important opportunity to contribute their views through elected officials."

Testimony given for the AFL-CIO Postal Clerks by the union's president, Francis S. Filbey and its legislative director, Patrick J. Nilan, also denounced the postal corporation bill.

A corporate structure, they said, could lead to further deterioration in postal service. Its labor provisions, they added, "simply will not work and indeed could work great injustices upon employes and their unions."

LABOR OPPOSED a bill to transfer the postal service to corporation management in testimony before the House Post Office Committee. AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller meet with Committee Chairman Thaddeus J. Dulski (D-N.Y.), center, to urge that the government continue to "carry the mail."

$1 Billion Hike Voted In School Aid Funds

to a vote, the liberal-led coalition of school aid supporters had to hold the line against substitute "compromise" amendments which would have added more funds for impacted area schools and some additional programs—but shortchanged the neediest children.

All substitutes were beaten, the closest by a 37-vote margin. Then the stage was set for the key vote on the Joelson package amendment.

Before the congressmen walked down the aisles to be counted by tellers—House rules do not permit a rollcall when a bill is being amended in the Committee of the Whole—House Republican Leader Gerald R. Ford made a last-minute plea for support of the Administration budget. Approval of the Joelson amendment, he charged, would be "irresponsible" and inflationary.

But a substantial number of Republicans joined with the big majority of Democrats to pile up a 242-106 victory for the fund increase.

The New York Times captured the elation of the House liberals with a one word quotation from Rep. Patsy T. Mink (D-Hawaii). "Whoopee!"

House Democratic Leader Carl Albert told newsmen jubilantly, "This is the greatest Democratic victory since the 89th Congress."

The House went on to add some additional funds for other programs, including education aid to handicapped children, before recessing for the night.

Still to be acted on, as the AFL-CIO News went to press, was a controversial "rider" to the appropriations bill, termed the Whitten Amendment after its chief sponsor, Rep. Jamie L. Whitten (D-Miss.).

Its ostensible purpose was to prevent use of federal funds to bring about busing of students to lessen racial imbalance. But its wording would in effect give congressional sanction to so-called "freedom of choice" plans which some southern school districts have used to avoid desegregating dual school systems.

The appropriations bill also included funds for the Dept. of Labor and Health, Education & Welfare Dept. programs in addition to education.

In these areas, the House generally went along with the Appropriations Committee recommendations which, in turn, did not stray too far from the Administration's budget request.

One cut the committee made in the Labor Dept. appropriations had the approval of the labor movement, however.

At a time when funds were being trimmed back from such programs as wage-hour enforcement, the Administration asked for 130 more investigators for the Office of Labor-Management & Welfare-Pension Plans reports.

The reason for the big increase was not an increased workload. The added investigators were intended to be used for "fishing expedition" audits of pension and welfare funds as part of the Justice Dept.'s "crimebusting" program.

The committee denied the $2 million requested by the Administration for this purpose, declaring that any needed criminal investigations should be done by the Justice Dept. staff, not the Labor Dept.

The appropriations bill, after passage by the House, still must be acted on by the Senate.

In past years, the Senate has generally been more liberal than the House in providing money for education and other social programs. This time, the House has taken the lead in rebelling against a long congressional tradition of passing needed legislation—and then underfinancing the programs.

Perkins Film Scheduled for Labor Day TV

More than 100 television stations across the country will show a special AFL-CIO film drama during the Labor Day weekend based on the early days of Francis Perkins' service as Secretary of Labor during the depression-ridden 1930s.

Entitled "The Vine and The Fig Tree," the film traces the drive to establish an NRA code in the steel industry, Mrs. Perkins' historic confrontation with city and steel company officials in Homestead, Pa., and her dramatic meeting with desperate steelworkers there.

"The Vine and The Fig Tree" was produced by the National Broadcasting Co. It was presented by the George Meany Foundation as part of the "Eternal Light" series on the NBC-TV network last fall.

State and local central bodies are publicizing this special Labor Day telecast in their local areas. A schedule of local station broadcast dates and times will appear in a future issue of the AFL-CIO News.

Wage Rate Review Set by Labor Dept.

The Labor Dept's Wage & Hour and Public Contracts divisions will begin late this year a review of the minimum wage rates under the Fair Labor Standards Act in 12 industries in Puerto Rico and three industries in the Virgin Islands.

The series of reviews will start in December and continue through next May. The study will cover all rates below the statutory minimums prescribed by the act for the U.S. mainland, the Labor Dept. said.

Senate Acts to Extend Surtax by 6 Months

Democratic Policy Committee initially took a firm stand against extension of the surtax without major tax reform, and said both issues should be acted on at the same time.

Under heavy Administration pressure, the Senate leadership backed off somewhat. First Majority Leader Mike Mansfield and his policy committee proposed an extension of the surtax through November—with an assurance that a tax reform bill would be on the Senate floor before then.

Senate Republican Leader Everett M. Dirksen first indicated he would go along with the Mansfield proposal as the only way of keeping the surtax alive. But he changed his mind after the White House unleashed a massive attack on the proposal.

Vice Pres. Agnew, after phoning Pres. Nixon on his world tour, termed the five-month extension "unacceptable."

"I guess if that's the case the surtax will die," Mansfield shrugged in response.

But as the deadline neared, he "sweetened" the offer to a six-month extension and Dirksen appeared to indicate his agreement, although newsmen never were able to pin him down specifically.

Hard-line Republicans pressed for the additional six months and inclusion of the investment tax credit repeal which also was in the House bill. Democrats opposed the latter provision for tactical purposes—to keep the heat on for a major tax reform bill.

The Senate tacked its extension on an unrelated minor bill, rather than on the House-passed surtax measure. It still required approval by the House as the AFL-CIO News went to press.

While the Senate maneuvering continued, with the picture changing almost hourly, the House went its own way on two fronts.

First the House rushed through a temporary 15-day extension of the surtax withholding rate—a bill which the Senate subsequently ignored.

Then it prepared to act during the first week in August on the first comprehensive reform of the tax laws in many years.

Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.) of the House Ways & Means Committee promised completion of the bill by Aug. 1. Its broad outlines are already known—a partial closing of some tax loopholes and a so-called "minimum" tax to tap some of the income still excluded.

Still to be voted on in the committee were proposals to use part of the extra revenue to lower taxes generally.

By tradition, tax bills are brought to the floor under a no amendment rule.

If the bill is passed, as expected, it will be subject to unrestricted amendments in the Senate—first when the Senate Finance Committee considers it, and then when it reaches the Senate floor.

At one point, Mills raised the suggestion that the Senate might immediately bring the House bill to the floor and vote on it intact. But senators on all sides of the tax reform issue indicated their opposition to this procedure, which the Senate has only rarely followed.

Ironically, the Administration's heaviest pressure for the surtax extension came at a time when the Treasury reported that the government had a $3 billion surplus for the fiscal year which ended June 30—far above expectations.

It was only two months ago that Treasury officials had told the Ways & Means Committee that the surplus would be only $900 million. They said Pres. Johnson had badly overestimated the budget surplus when he said the government would end the fiscal year $2.4 billion in the black.

Unemployment Jumps to 3.6% in July

House Votes Tax Reform, Aids Low-Income Families

Jobless Rate For Nation At '69 Peak

By John R. Oravec

Unemployment jumped to 3.6 percent in July—the highest rate so far in 1969—as the nation's jobless rolls for adult males increased sharply from June levels, Labor Dept. statisticians reported.

The seasonally adjusted unemployment rate rose two-tenths of 1 percent from the June rate of 3.4 percent. This is the first time in a year that the rate has climbed more than one-tenth of 1 percent in a month.

The spurt in unemployment put the rate at its highest level since last October.

Total non-farm payroll employment was 70.6 million last month, down 400,000 from June—although this decline is less than usual for July.

There were 3.2 million persons unemployed for an increase of 125,000 over the month after seasonal adjustments, the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics noted.

The jobless rate for adult men rose from 2.0 percent in June to 2.2 percent in July, accounting for much of the overall rise in the percentage of unemployment.

Since the post-Korean War low of 3.3 percent reached last December-February, unemployment has climbed by 275,000, with 200,000 of the increase occurring among the adult males.

The unemployment rate for women in July held at 3.7 percent for the third consecutive month—

A "GRATUITOUS INSULT" to labor was the description AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany gave to a remark by Sen. J. William Fulbright (D-Ark.) that the government funds the American Institute for Free Labor Development as a payoff for labor's support for Viet Nam policy. AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne and Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, partly hidden, appeared with Meany before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Meany Hits 'Insult':

Fulbright's Attack On AIFLD Scored

By Duane Emme

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany went before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and answered "a gratuitous insult" to labor from the committee's chairman, Sen. J. William Fulbright (D-Ark.).

The insult, Meany made clear, was a Fulbright expression that the government has provided grants to the American Institute for Free Labor Development as "the price we pay" for labor's support of Viet Nam policy.

The quote from Fulbright appeared in a United Press International account of a committee hearing, July 14. At the time, Fulbright also belittled AIFLD's program to strengthen free unions in Latin America.

Meany said Fulbright's charge was untrue—"completely ridiculous." He expressed labor's "pride" in its participation in AIFLD and he traced its accomplishments. He listed more than 70 businesses that have joined with the AFL-CIO in helping support it.

During the hearing, which ran for more than three hours, none of the committee members associated himself with Fulbright's remarks, and two senators took sharp issue with them:

- Sen. Gale W. McGee (D-Wyo.), after listening to exchanges between Meany and Fulbright, said, "There's nothing here to suggest any payoff. It lessens the dignity of this body to make such charges."
- Sen. Clifford P. Case (R-N.J.) said AIFLD's education courses for

Loopholes Tightened, Surcharge Prolonged

The first major tax reform legislation in 15 years has passed the House by a margin of 394 to 30.

The measure would narrow some existing loopholes, provide at least a 5 percent cut for each taxpayer and eliminate taxes entirely for many poor families. (Details, Page 7.)

The House bill now goes to the Senate, where the Finance Committee will consider the bill and work on its own version of tax reform. The issue can't possibly come up in the Senate until Congress returns from its Aug. 13 recess of three weeks.

The bill as reported by the House Ways & Means Committee provided tax relief in three annual segments starting next year.

In 1970, $1.7 billion in relief would go to low income families and those who use the standard deductions. In 1971, individual tax relief would rise to $6.7 billion; in 1972 to $8 billion—with tax cuts going to virtually all Americans through graduated reduction in tax rates.

In a last-minute development, the committee added $2.4 billion in further tax relief over two years, mainly for low and middle income groups.

This change, which strengthened the bill from labor's viewpoint, was made after it was found that millions of families with incomes in the $7,000 to $13,000 range who itemize deductions would get no reduction under the bill as it was originally drafted.

Committee Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.) said failure to grant tax relief in this area was the result of a "misunderstanding" between the Treasury Dept. and the committee.

Nixon Urges Standards on Job Safety

Pres. Nixon has called on Congress to create a five-member board to set occupational health and safety standards for industries and businesses so as to reduce "needless illness, needless injury and needless death."

The proposal for a board, whose standards would be enforced by the courts on complaints brought by federal and state officials, came in a message sent to the House and Senate.

Pres. Johnson called for federal standards last year in a proposed Occupational Safety & Health Act but the legislation died after employer groups mounted a nationwide drive against it.

Sen. Ralph Yarborough (D-Tex.) and other lawmakers have introduced similar legislation in this Congress.

Under Nixon's plan, the board's five members would be appointed by the President, with Senate consent, to five-year terms, staggered so that one member would change each year.

Wage-Hour Violations Soar to All-Time High

By Eugene A. Kelly

Employers are violating the wage-hour laws at a greater rate than ever before, the Dept. of Labor learned in a report from Wage-Hour Administrator Robert D. Moran.

Investigations by Moran's Wage & Hour and Public Contracts divisions showed that 477,434 workers—a record total—were illegally underpaid by $89 million in fiscal 1969. The violations occurred under the minimum wage, overtime and equal pay sections of the Fair Labor Standards Act, the Public Contracts Act, Service Contracts Act and the equal pay law forbidding discrimination against women workers.

The $89 million underpayment figure was topped only once—in fiscal 1966, when covered workers were cheated of $90 million, by design or inadvertence.

The latest violations were uncovered by department investi-

Federal Action Sought To Halt Interest Spiral

More than 200 leaders from widely varying areas of American life have appealed for swift government action to reverse the high interest spiral "if disaster is to be avoided."

They unanimously joined in a statement asking the Administration and Congress to take steps "before the grim toll of economic recession is again exacted from the American people."

The statement came out of an "Emergency Meeting on the High Interest Crisis" in Washington attended by representatives of labor, farmers, consumers, retired persons, cooperatives, housing and civil rights groups, and local governments.

Several members of Congress pledged their fullest effort in line with the meeting's proposals, which were delivered to the White House through Pres. Nixon's counselor, Dr. Arthur F. Burns.

During a half-day meeting, speakers representing the participating organizations testified to the "bitter hardships" being heaped upon citizens by the highest interest rates in 100 years.

Speaking for labor was AFL-

DELEGATES CONVENE in New York for the 32nd annual convention of the American Federation of Television & Radio Artists. They handled a wide agenda, including a number of proposals for negotiations with networks this fall. Mayor John V. Lindsay addresses one of the sessions.

ITU Cites $25 Million Pension Plan Reserves

Seattle, Wash.—"Phenomenal" growth of the Typographical Union's industrial pension plans since they were inaugurated three years ago was reported to the ITU's 111th convention here by Pres. John J. Pilch. The union has had a fraternal pension program since 1908.

"Never before in ITU history have so many members benefited so greatly in so short a time," Pilch said. "In less than three years we have come from zero to $25 million in the reserves of the ITU industrial pension plans. Today, 161 local unions in the United States and Canada have negotiated contracts requiring more than $10 million annually in contributions in the ITU negotiated pension plans."

Pilch said that 35,570 members and employes represented by ITU local unions are now covered under contracts requiring employer contributions.

In the area of bargaining gains, Pilch said the union showed an average weekly wage boost of more than $10 per member during the past year and a reduction in the average workweek to slightly more than 35 hours. The members also made substantial gains in most fringe areas, with a considerable hike in four-week vacations, he reported.

The 360 delegates heard from the head of another graphic arts union, Pres. John Connolly of the Bookbinders.

Connolly said his union is interested in a full merger of all graphic arts unions, but indicated that little progress is being made in that direction with the exception of the Printing Pressmen and the Stereotypers.

The Bookbinders, he noted, also are moving ahead in efforts to negotiate workweeks of less than 37.5 hours and recently obtained contracts in nine cities for a 36.25-hour week.

In a message to the convention, Pres. Nixon said that the full talents and energy of organized labor are needed to marshal the fullness of the nation's efforts to end all disadvantages.

"Working with government, business and all other sectors of our economy," Nixon said, "union members can be of invaluable aid to efforts to end discrimination, to hire and train the jobless, and to build a more stimulating and satisfying way of life. Your support and strength can be essential in the urgent task of maintaining a strong, inflation-free economy."

The convention in later sessions was to act on a large number of proposed changes in the union laws and resolutions.

FTC Called For Laxity on Import Labels

The Federal Trade Commission has been urged by the AFL-CIO to reconsider a number of recent decisions which fail to live up to standards on labeling of foreign products and components.

Consumers and the American workers "have a right to know if components or assembly of a product for sale in the United States are of foreign origin" and frequently made under low-wage, sweatshop conditions, the federation said in a letter to FTC Chairman Paul Rand Dixon.

"Our view on the marking of foreign origin is that adequate labeling of foreign products is necessary," noted AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger.

He charged that recent advisory opinions of the FTC are in conflict with a statement issued by the commission on Apr. 4, 1968, which declared that all relevant facts on foreign production, including components, are of benefit to the American consumer.

"These recent views seem to make the percentage of foreign origin of a product an important aspect of whether a label is required," Goldfinger said.

Wallace Confirms Right-Wing Affinity

Tulsa, Okla.—Former Alabama Gov. George C. Wallace has dropped his coyness about being associated with extreme right-wing organizations.

Wallace spoke at the annual convention of the Christian Crusade here and told the delegates "it's a pleasure to be associated" with their leader, Billy James Hargis. The Crusade is one of the largest and wealthiest of all far-right groups.

During last year's presidential campaign, Wallace's closest approach to far-right functions was some handshaking on their fringes. Until now, he had never publicly embraced their programs.

Brown, Dennis to Attend TUC Parley

Two fraternal delegates will represent the AFL-CIO at the 1969 Trades Union Congress in Great Britain, Sept. 1-5, Federation Pres. George Meany announced.

Meany named Pres. C. L. Dennis of the Railway, Airline & Steamship Clerks and Pres. Kenneth Brown of the Lithographers & Photoengravers to attend the sessions of the British trade union assembly in Portsmouth.

With the notification went a credential certifying the two officers as fraternal delegates, and a message advising TUC Acting General Sec. Victor Feather of their selection.

Farm Wages Still Rank in Lowest Levels

Farm workers still are among the nation's lowest paid wage earners, the Labor Dept. noted.

The national average farm wage for 1968 was $1.43 an hour, without room or board, up 10 cents from 1967, the department reported. It compared this with the production worker's average of $3.01 an hour in manufacturing, an increase of 18 cents over the 1967 average.

Production workers hired in off-the-farm plants to process farm products were better paid, but still were not up to the average pay for manufacturing, the report showed. Workers in frozen fruits and vegetables averaged $2.23 an hour, up 13 cents in a year's time. Workers in the canned, cured and frozen fruits industry averaged $2.36, an increase of 15 cents an hour.

Both hourly and piece rates increased for most of the 172 farm labor categories reported on by state employment security agencies.

Passage of Fair Labor Standards Act amendments in 1966 extended minimum wage coverage to a limited number of farm workers. The first $1 minimum moved to $1.15 in 1968 and to $1.30 by Feb. 1, 1969.

The act covers about 400,000 farm workers—about a third of the annual average number of hired farmhands.

A 1968 Labor Dept. study showed that the federal minimum wage for farm work had a significant impact on wage rates. Despite this trend, more than half the areas still have some workers employed below the minimum, the department said.

As Convention Ends:

Seafarers Stress Strong Fleet Policy

The Seafarers ended their 14th convention with renewed determination to save the merchant marine from extinction and with a call for a national transportation policy geared to maximum use of America's "rivers, harbors, rails, highways and airports."

Highways alone will not be enough to meet the needs of a U.S. population expected to double by the year 2000. Neither will the nation's congested airways, and railroads which are cutting "unprofitable services precisely at a time when our need is for more, not less, transportation facilities," the convention declared in a policy statement.

"In the end, we must turn to water transportation as an auxiliary form of service," said the statement, concurred in by delegates representing 85,000 members of 30 affiliated unions and districts.

The convention returned Pres. Paul Hall and Sec.-Treas. Al Kerr to office for new two-year terms and chose two new members of the SIU executive board —Merle Adlum of the Inland Boatmen, Seattle, and Steven J. Hoinsky of the Fishermen, San Pedro, Calif.

During convention sessions Hall introduced several dozen members of Congress who promised continued support for the campaign of the AFL-CIO and the SIU for more merchant ships built in U.S. yards, manned by American seamen and flying the U.S. flag.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland told the delegates they can count on the full backing of the federation in their battle for a greatly stepped-up shipping and shipbuilding program.

The first convention session heard AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany warn that conservative groups are using the "law and order" slogan as a club with which to defeat liberal candidates and capture control of Congress.

So far as labor is concerned, Meany said, the 1970 congressional election is "when the chips are really down." He said labor can be hurt badly next year "if we lose a few friends" because of overconfidence or lethargy.

Sen. Joseph M. Montoya (D.-N. Mex.) reported that the nation lost $2.8 billion in tax income last year because of tax loopholes. He urged the delegates to "support the strongest possible tax reform proposals" now pending in Congress.

Under Sec. of Commerce Rocco Siciliano and Maritime Administrator Andrew Gibson announced that Pres. Nixon will within 60 days submit "comprehensive, long-range" legislation to revive the languishing U.S. maritime industry. Siciliano added: "We are preparing a program that will cost money."

The convention condemned "piratical attacks" in several Latin American nations on U.S. fishing trawlers in violation of international law. It urged the government to "vigorously enforce" existing agreements and asked Congress to protect American fishermen in international waters bordering Peru, Chile, Ecuador and other nations.

The delegates urged tax reform, import quotas on steel, an increase in the federal minimum wage, enlargement of the food stamp program, and a continued campaign by all government agencies to wipe out hunger and malnutrition in America.

They pledged that SIU will work for liberalization of the social security law to provide increased benefits to impoverished senior citizens. They asked for removal of tax loopholes that encourage "runaway fleet" operations and tax avoidance by wealthy citizens.

The convention saluted the continuing efforts of U.S. servicemen to preserve democracy in Southeast Asia and expressed hope that efforts to achieve a lasting peace "without sacrifice of our national principles" will succeed.

The delegates approved resolutions advocating a comprehensive national health insurance program, abolition of all tolls on inland waterways, a federal anti-garnishment law, a federal law prohibiting banks from issuing unsolicited credit cards, federal curbs on excessive prescription drug costs and the encouragement of generic rather than brand-name prescriptions.

Non-Compliance Ruling Names Railway Carmen

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has notified affiliates that the Railway Carmen have been found to be in non-compliance with the decision of an impartial umpire under the AFL-CIO's internal disputes procedures.

The finding was reached by a subcommittee of the AFL-CIO Executive Council consisting of Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland and Vice Presidents Paul L. Phillips and John H. Lyons.

Meany said the non-compliance finding was based on a complaint by the Transport Workers involving the Carmen's refusal to withdraw its application before the National Mediation Board over employes of the Penn Central System.

The decision of the Impartial Umpire on June 3, 1969, had found the Carmen to be in violation of Article XX of the AFL-CIO Constitution, Meany said.

Therefore, Meany noted, effective July 31, 1969, "the Brotherhood of Railway Carmen will be subject to the following provisions of Section 15 of Article XX":

"1. The non-complying affiliate shall not be entitled to file any complaint or appear in a complaining capacity in any proceeding under this Article until such non-compliance is remedied or excused as provided in Section 16.

"2. The federation shall, upon request, supply every appropriate assistance and aid to any organization resisting the action determined to be in violation of this article.

"3. The federation shall appropriately publicize the fact that the affiliate is not in compliance with the constitution.

"4. No affiliate shall support or render assistance to the action determined to be in violation of this article."

3.2 Million Out of Work:

Jobless Rate Climbs To '69 High of 3.6%

not much different from the 12-year low of 3.5 percent that prevailed from November to March, the BLS said.

The overall unemployment rate also reflected increased joblessness of white workers from 3 to 3.2 percent. The rate for non-white workers, after rising to 7 percent in June, fell back to 6.4 percent in July.

Teenagers accounted for most of the non-white decline, the BLS observed, as their rate dropped from 28.6 percent to 22.3 percent. Meanwhile, the rate for non-white adult men moved down to 3.8 percent but remained above the 3.2 percent recorded in February and March, the BLS said.

Most of the increases in unemployment occurred among workers in construction, finance and services, and agriculture.

Even though the unemployment rate in construction climbed to 5.7 percent from its record low of 5 percent in June, it was in line with the rates recorded earlier this year, the Labor Dept. statisticians observed. Jobless rates over the month rose for non-farm laborers to 7.9 percent from 5.9 percent and for farm workers from 5.5 percent to 9.1 percent.

The workweek for rank-and-file employes on non-farm payrolls was unchanged after seasonal adjustment in July at 37.8 hours—on the same plane as the past five months.

Harold Goldstein, assistant commissioner of the BLS, commenting on the report, said that "we are looking for a slowing down [in the economy], but we aren't finding very much."

Goldstein pointed out that the unemployment rate has fluctuated in a range of five-tenths of a percentage point for the past year and one-half.

Summer employment for young workers—16 to 21 years old—improved significantly compared with a year ago as employment gains out-distanced the growth in the labor force.

Jobs for the younger workers increased by 225,000 over the year to 11.4 million as gains in the non-farm private sector countered declines in government and agriculture.

The 1.7 million youth unemployed this summer represented a decline of 140,000 below last year. This resulted in a jobless rate of 12.8 percent, compared with 14 percent last year.

Even though the unemployment rate was lower for both white and Negro youths, the non-white rate was still double that for whites.

Goldstein also noted that the surge of young workers into the job market is leveling off as the nation nears the end of the crop of post-World War II babies. But he pointed out that this surge may soon be affecting the employment statistics of the age 21 to 24 group.

The report showed that average hourly earnings for all workers on private payrolls rose 1 cent in July to $3.03. Compared with July 1968, hourly earnings were up 18 cents, or 6.3 percent.

Weekly earnings over the month average 68 cents more as gains in construction and the trades more than offset declines in manufacturing, finance, insurance and real estate.

TIME STUDY APPLICATIONS are practiced by participants of the 12th annual Union Industrial Engineering Institutes at the University of Wisconsin. Three institutes—on Establishing Work Standards, Job Evaluation & Related Problems, and Collective Bargaining of Work Measurement Problems—ran simultaneously during the two-week session. Seventeen AFL-CIO affiliates sent 79 representatives and staff members to classes conducted by labor educators and university faculty.

Incentive Pay Extended To 65,000 Steelworkers

Pittsburgh—An arbitration panel handed down a decision requiring 11 major companies to extend incentive pay coverage to an estimated 65,000 steelworkers in basic steel-producing operations.

Union Pres. I. W. Abel called the ruling "a major step toward resolution of the incentive problem in the basic steel industry." Incentives provide increased pay for increased production.

The decision, Abel disclosed, requires each company to cover "not less than 85 percent" of its production and maintenance employes with incentives. It specifies that no covered plant of a company shall have less than 65 percent of its employes on incentive pay.

The panel's ruling resulted from a provision in the 1968 settlement agreement between the union and the basic steel companies. It will "mean millions of dollars for our members affected by this award," Abel said.

Presently the percentage of workers entitled to incentive pay varies from company to company and plant to plant.

Responsibility for establishing guidelines for the incentive programs was given to the arbitration panel after a joint union-management study committee failed to reach agreement.

The 1968 settlement referred the problem to the panel, which held extended hearings in Washington, D.C., and handed down its findings Aug. 1. Panel members were Chairman William E. Simkin, former director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, and arbitrators Sylvester Garrett and Ralph T. Seward.

The decision also requires the 11 companies to pay each affected employe an additional 10 cents an hour in incentive pay from Aug. 1, 1968, to the date the incentives go into effect.

If such incentives are not installed at the "earliest practicable date," the award provides for them to be retroactive to the date on which the incentive pay could reasonably have been put into effect.

The panel's decision permits the union to use grievance and arbitration procedures in the event a company fails to comply. An appropriate procedure for complying is to be worked out by each of the companies with USWA representatives.

The decision affects employes of U.S. Steel, Bethlehem, Republic, Youngstown Sheet & Tube, Armco, Jones & Laughlin, Colorado Fuel & Iron, National (Great Lakes) Steel, Inland Steel, Wheeling-Pittsburgh-Steel and Allegheny-Ludlum in 21 states.

Russell Bell Heads CLC Research Dept.

Ottawa, Ont.—Russell Bell has been named to head the research department of the Canadian Labor Congress replacing John Fryer, new executive secretary of the British Columbia Government Employes' Association.

Bell, 45, has held research posts with the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, the CLC from 1958 to 1964, and the Economic Council of Canada.

Wage Cheating By Employers At New Peak

gators in spite of the fact that no additional inspectors have been hired by either the Johnson or Nixon administrations since 700,000 new business establishments were added when the wage-hour law was amended in 1966.

The report made no mention of lost wages recovered by court action, but not much more than a third of the underpayments ever is recovered. At the end of fiscal 1968, $53 million of the $83 million due underpaid workers remained uncollected, the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research reported.

Federation economists noted that some of the increase in violations uncovered may be due to the informational campaign launched by the Labor Dept. and the AFL-CIO when the new amendments took effect. The latest report, they said, shows the continuing need for sustained inspections and more staff.

Moran's report shows that the number of establishments checked by inspectors dropped from 75,022 in fiscal 1968 to 72,520 in 1969. Department inspectors rarely visit more than a small percentage of business places in any one year and must rely largely on complaints.

The $89 million in underpayments breaks down as follows: $27.5 million in minimum wages, $55 million in overtime, nearly $2 million due employes of federal suppliers under the McNamara-O'Hara Service Contracts Act, and $4.6 million under the equal pay law for work performed by women at lower rates than comparable work by men.

The figures for the previous fiscal year were $20.4 million, $55 million, $2.6 million and $2.4 million, respectively, for a total of $80 million.

The report showed nearly half the underpaid workers—207,234—did not set the minimum wages they should have been paid. The fiscal 1968 total was 169,000 workers.

Overtime pay violations affected 208,000 workers in 1969 as against 296,000 the year before. There were 14,000 Service Contract Act violations compared with 12,000 in 1968 and 16,100 in equal pay violations versus 7,000 in 1968.

Moran praised more than 1,000 compliance officers for working "tirelessly and under all types of conditions" to ferret out law violations. However, he noted, "finding violations is not our goal. We are more concerned with improving the level of compliance" through informational programs.

GE Accepts Early Start On IUE Contract Talks

The Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers announced that General Electric Co. has agreed to begin formal contract negotiations Aug. 12, two weeks ahead of schedule.

IUE Pres. Paul Jennings expressed confidence that the early start will "help bring about a peaceful settlement" in tune with the needs of 90,000 GE workers represented by IUE in company plants across the nation.

GE workers are determined to win a fair settlement, Jennings said. Substantial improvements are needed in many areas "and we intend to bring this home to the company," he declared.

The current contract expires Oct. 26 and the mandatory bargaining period under the law begins 60 days prior to that. The union under the law also served a notice of contract termination on GE.

IUE is a member of the AFL-CIO Coordinated Bargaining Committee of 10 unions that bargain with GE and Westinghouse, the nation's largest electrical manufacturing firms. The committee announced that it has set aside the week beginning Aug. 24 as "CBC Unity Week." Its purpose, said Chairman James D. Compton of the inter-union steering committee, is to inform the public of CBC's demands for "justice at the bargaining table."

During the week nearly 200,000 GE and Westinghouse workers represented by the AFL-CIO unions will spread that message by wearing special buttons and pasting "Unity" stickers on their automobile bumpers.

In plant towns, workers will hold rallies to increase community knowledge of the committee's contract proposals.

Unity Week follows a series of 16 successful "grass roots" rallies held to explain this year's bargaining goals to workers.

Unions represented on the committee, besides IUE, are the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Machinists, Steelworkers, Flint Glass Workers, Plumbers, Technical Engineers, Sheet Metal Workers, Carpenters, and Allied Industrial Workers.

When the talks open next week in New York City, representatives of all the coordinating unions will participate as invited members of the IUE bargaining committee. The right of the unions to such joint action was recently upheld by the 2nd Circuit Court of Appeals.

The start of formal negotiations follows three months of subcommittee meetings between IUE and GE. At these meetings IUE explained its proposals for improved wages and working conditions and strengthened pension and insurance plans, according to Chairman John Shambo of the IUE-GE Conference Board.

IUE's national agreement with Westinghouse expires in mid-November. Formal bargaining is scheduled to begin next month.

NLRB Urged To Shun Union Discipline Area

The AFL-CIO has asked the National Labor Relations Board not to take jurisdiction in union disciplinary action against members, an area which has always been considered an "internal" union matter.

The federation focused on five cases in which the board is being asked not to invoke the labor act "to regulate the amount a union may fine a member for crossing a lawful picket line."

The labor brief pointed out that the board and Congress have historically followed a policy to "allow unions to conduct the great bulk of their disciplinary proceedings free of board direction."

It stressed that the courts have developed some expertise in the area of union discipline of members while the NLRB has not. In addition, it said, taking such jurisdiction would provide an additional workload for the board, which is already seriously overburdened.

The brief said that the "developing trend is to allow an employer to take actions adverse to his employes to blunt the economic pressures of the strike providing that these steps have the least possible long term effect on the strikers, consistent with the achievement of that primary goal."

The brief added:

"The minimum that is clearly appropriate is to allow unions to fine strikebreakers the amount the latter earn during the strike. This is the exact counterpart of the pressure employers bring to bear on employes. . . ."

'Workers to Workers'

OUR INVOLVEMENT with Latin America stems from 1916 when the American Federation of Labor joined with Latin American labor leaders to found the Pan American Federation of Labor. After World War II we expanded significantly our activities throughout the world, including Latin America where we helped to establish the first Inter-American Conference of Workers. In 1951, we also helped to establish the Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers which exists actively to this day, and is known as the ORIT.

In August 1960, when we came to a full realization as to what happened to the Cuban workers and the entire Cuban people under Castro, the AFL-CIO appropriated $20 thousand for the purpose of studying the establishment of a mechanism through which we could help to strengthen the free labor unions of Latin America and develop trade union leadership. This led to the creation of the AIFLD, during the Eisenhower Administration and long before the establishment of the Alliance for Progress.

We did not then and do not now want our Latin American trade union brothers to pattern their unions after our organizations in the United States.

We do expect and hope, however, that they will build unions which are strong, independent, representative of the workers and capable, through their own efforts, of improving the conditions of the workers and making a contribution to the economic development of their own countries.

Throughout the years we had always wanted to see Latin America trade unionists and workers build a more effective labor movement.

THE AFL-CIO HAS ALWAYS had an interest in workers in every part of the world. That is fraternal solidarity, humanitarianism in the best sense of the word. We have a stake in the freedom of workers everywhere. We have learned from experience that when workers in other countries lose their freedom where they are forced to submit to the yoke of a dictatorship or tyrannical government of any kind, their repression and enslavement constitute a grave threat to our own freedom.

For these reasons, AFL-CIO international activities have always been extensive so that in addition to the AIFLD in Latin America, we sponsor institutes conducting a broad range of similar assistance in Africa and Asia. I would like to emphasize, Mr. Chairman, that we are not looking for or trying to recruit members for the AFL-CIO in any country of any of these continents.

In view of our extensive international activities, on which we spend about 20 percent of our income, it was only natural when we looked at Latin America, our closest neighbors in the trade union field, we felt that we had a responsibility as workers to workers—yes, a great humanitarian responsibility—to be of help.

We also felt, as American citizens, that it was certainly in the interest of our country that free governments be achieved and maintained in the Western Hemisphere. Now I'm not going to tell you that we have never made mistakes or performed miracles. Latin America still has its great problems. For example, there is still too much money being spent for unnecessary military hardware in many countries and too little being spent on the welfare of the people. But we are trying to make a contribution to help the working people of these lands play a constructive role in building democratic societies through free trade unions.

'This'll Make It Look Better'

A Word Edgewise:

Filling a College Presidency Is No Longer a Simple Task

By John P. Roche

ONE PROBLEM AREA in American higher education that has not received sufficient attention is the acute shortage of candidates for college presidencies and deanships. Figures vary somewhat, but it would seem that about 200 colleges and universities are seeking presidents, and the number of empty offices awaiting deans may range as high as 2,000.

Columbia, Cornell, Pennsylvania, Dartmouth, Duke—to mention only a few of the most prestigious institutions—all have committees industriously screening candidates. Since they operate like the government in never making a hard offer until they are certain it will be accepted, there is little information available on turndowns.

However, a friend who was sounded out by several schools suggests they are having real trouble. He thanked them but politely informed the search committee that he would sooner join the Marines—"there you get medals for valor."

Finding a new president used to be rather simple. The board of trustees merely settled on a man it liked and trusted, and that was that. It was not a model system by any means, but at least it provided presidents. Now we have participatory bureaucracy: everybody gets into the act. In addition to the trustees, the alumni, the faculty, and often the students are involved. The result is chaos.

A university president today has an unenviable set of obligations. His primary task is to raise money either from private donors or, in public institutions, from the legislature and ultimately the taxpayers. To keep his school going, he may have to raise as much as 80 percent of his annual budget; even the biggest endowments provide only a small fraction of yearly costs.

The young, of course, despise fund-raising and the faculty, while eager enough for annual raises, looks with Olympian contempt on a fund-raiser. It is therefore sudden death to announce to a joint selection committee that a candidate can raise money.

The president is also supposed to be an educator, an administrator, a psychiatrist, and—increasingly—a frontier sheriff. As recent sad events indicate, he needs the constitution of an ox and ideally no nerves at all.

Finally, he needs the moral fiber of a Christian martyr because no matter what he does, at least half of his constituents are going to denounce him as a traitor. He can well expect the ultimate situation where the faculty and students are vilifying him for selling out to the board of trustees and alumni, and simultaneously the trustees and alumni are reviling him for capitulating to the faculty and students.

Given these variables, it is hardly surprising that there is a shortage of presidents. In fact, one could almost argue that a man's willingness to become a college president should automatically disqualify him. But still the hopeful committees rush to their work in a pattern that is virtually as stereotyped as Russian ballet.

The committee meets bubbling with energy and good will. Its first job is to prepare the ideal list of candidates, and to everyone's delight this is accomplished with minimum argument and friction. The list will include McGeorge Bundy, John Gardner, Kenneth Clark, Pope Paul, Whitney Young, Arthur Goldberg, Ted Kennedy, and Ed Muskie.

THE COMMITTEE ADJOURNS to have these luminaries "felt out" and meets again several months later to learn, with some shock, that there were no nibbles. A new list has to be worked out and at this level tensions begin to rise: the trustees reject several prominent academic "dissenters," the faculty stonewalls a few "military-industrial" complexers, the students hold a mass meeting in behalf of Herbert Marcuse. It gets stickier and stickier.

Six months later in desperation an acting president is appointed from within the institution. Somebody has to keep the store, and since nobody expected much from him, his reputation begins to rise when life goes on without disaster.

Meanwhile the selection committee, grim and morose, goes on, checking by now on presidents of obscure colleges in Ohio and Pennsylvania (states with an amazing number of obscure colleges). And hoping against hope that a candidate will turn up that nobody has anything on.

Sometimes they are successful, but in general I suspect that a number of people are going to carve out significant careers as acting presidents. Indeed, the position of president may be a victim of technological change; the job, as described, is just unfillable.

Tom Mboya:

'When We Are All Free . . .' Differences Will Disappear

By Bayard Rustin

WITH TOM MBOYA'S DEATH, black people throughout the world have lost yet another spokesman for social justice. The Kenyans in mourning for Mboya can well understand the profound grief experienced by Negro Americans last year when Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., was assassinated.

There is a bitter irony in the deaths of these two great leaders. They were both peaceful men who died by violence, and their assassinations brought about events that violated the principles to which they had dedicated their lives. Martin Luther King preached non-violence, yet his death was followed by rioting in over a hundred cities. Tom Mboya had struggled to build a unified nation, and now in Kenya there is the threat of tribal warfare between the Luos and Kikuyus.

The significance of Mboya's nationalist struggle is often misunderstood by Americans who are not familiar with African problems of tribalism. Within the national boundaries of Kenya (and other African states) live different tribes. While these tribes are of the same race, they are often as hostile towards each other as are Negroes and whites in America.

Mboya understood the harmful effects of tribalism, for he saw European colonialists exploit tribal conflicts in order to weaken the Kenyan struggle for national independence. And after independence, he knew that Kenya could not successfully undertake the difficult process of development and nation-building if all her energies were consumed by efforts to keep tribal peace.

Mboya, therefore, was an integrationist for reasons of national strength and survival. He had also dedicated himself to building unity between African nations for a similar reason—that international cooperation and collective strength were in the interest of all black people on the African continent.

Mboya was capable of perceiving a fundamental distinction which is missed by all too many people. He understood that the unique identity of a people is not violated by their inclusion within a larger entity. Which is to say that one can be a member of a tribe as well as a nation, that one can be both a Luo and a Kenyan, a Negro and an American, a member of a particular race and a member of the human community. And even more profoundly, he saw that the creative realization of one's particular identity cannot take place in isolation from the larger community.

It was Mboya's perception of this harmonious distinction which brought him into conflict with some American black nationalists who saw race as the only valid basis for self-realization, and who thought, therefore, that they could easily divest themselves of their American identity and become African.

MBOYA FAVORED and actively encouraged dialogue between Africans and American Negroes, but he was firmly of the position that each had a struggle to wage in his own homeland, and that the race of the Negro, like the tribe of the African, must not be permitted to stand in the way of his nationality.

In this regard, I think it is of the utmost significance that Mboya's final published words were directed towards American Negroes and as such, were part of his lifelong effort to communicate with those whom he called his American "cousins." I quote from his last essay:

"Freedom for both Africans and black Americans is not an act of withdrawal, but a major step in asserting the rights of black people and their place as equals among nations and peoples of the world. Freedom involves the full realization of our identities and potential. It is in this sense that the objective of the African must be the development of his nation and the preservation of his heritage.

"And the objective of the black American must be the achievement of full and unqualified equality within American society. The black American should look to Africa for guidance—and for a chance to give guidance—but not for escape. He must merge his blackness with his citizenship as an American, and the result will be dignity and liberation.

"Black people in Africa and America have survived slavery, colonialism and imperialism. Today we can survive change. We have been oppressed as a people, and have been divided to the point of taking roots in different cultures.

"But as we struggle to achieve our full liberation, these differences should become less important. If and when we are all free and equal men, perhaps even those racial distinctions that now divide our societies and that separate one nation from the other will disappear in the face of our common humanity."

To Meet Its Promise:

Congress Urged to Allocate Needed Funds for Education

CONGRESS MUST put up enough money to match its promises, if America is to have the educational program it needs.

That was the view expressed by Walter G. Davis, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education, in a network radio interview.

Effective solutions to many "hard-core problems" facing the schools are already on the books, said Davis, and demonstration projects show "we have the expertise" to make them work. But, he pointed out, the problem is "insufficient funds to implement the legislation." This has stalled operation of the programs at the local level.

Davis also urged adoption of the proposed four-year extension of the Elementary & Secondary Education Act now in the Senate, rather than the two-year extension offered in the House of Representatives. He said the longer period would permit a "forward programming approach" that would "give school systems enough time to work out programs" without the pressures of a "short-term situation."

Meanwhile, the House voted overwhelmingly to add about $1 billion to the nation's aid to education program which earlier had been slashed down in the Administration's budget proposals.

Davis appeared on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs radio interview, Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EDT, on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

The union educator predicted that proposed block grants for schools will not be included in the law this year. He said that sharp divisions on the issue of block grants versus the present system of categorical aid for schools "could bog down the whole Congress."

"HAVING RECOGNIZED THIS, many people lend themselves to some sort of conciliatory attitude toward compromise" on the issue, he noted.

The AFL-CIO, he said, is opposed to block grants to the states until the educational gap for non-whites is closed, and "in many states, particularly in the South and Southwest, there is still a long way to go."

"The federal government has a different position than the states in trying to close the educational gap," he stressed.

Reporters questioning Davis were John Matthews of the Washington Evening Star and Neil Gilbride of the Associated Press.

WHEN THE APOLLO 11 astronauts landed on the moon, the U.S. Dept. of Labor, like everyone else, got into the act.

Sec. George P. Shultz announced that at least 20,000 formerly jobless Americans helped the astronauts get to the moon and back. He justified this claim on the basis that the 20,000 had been trained on the job in hundreds of Labor Dept. projects which had a direct part in the space program.

"These workers, mostly men," he said, "were employed for training in machine and tool-making factories and even ships at sea."

He cited examples. Some on-the-job trainees were on one of the tracking ships in the Pacific training to be merchant marine deck officers.

There were some 3,300 machine operators and assemblers, trained under Labor Dept. contracts, who are now employed by companies providing the machinery needed by aerospace firms. There were other thousands trained under job programs who worked for space companies of one kind or another.

Proudly the Secretary listed the number of firms who helped build the Apollo 11 and helped launch it, all of them employers of once jobless men trained under different manpower programs.

However justified the Manpower Administration is in claiming its share of glory in the Apollo 11 triumph, there is a deeper importance to its statistics. That is the light they throw on the whole problem of unemployment in the United States and its tragic waste of American manpower and American lives in our economy as a whole.

The fact that 20,000 once jobless and unskilled men made their contribution to an astounding feat of science and organization, is a thrilling one. Not only did the nation benefit greatly, but the workers themselves must have felt a glow of pride in the knowledge of their contribution as they watched the television that stirring day.

But what of the millions who for one reason or another have been denied the chance to make their contributions to Apollo 11 or to the less glamorous jobs that in their own way are no less vital to the nation's welfare?

When the Dept. of Labor issued its report on the employment situation for June 1969, it made this succinct statement:

"There were 3.4 million persons unemployed in June."

There were all sorts of breakdowns. There were 2,349,000 who had been unemployed for less than 5 weeks; 680,000 had been jobless for from 5 to 14 weeks; 370,000 15 weeks and over; 128,000 of those for 27 weeks or more.

There were figures for white workers and for non-white workers; for boys and girls, for married men and women, for farm workers and industrial workers.

Everything was there except the fact that these 3.4 million workers were men and women who could feel neither the joy of making their contribution to the nation's welfare, nor the thrill of contributing to Apollo 11.

THE WASTE that this involves—not only of physical production but of the human spirit—is tragic.

More than ever, it emphasizes the immense importance of the nation's manpower training programs. More than ever it sounds a warning against permitting these programs to die or to be downplayed to the point where they lose their effectiveness.

The Nixon Administration, although it cut back on the Job Corps, has promised great stress on training programs. Shultz has called for the training of more than a million persons during the current year. He has also asked for more funds.

The Administration has emphasized the role of private business in the manpower program although there is legitimate doubt on this point. It has played down the importance of the government as the employer of last resort for those who are not adaptable to training in high skills or who will not be reached by current programs.

All this adds to the importance of congressional action to make sure that the training and job programs get top priority.

CONGRESS MUST MEET its promises of better schools with enough money to fulfill them, AFL-CIO Education Dir. Walter G. Davis, center, said on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by John Matthews, left, of the Washington Evening Star and Neil Gilbride of the Associated Press. The public affairs program is broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EDT, on Mutual radio.

Lower Wage Floor for Teenagers Would Hurt, Not Help, AFL-CIO Says

High teenage unemployment can't be blamed on the federal wage-hour law, regardless of what some opponents of a higher minimum wage say.

An AFL-CIO analysis of the Fair Labor Standards Act pinpoints the cause as a combination of factors, including a sharp rise in the number of 16- to 19-year-olds in the labor force and a decline in the number of part-time jobs traditionally filled by teenagers.

The analysis, by Francis X. Burkhardt of the AFL-CIO legislative staff, appears in the July issue of the American Federationist.

"Many employers would be more happy to hire teenagers at a lower wage than adult workers," Burkhardt noted. This is because low-wage employers are the ones who are affected most by the minimum wage.

However, millions of adult workers would lose their jobs under a two-step minimum wage that allowed a lower rate for teenagers.

The advocates of a lower minimum wage for teenagers contend that the younger worker is less productive than the adult. But this would bring four clear social disadvantages, Burkhardt points out. They are:

- Displacement of working family heads.
- Discrimination against young workers.
- A loss of dignity in the work performed by teenagers.
- Higher profits for employers who hire teenagers in lieu of adults to give them an unfair advantage over other employers.

The roots of the teenage unemployment problem of the 1960s can be found in the sharp rise of the birthrate after the end of World War II, the author observes. And although the total employment of teenagers has increased in the '60s, it has not been enough to match this influx.

Between 1948 and 1958 the number of teenagers in the labor force actually declined—reflecting the low birthrate of the depression years of the 1930s.

"But in the 10 years—1958-68—the number of 16- to 19-year-olds in the labor force skyrocketed 50 percent, from 4.3 million to 6.6 million," Burkhardt writes.

Another factor is that many part-time jobs, once held by teenagers, have disappeared. Farm mechanization abolished many teenage farm jobs. The decline of small neighborhood stores also dried up many job opportunities for the younger workers.

"In addition, there has been the increasing participation in the labor force of married women—35 years of age and over—which results in some degree of job competition with teenagers," Burkhardt says.

Non-white teenagers have suffered even more from unemployment, which in recent months has been running almost three times higher than the rate for the white younger workers.

The two major factors affecting the higher joblessness among young Negroes are racial discrimination in education and hiring and the high rate of migration of Negroes from the rural South to the cities, Burkhardt reports.

Burkhardt recommends a federal program of public service employment—for both adults and teenagers—for long-term unemployed and seriously underemployed to meet the needs of services in parks, recreation centers, hospitals, schools and other public and private non-profit facilities.

Expanded efforts in the Neighborhood Youth Corps and the Job Corps are recommended as a means of cutting the unemployment problem.

"The solid base of increasing teenage employment of the 1960s and the start of federal aid for education, manpower training and youth employment programs should be continued and improved," he urges.

"Such continued progress and the expected leveling off of the rise of teenagers in the labor force in the coming years could begin to solve the teenage unemployment problem. But what should not be done is to establish a special, lower minimum wage for teenagers," Burkhardt warns.

United Airline Strike Voted By Machinists

United Air Lines ground personnel represented by the Machinists voted by a margin of more than 97 percent to authorize a strike if one becomes necessary in current contract negotiations.

General Chairman George J. Robinson of IAM District 141 reported that nearly 14,000 of the union's 18,000 United members cast ballots. The turnout was unusually heavy for a vacation period, he said.

The vote was taken after IAM negotiators reported that the big airline is now offering less than it did last May before union members voted down a previous company offer. Robinson said the IAM will renew its efforts for a peaceful settlement when the National Mediation Board calls the parties together again after a recess.

SEIU Pact Settles Cleveland Strike

Cleveland, O. — Members of Service Employes Local 47 voted to accept a contract with new management of Ingleside Mental Hospital and resumed work after a nine-month strike.

The workers struck last October after the former management refused to negotiate a contract. New operators took over after Cleveland City Council passed an ordinance giving unions the right to seek court action when an employer refuses to recognize employe bargaining rights.

The new owners granted union recognition and an immediate wage increase.

Meany Hits 'Insult':

Fulbright's Attack On AIFLD Scored

Latin American unionists are similar to the Fulbright Scholarship program in which students from other nations study in the United States with help from the U.S. government. Fulbright was noticeably upset by the comparison.

Meany's statement to the committee also attacked a Fulbright assertion that U.S. auditors could find "no specific conclusion" as to the relative success of AIFLD. It was based on a May 1968 letter written by Comptroller General Elmer B. Staats.

Meany noted that Fulbright had quoted only the first sentence of a paragraph that went on to praise AIFLD as "a realistic and imaginative approach" to Western Hemisphere problems, helping workers in Latin America to "become more active in the economic and social progress" of their countries.

"It is most incomprehensible," Meany said, that Fulbright would lift a sentence out of context from a paragraph "obviously intended to be quite complimentary of AIFLD."

Thousands of workers in Latin America have benefited from AIFLD's educational programs, Meany pointed out, in that union leaders and technicians trained in the U.S. have been able to take their acquired skills back and in turn teach others.

The second phase of AIFLD's work — its sponsorship of social projects in Latin America — has helped unions there "play a more vital and positive role in the economic and social development of their countries," Meany said.

He noted that AIFLD is "the largest U.S. sponsor of workers' low cost housing in Latin America" with housing programs in 12 different countries.

He described a workers' housing bank established by AIFLD in Lima, Peru; wide-ranging "campesino" programs in Latin America which provide educational and vocational training, and legal assistance; help to unions in starting credit unions and cooperatives.

Meany submitted with his statement a resolution adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council in May 1954 which spelled out labor's policy in Indo-China (of which Viet Nam was then a part). It called for free elections and United Nations action in the area.

"We had a policy then as now on Viet Nam," Meany declared. "Who paid us off then?" he asked acidly. "You are really stretching your imagination," he told Fulbright.

"It is a gratuitous insult to the American labor movement to accuse us of receiving a payoff for supporting the foreign policy of any administration," Meany declared.

Fulbright said he would "withdraw" the payoff charge, but he then added that there was a "close relationship" between labor and the previous Administration by which AIFLD was given money "to do as you please with."

"To do as we please?," Meany retorted. "That's not so. We are checked every step of the way [on expenditures]."

Fulbright read parts of newpaper articles critical of AIFLD, which he said he was "putting into the record." When he came to one that charged the program was promoting "revolutions," Meany said, "That's the Commie line."

He explained that he did not mean that the author or the newspaper was influenced by the Communists but that the arguments they used to discredit AIFLD were the same arguments used by the Communists.

At one point, Fulbright attacked AIFLD because some labor leaders who took its courses later became involved in politics in their countries. Meany answered, "We have no way of controlling people. But we are not involved in Latin American politics."

This exchange caused McGee to ask if perhaps the committee shouldn't get a "list" of Fulbright scholars to determine "if they became activists" upon returning home.

In his testimony, Meany brought out another point. He called Fulbright after the July 14 hearing to see if he could talk to the senator alone about his remarks. "No one else on the committee suggested a payoff," Meany said.

Continuing, Meany pointed out that it was Fulbright who insisted that it was a "committee matter." He added that he came before the committee "because you wanted me here."

"I'm not here pleading for the program, I'm here to set you straight that this is not a political payoff," Meany declared.

Nixon Urges Federal Standards On Occupational Safety, Health

At least three board members would be experts on health and safety.

Under the bill being prepared by the Labor Dept., the board would begin enforcing the standards on July 1, 1972.

The board would be directed to adopt "national consensus standards" already established by industry, labor and other organizations. It would initiate standards in areas where none exists.

If the Secretary of Labor or the Secretary of Health, Education & Welfare object to any such "national consensus standards" they may bring that objection before the board for a full public hearing.

The Secretary of Labor would have the initial role in enforcing standards that the board establishes. He would bring complaints of violations before the board. If the board determined a violation exists it could issue orders the Secretary could seek to enforce in court. In some situations, the Secretary would be allowed to go directly to the courts.

Violation of the standards would be subject to a fine of up to $10,000, and the board would be authorized to ban employer violations from government contracts for the next three years.

The legislation would encourage the states to adopt their own health and safety regulations if they were as strict as the federal standards. The federal standards would continue to apply in states not producing board approved plans.

The standards set by the board would apply to all employers except for federal, state and local governments and agriculture employers who do not use more than 500 man-days of hired labor a year.

A National Advisory Committee on Occupational Safety & Health would be set up to advise the Secretary of Labor and the Secretary of Health, Education & Welfare in administering the law.

Nixon, in his message, observed that "few people realize the extent of needless illness, needless injury and needless death which results from unsafe or unhealthy working condition.

"Every year in this country some 14,000 deaths can be attributed to work-related injuries or illnesses. . . .

"It is interesting to note that in the last five years, the number of man-days lost because of work-related injuries has been 10 times the number lost because of strikes."

The President emphasized that the "most important consequence" of losses due to sickness or accidents on the job is the "human tragedy" that occurs through the suffering of the worker who is struck down and his family.

"In addition," he said, "the economy loses millions of dollars in unrealized production and millions more must be used to pay workmen's compensation benefits and medical expenses."

Reforms, Reductions:

Summary of Key Provisions In House-Approved Tax Bill

The tax bill passed by the House breaks down into two main sections: One contains the provisions that grant tax relief while the other embodies reforms that close or narrow certain loopholes in the federal tax structure.

Added to the measure is a section that extends the income tax surcharge at a 5 percent rate for six months beyond Jan. 1, 1970, repeals the 7 percent business investment credit, and extends excise taxes on automobiles and telephones.

The following is a summary of major provisions dealing with tax relief and tax reform:

TAX RELIEF — Individual income tax cuts are spread over three years, rising to a total of $8 billion in 1972. Virtually all taxpayers will get some relief under the bill.

The present top tax rate of 70 percent would be reduced to 65 percent for investment income over the two years and a maximum rate of 50 percent would be imposed on earned income.

The standard deduction, for the person who doesn't file an itemized return, is raised from 10 to 15 percent over three years. The maximum amount of the deduction is raised from $1,000 to $2,000, also from 1970 through 1972.

Each taxpaying unit, whether a single person or a family, would be given a minimum standard deduction of $1,100. For 1970, this amount would be available only on a limited basis to incomes above the poverty level, but after that it would be fully effective.

By adding the minimum personal exemption of $600 per person to this new $1,100 standard deduction, single persons with gross incomes of up to $1,700 would be exempt from any federal income tax. Incomes up to $3,500 for a family of four similarly would be exempt, and so on.

Single persons 35 years of age or more and any person whose spouse has died would benefit from reduced tax rates — halfway between the lower rates available to married couples and the higher rates currently applicable to single persons.

This change would be effective next year as would one permitting widows and widowers with dependent children or children in school to file on the present split-income basis open to married couples. The children must be under 20.

The present deduction for moving expenses, when changing jobs, is expanded to cover expenses for house-hunting trips, temporary living expenses prior to finding a new home, and expenses related to selling an old home or buying a new one. Total deductions for these additional categories is limited to $2,500.

The bill would simplify an existing income-averaging provision that lets a taxpayer with unusually large earnings in a single year spread them over several years for tax purposes.

TAX REFORM — The capital gains tax on individuals and corporations is altered in a number of respects:

For an individual, the present maximum tax rate of 25 percent on capital gains would be repealed. The rate for those in the top brackets could go as high as 32.5 percent under the bill. The period that assets must be held before profits from their sale are eligible for capital gains treatment would be extended from six months to 1 year.

The corporate tax rate on long-term capital gains would be increased from 25 to 30 percent. Employers' contributions to pension plans, when paid as part of a lump-sum distribution, will not receive capital gains treatment.

These changes, along with several others affecting individuals and employers, are expected to increase federal revenue by nearly $800 million a year.

An individual having income from any of five types of sources that now goes untaxed would be required to pay taxes on half of such income above $10,000. Among these income categories are interest on tax-exempt state and municipal bonds and the excluded half of long-term capital gains. Anticipated revenue gain when the plan becomes fully effective after next Jan. 1 would be $85 million annually.

A companion provision would require allocation of personal deductions between taxable income and tax free income on the same five sources, plus two other relating to percentage depletion and intangible drilling allowances. This provision could increase yearly revenue by more than $450 million when fully effective.

Any stock dividends that increase the holder's proportionate interest in a corporation's assets and earnings would be taxed. Preferred stock and preferred stock-rights distributions would be treated as taxable income. Certain stock transfers to employes under stock plans also would be taxed.

A federal subsidy is authorized to states and municipalities on bonds they issue, making the payment equal to the average cost of the additional interest plus some additional amount. The revenue gain by taxation of previously tax-exempt interest has been estimated at $100 million a year.

There would be tightened tax treatment on charitable contributions by phasing out an unlimited deduction now allowed in some areas.

There would be prohibitions against wealthy persons operating farms at a "paper loss" through accounting gimmicks and removal of capital gains treatment on certain farm operations. These changes would eventually bring in an added $20 million a year.

Topping the major new business tax provisions in amount of anticipated revenue are:

Restrictions on accelerated depreciation of real estate and tightening of real estate tax recapture provisions, except for housing construction, that may bring in as much as $1.3 billion in new revenue in 10 years.

A reduction of the 27.5 percent gas and oil depletion allowance to 20 percent, discontinuance of it completely on foreign production, and a scaling down of allowances on most other minerals. Annual revenue increase is estimated at $450 million.

Another provision to remove capital gains treatment for commercial banks on profits from bonds, eliminate special tax advantages on bank reserves and listed debts, and remove previous tax advantages given to special reserves for bad debt losses. Annual revenue gain is set at $300 million.

Among other major business tax provisions are:

- Revision of the foreign tax credit to allow recapture of tax benefits claimed due to a loss in a foreign country to the extent of profits realized in subsequent years in that same country. Another change would limit the tax escape on foreign mineral income. The estimated revenue gain is $40 million a year.
- Elimination of multiple tax exemptions over a period of eight years. These have permitted a corporation to divide up into branches to get down to a 28 percent rate on the first $25,000 of income for each branch instead of the regular 48 percent for larger businesses. Revenue gain is seen as $30 million.
- Disallowance in some cases of interest deducted in connection with bond issues used to purchase other unrelated businesses — the conglomerate mergers. This, along with other new tax methods on corporate mergers, would eventually bring in an added $40 million.

There are other provisions that would prevent companies from passing on accelerated depreciation to stockholders in a tax-free manner, set new yardsticks for determining depreciation and the income or loss of certain corporations, apply the new taxes on bad debt reserves proposed for commercial banks to savings and loan associations. They would bring in about $75 million yearly.

The bill calls for substantial curbs on activities of foundations to: (1) prevent self-dealing (borrowing) between a founder and his foundation, (2) require distribution of their income for charitable purposes, (3) limit their holdings of private businesses, (4) assure that their investments are not endangered by financial speculation.

Foundations not living up to these and several other new requirements would pay additional taxes or penalties. In addition, foundations would pay a 7.5 percent tax on net investment income.

Other present tax exempt organizations—churches, social welfare clubs, civic league and fraternal organizations—would pay taxes on unrelated business income.

A patronage dividend deduction allowed to cooperatives would be continued only if at least 50 percent of the dividend allocated is distributed in cash by the end of a 10-year period.

DISTINGUISHED SERVICE Citation of the Office of Civil Defense is presented to retired AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler by John E. Davis, left, national director of Civil Defense. Schnitzler had been on the Labor Advisory Council to the Civil Defense director and had testified frequently before Congress in support of civil defense programs. Schnitzler retired June 31.

Tax Reform, Rate Cuts Get House Clearance

The committee revised reductions in rates to include the lowest five tax percentages which had not been changed in the original committee bill.

There also was action in the Rules Committee. Before sending the bill to the floor moves were defeated to hold up a House vote on it until after Labor Day and to permit a floor amendment to drop extension of the income tax surcharge at 5 percent for six months after Jan. 1, 1970.

The bill's surcharge section also would eliminate the 7 percent tax credit on business investments and extend current automobile and telephone excise taxes.

Earlier, the House approved a Senate-passed extension of the 10 percent income tax surcharge to Jan. 1, 1970, by a vote of 237-170.

The House tax bill contains substantial relief for the poor, including a special low-income allowance expanded beyond what was proposed by Pres. Nixon.

Tax relief also goes to the middle and upper income groups. Those at the top of the annual income scale—$100,000 or more—will pay more taxes than before, taken as a group, due to reforms.

Tax relief for middle income families centers on a provision raising the standard deduction from 10 to 15 percent over three years, and maximum deduction from $1,000 to $2,000 over the same period.

Single persons, widows and widowers over 35 would be provided lower tax rates than they now have. Widows and widowers with dependent children in school would get a better tax break. There would be additional tax allowances connected with moving expenses in changing jobs.

On the reform side, the individual's maximum capital gains tax rate of 25 percent would be repealed. The rate for those in top brackets could go as high as 32.5 percent under the bill. The holding period required before the sale of an asset is entitled to a capital gains treatment would be extended from six months to a year.

The corporate tax rate on long-term capital gains would be increased from 25 to 30 percent. These changes and several others in the capital gains area are expected to increase federal revenue by nearly $800 million a year.

Other provisions in the bill include:

- A cut to 20 percent in the 27.5 percent oil depletion allowance.
- Imposition, under certain circumstances, of a tax on interest receipts from state and local bonds.
- A "minimum tax" on certain income that now goes untaxed.
- Taxes on some previously untaxed stock dividends and stock transfers.
- Prohibitions against wealthy persons operating "hobby farms" to get a tax advantage.
- Revision of foreign tax credits, elimination of tax breaks to multiple corporations, and other new measures to extract more taxes from businesses.
- Repeal over five years of a special provision that allows unlimited deduction of charitable contributions by some of the nation's wealthiest individuals.

All told, the bill provides for tax cuts for individuals that would total a little over $8 billion by 1972. Its reforms—eliminating some deductions and restricting others—would bring in an estimated $7 billion by then.

Construction Safety Bill Awaits Nixon Signature

The House gave final approval to the construction safety bill after accepting Senate amendments and sent it to the White House for the President's signature.

The bill is a long-sought objective of millions of U.S. building trades workers, Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. said in urging Pres. Nixon to sign it.

"This legislation is the first major labor bill to be approved by the 91st Congress, and the first of your Administration," Haggerty said for himself and the presidents of 17 unions affiliated with the BCTD.

The bill is significant also because it is the first federal safety bill aimed at protecting construction workers, said Haggerty. He suggested that it would "set a pattern for future federal safety legislation."

The cost of implementing it will be "minimal when compared to the lives that will be saved and the needless disabling injuries which will be prevented," he wrote.

At present, construction workers on federal and federally assisted construction projects are covered only by the Davis-Bacon Act, requiring payment of the prevailing wage. Other groups of government contractors—suppliers and service contractors—are required by law to provide safe and healthful working conditions.

The bill corrects the exclusion of construction workers from the legislative pattern. It provides that no contractor or subcontractor on federal or federally-assisted projects may require any laborer or mechanic to work under conditions that are "unsanitary, harzardous, or dangerous to his health or safety." Standards are to be set by the Secretary of Labor after public hearings.

The 2,800 construction workers killed on the job in 1968 reflect "the highest death rate for industry in the United States," the bill's sponsors said.

They included Sen. Harrison Williams (D-N.J.), Sen. Jacob Javits (R-N.Y.), Sen. Ralph W. Yarborough (D-Tex.), Rep. Carl D. Perkins (D-Ky.) and Rep, Dominick V. Daniels (D-N.J.).

Disaster Feared:

Action Urged to Halt Interest Rate Spiral

CIO Vice Pres. Joseph D. Keenan, chairman of the federation's Housing Committee. He also is secretary of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

The statement adopted by the meeting urged Nixon to voice his opposition to high interest policies and "use his great influence and power to bring a rollback in interest rates."

Nixon also was called on to withdraw tax and loan accounts, on which no interest is paid to the government, from banks that "refuse to cooperate and continue to raise interest rates."

Further, the Administration was asked to investigate through the Justice Dept. the recent action of big banks in raising the prime interest rate they charge their biggest and best customers to an "astounding" 8.5 percent.

"The virtual unanimity of banks in adopting the higher rates strongly suggests the possibility of a conspiracy," the statement said.

Congress, for its part, was called upon to pass legislation that will curb interest rates, and direct the Federal Reserve Board to sharply reduce the "exorbitant" cost of credit.

"High interest rates are not ordained by nature," the statement said. "They are man-made—made by bankers seeking greater profits and government unwilling to take positive action in favor of the borrower and the public generally."

"The tools to reverse the upward trend of interest rates exist; we call for their use," it concluded.

Keenan said the "grave concern" of trade unionists about high interest rates is not difficult to understand. "Simply put," he stated, "excessive interest rates are cutting our buying power and putting us out of work."

He pointed out that interest rates are in the price of everything the worker buys—from food to the TV set, from the automobile to the price of housing or rent for an apartment.

"So a rise in interest rates is a rise in prices." he said. "The bankers cut the buying power of our pay."

To show how serious this pay cut can be, Keenan cited a June 17 article in the Wall Street Journal which assembled government figures on the decline in a paycheck's buying power over recent months.

The article noted that debate is growing over whether the economy "can survive today's record smashing interest rates without sinking into a recession." But, it added, many Americans already are in a recession.

Bankers must be told "in loud and clear terms: Enough," Keenan concluded. "The American people want no more of this bankers' game of Russian roulette with the fate of our jobs and our paychecks."

Other speakers included:

- Pres. Tony T. Dechant of the National Farmers Union, who said the farmer has watched "the storm of higher and higher interest rates grow until it now threatens the economic life of family agriculture." He added, "There seems to be no limit to the greed of bankers."
- Erma Angevine, executive director, Consumer Federation of America, who said that debt is an ever-increasing burden to consumers "with interest payments on mortgages and installment loans now exceeding 22 percent of the average consumer's after-tax income."
- Clarence Mitchell of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, who charged that banking policies are creating "catastrophe in the area of housing" — nullifying government programs to help the poor obtain decent shelter.
- John J. Gunther, executive director of the U.S. Conference of Mayors, who said high interest rates are causing cities to put off the building of sewers, health centers, schools and hospitals "because they can't afford to finance them."

Others attacking high interest policies and explaining their harsh affects were: Dr. Michael Sumichrast of the National Association of Home Builders, Wallace Campbell, president of the Foundation for Cooperative Housing, and Bernard Hillenbrand, executive director of the National Association of Counties.

Appearing to voice support for the emergency meeting's program were Senators Fred R. Harris (D-Okla.), William Proxmire (D-Wis.) and Alan Cranston (D-Calif.), and Chairman Wright Patman (D-Tex.) of the Housing Banking & Currency Committee.

'I Built the Foundation Myself'

$1 Billion School Aid Hike Marred By Curb on Desegregation Rules

After three days of debate, the House nailed down a more than $1 billion boost in the Nixon Administration's education budget. But it also delivered a blow to school desegregation efforts.

The Nixon budget called for $5 billion less for education programs this fiscal year than the school aid law authorized. The House Appropriations Committee increased Nixon's education requests by $123 million.

The House in approving a $17.5 billion budget for the departments of Labor and Health, Education & Welfare provided $894.5 million more than the committee recommended. The final vote, 393-16, upheld an earlier vote which put in the extra money. That key vote was 242-106.

If sustained by the Senate, the school funds of $4.2 billion will be the largest provided in a single year. Most of the additional money will go to aiding schools in federally impacted areas, schools in poverty areas, vocational education and student loans.

On the negative side, the House put into the bill an amendment sponsored by Rep. Jamie L. Whitten (D-Miss.) which would prevent cutoff of federal aid to school districts that refuse to comply with desegregation orders.

House liberals fought a battle to knock out the amendment, which passed the House last year but was stopped in the Senate. They lost in a 157-153 teller vote.

The Nixon Administration took no position on the amendment even though it was urged to oppose the restriction by a number of representatives, including Rep. Silvio O. Conte (R-Mass.). There still has been no comment on the amendment by the Administration.

The House also approved an amendment calling upon colleges and universities to cut off funds to students who take part in campus disorders. However, the curb would be left up to the educational institutions, with no federal enforcement included.

The House also passed, by a voice vote, a bill to increase veterans' educational training allowances by an average of 27 percent. The measure, which also would boost the subsistence allowance for disabled veterans in educational training, would affect nearly 750,000 persons.

In the Senate, the Administration's program to begin building the Safeguard anti-ballistic missile system survived key tests by hairline margins.

An amendment that would have halted the Safeguard system completely while permitting continued development of other ABM systems was defeated 51-50, with Vice Pres. Agnew casting an unneeded vote against it. In the Senate, a tie vote defeats an amendment.

Following that vote, the Senate, by 51-49, defeated another amendment that would have halted building of Safeguard installations but would have allowed continued research and development of the system.

The difference between the two votes was that Sen. Margaret Chase Smith (R-Me.), who sponsored the first amendment, refused to support the second on the basis that she is completely opposed to the Safeguard system.

Earlier in the debate Mrs. Smith offered an amendment that would have halted all phases of Safeguard without any mention of other systems. It was defeated by an overwhelming 89-11 vote.

The Senate rejected, 70-27, an amendment offered by Sen. Thomas J. McIntyre (D-N.H.) which would have authorized all of the Nixon program except actual installation of missiles. Many Safeguard opponents voted against it on the ground that it was no compromise at all.

In another development, a House Labor subcommittee and the Senate Labor Committee approved bills to regulate the dust level in coal mines in an effort to cut down on "black lung" disease (pneumoconiosis).

The measures also would eliminate a controversial classification of gassy and non-gassy mines by assuming that all mines are gassy. Mines now classified as non-gassy are not required to use special equipment designed to prevent explosions.

The House bill requires that the maximum dust level for mines be 4.5 milligrams per cubic meter of air six months after its enactment and 3 milligrams within a year. The Senate bill would require a 3 milligram level between six months and three years after enactment, and then a 2 milligram level within the next three years.

Rail Waymen Fill Legislative Post

J. R. McGlaughlin is the Maintenance of Way Employes' new legislative representative in Washington, the union announced. McGlaughlin, the union's general chairman on the Gulf, Mobile & Ohio Railroad since 1958, succeeds Ernest Benson who has retired after 21 years in the legislative post.

Labor Arbiter Saul Wallen Dead at 59

New York—Saul Wallen, noted labor arbitrator and head of the New York Urban Coalition, died here of a heart attack at age 59. He had served as an impartial umpire under the AFL-CIO internal disputes plan and his "calm and compassionate understanding of human problems was invaluable," Federation Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland said in a message of sympathy to the family.

Before becoming president of the New York Urban Coalition in 1968, Wallen had written more than 5,000 decisions in labor-management disputes. He was a founder and past president of the National Academy of Arbitrators, and helped develop this city's Office of Collective Bargaining.

His wife, the former Mary Kirschner, and three children survive. Memorial services were held Aug. 6.

Growing Recession Threat Spurs Warning by Council

AFL-CIO EXECUTIVE COUNCIL members heard Dir. of Education Walter G. Davis report that the new Labor Studies Center will become operative in Washington, Sept. 1. The first of 17 one-week special institutes will start in December for union officers and staff members, Davis announced.

Rollback Pushed In Interest Rates

By Saul Miller

New York—The danger of an economic recession "will continue to grow" unless the Administration and Congress act to curb "the greed and avarice of the bankers and to reduce the pressures of profit-inflation and the investment boom," the AFL-CIO warned.

The federation's Executive Council at its mid-summer meeting here said the combination of skyrocketing interest rates and the government's restrictive economic policies have increased the risk of an economic downturn.

The immediate answers are a rollback in the prime interest rate, which has climbed 31 percent in the past year, a Justice Dept. look at possible price-fixing violations by major banks, repeal of the 7 percent tax credit and all fast write-offs except for low and moderate-income housing, and "much-needed reform" of the government's monetary policy and its machinery.

The council's concern with the economic outlook highlighted the two-day meeting at which it also:

- Called the House-passed tax reform bill "a major step down the road to tax justice," but detailed improvements and strengthening which it urged the Senate to carry out. (Story, this page.)
- Urged the U.S. government to place Czech freedom on the agenda for all "future negotiations with Moscow." (Story, Page 3.)
- Voted to recommend to the AFL-CIO convention in October that the per capita payment to the federation by affiliates be increased three cents from 7 to 10 cents per member per month. The action came after the council received a report from a Subcommittee on Finances which reviewed the federation's financial situation and projected its fund needs through 1974.
- Approved a budget of $376,322 for the Labor Studies Center for the period Sept. 1, 1969, through June 30, 1970, after hearing a general progress report on the center from Walter Davis, AFL-CIO director of education. The center becomes operative Sept. 1, 1969, when Prof. Fred Hoehler takes over his full-time duties as director of the center. Seventeen one-week special institutes on a variety of subjects will kick off the center's activities with the first program to begin in December. (Story, Page 3.)

The council received a number of reports on federation operations including legislation, the studies center, the mortgage investment fund, Human Resources Development Institute, civil rights, organizing, farm workers and the Los Angeles Herald Examiner strike.

At a press conference, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said he saw no possibility that the Administration will try to impose wage and price controls; that he doesn't like the trend in unemployment and the drop in housing starts; that high interest rates have not slowed

On Welfare, Manpower:

Meany Says Nixon Programs 'Fall Far Short' of Real Needs

Pres. Nixon's proposals on welfare reform and manpower training establish "laudable goals for his Administration" but the proposals "fall far short—in both direction and need"—if the nation is to attain those goals, the AFL-CIO declared.

Federation Pres. George Meany, in a statement commenting on the President's program, cited organized labor's deep concern "for those in America who live in poverty and do not enjoy the nation's general affluence." (Text, Page 8.)

"We have long shared, and vigorously pressed, the view that the nation's existing welfare system is grossly deficient and in need of comprehensive reform," Meany said.

"We only wish that the President's proposals met that need and would accomplish a substantial and lasting improvement in the condition of the nation's poor. Unfortunately, they do not.

"The presidential messages recognize the problems confronting the nation, but suggest solutions that fall far short of the need."

Nixon outlined his proposals in a televised speech Aug. 8, and followed up with four messages to Congress covering these requests:

- Reform of the federal-state welfare system to eliminate the present program of Aid to Families with Dependent Children and substitution of a nationwide minimum standard of aid to families with children—$1,600 for a family of four. The plan would more than double the number of persons receiving public assistance, currently about 10 million, by covering poor families now ineligible for aid.
- Reorganization of federal manpower training programs to "decentralize" administration and gradually shift operating funds and control to the states (Details, Page 9.)
- A formula for sharing federal revenues with state and local governments for use as they see fit. The amount distributed would start at about $500 million in fiscal 1971 and rise to about $5 billion by fiscal 1976.
- Reorganization of the Office of Economic Opportunity to make it a "laboratory agency" with emphasis on developing innovative programs rather than on operation.

The President, in announcing his welfare reform plan, said, "It aims at getting everyone able to work off welfare rolls and onto payrolls."

Only women with pre-school children—plus the blind, disabled and aged—would not be required to register for either employment or training. The program envisions a system of day-care centers for children whose mothers choose or are required to take jobs or training.

Job Bias Proposal Termed 'Surrender'

An Administration proposal to send job discrimination cases into the federal courts has been termed "another civil rights surrender" by members of the Senate Labor Committee.

The Nixon proposal would authorize the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission to go to court to enforce anti-discrimination laws when conciliation fails.

It would not, however, give the EEOC the power to issue cease-and-desist orders on its own, as would a labor-backed bill sponsored by Senators Harrison Williams (D-N.J.) and Jacob Javits (R-N.Y.).

Various EEOC officials have sought the power to issue cease-and-desist orders since the commission was created under Title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

However, William H. Brown III, the present EEOC chairman, testified in favor of the Administration bill, even though he had termed cease-and-desist orders "absolutely essential" during his confirmation testimony after he was appointed last April.

Senate Urged to Bolster Tax Reform Measure

New York—The tax reform bill passed by the House is "a major step down the road toward tax justice" but it does not go far enough, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

A statement adopted by the council at its meeting here set forth specific steps that the Senate should take to "improve and strengthen" the House bill.

At the same time, it warned, "the Senate must guard against attempts by the lobbyists for special privilege to preserve and widen their special-interest problems."

The bill, as it was originally reported out by the House Ways & Means Committee, contained a major gap that was detected by the AFL-CIO. When the text of the bill became available, the federation's Departments of Research and Legislation examined it and found that millions of families in the $7,000-$13,000 income range who itemize deductions would get no tax cut.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller took the findings to a number of House members, including Rep. Richard Bolling (D-Mo.), a member of the Rules Committee. Bolling introduced, after consultation with the federation, a bill to give tax relief to these families without increasing revenue loss. He sought a rule that

Fire Fighters Seek Funds for Research Act

Pres. William H. McClennan of the Fire Fighters has told a Senate Appropriations subcommittee that the nation's safety requires an immediate start of programs authorized under the Fire Research & Safety Act of 1969.

"The United States, the most advanced industrial nation of the world, believe it or not, has the worst fire safety record," McClennan said.

"Each year, the accidental death, injury, and loss of property caused by fire in the United States is second only to the loss in automobile accidents. This alone should be cause for immediate steps to cut that loss. For the social loss inflates the physical loss. Fires leave families torn, breadwinners without jobs, communities economically depressed long after the flames are extinguished."

McClennan said "It is imperative that $500,000 be provided immediately to activate the proposed National Commission on Fire Prevention & Control" set up under the act. This would allow the commission to begin a study and investigation of more effective fire control and fire prevention methods.

Also testifying was Jack A. Waller, IAFF legislative representative. He said funding of the Act—hopefully to a limit of $5 million—"is absolutely essential if fire protection in America is to be kept at the level of efficiency which the public has a right to expect."

McClennan and Waller said modern living conditions call for development of new devices for protection of life and property from fire.

Board Told to End Delay In IAM Airline Dispute

The National Mediation Board was ordered by a U.S. District Court judge to proffer arbitration in deadlocked negotiations between the Machinists and National Airlines. But the board asked for a 30-day stay of the order pending an appeal to higher courts.

Judge Gerhard A. Gesell of the District Court for the District of Columbia took an action believed unprecedented when he ordered the board to "discontinue any efforts to bring about an amicable settlement" of the dispute and directed it to take the next step under the Railway Labor Act, by proffering arbitration. That would permit the union to strike after 30 days, an action barred during the mediation period.

The court, in a written opinion sharply critical of the mediation board, said the case is "so familiar in this jurisdiction where an agency of the United States government, accused of acting arbitrarily and capriciously, persists in seeking to avoid judicial scrutiny of its conduct."

Noting "the board has enormous power," Gesell said "when the board is responsibly accused of abusing its powers, it must answer to the court or take the consequences. It cannot invoke immunity from judicial scrutiny on the ground that it, and it alone, knows what is best."

The judge ruled "it is entirely appropriate for the union to challenge the board's unwillingness to abandon mediation." He said the board "not only refused to supply the information requested . . . but continued to resist after the court ordered that answers . . . be filed."

Since the board "refuses to give any indications of the reason why it expects mediation to be productive, the court can only conclude that mediation will not be productive," Gesell wrote. He added: "Since the board is unwilling to permit the court to inquire into the board's processes, the board must take the consequences of its intransigence."

Contract talks broke down last December. The union asked that a mediator be assigned to the dispute. When the NMB made no response, the IAM went to court to compel the assignment of a mediator. Finally it filed a request for an injunction when mediation proved unproductive.

Shortly before Gesell's decision, the union sued the airline for $40 million damages for losses suffered by more than 1,000 members who were locked out following a work stoppage over a safety dispute. National has been attempting to fly since Jan. 21 with maintenance done by supervisors and new hires, IAM Vice Pres. W. W. Winpisinger said.

Norfolk Metal Trades Charge 'Fraud' by Rival

The AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. has accused the National Association of Government Employes of using "fraudulent and deceitful tactics" in gaining permission for an election among 7,800 blue collar workers at the Norfolk, Va., Naval Shipyard.

Pres. Maywood Boggs said his department has filed with the Secretary of the Navy an appeal from a decision of the shipyard's commanding officer that NAGE had gained enough workers' signatures to justify an election.

Blue collar workers at Norfolk have been represented by the 5th Naval District Metal Trades Council since 1923. The council has held exclusive bargaining rights for such employes since October 1963 and bargaining agreements since 1964 under Executive Order 10988, which governs federal employe labor relations.

Boggs' appeal charges that NAGE, an unaffiliated union, altered and without authority reproduced the government's Standard Form 1187, which is available to unions for their purchase from the Government Printing Office.

The form is used to obtain employe authorizations for checking off union dues payments at federal installations.

The council charged that while federal rules specifically limit use of the form to unions holding formal or exclusive recognition, NAGE solicited workers to sign its altered Form 1187 though it holds neither formal nor exclusive recognition for wage board workers at the Norfolk yard.

This action, the Metal Trades Dept. said, "caused many workers to believe that NAGE was soliciting their signature for membership dues deductions with the official blessing and sanction of the U.S. government" and its shipyard.

The appeal also charged improper conduct by NAGE in offering to pay $20 to shipyard workers who secure five signatures on the forms, its offer of free dues for six months to those who sign the form, and its offer of free death - and - dismemberment insurance for six months.

Boggs said he is confident the facts will induce the Navy secretary to agree that the evidence considered by yard authorities in granting NAGE's election request was based on fraud or deception or both.

The Metal Trades Council has an agreement with the shipyard that was due to expire last June 26 but has been extended until the election request has been disposed of.

Ex-Congressman O'Hara Dies at 87

Former Rep. Barratt O'Hara, oldest member of the U.S. House of Representatives until his defeat last year, died of a heart ailment at 87. Funeral services were scheduled in Washington and Chicago, with burial in the latter city.

O'Hara turned to the law and politics after a newspaper career. He was lieutenant governor of Illinois at 30.

He won his first House seat at 66 in 1948. Defeated for re-election, he won again in 1952 and stayed until he lost to Rep. Abner J. Mikva in the Illinois Democratic primary last year.

O'Hara was a strong supporter of liberal causes, particularly of aid to emerging African nations. He fought for years to abolish the House Committee on Un-American Activities.

In West Virginia Strike:

Labor Shocked by Attempted Slaying

New York—The AFL-CIO Executive Council strongly condemned an assassination attempt on two leaders of striking West Virginia State Roads Commission employes and reaffirmed its full support of the strikers and their struggle for union recognition.

A bullet, fired Aug. 5 by an unidentified assailant, tore through the windshield of an auto parked outside Laborers Hall in Charleston, W.Va., by staff representatives William E. Roehl of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization and James Tuminello of the Laborers. Later the union reported other incidents in what it called an apparent pattern of organized harassment.

The council said "we are shocked and greatly concerned at the apparent attempt to take the lives of two AFL-CIO leaders" who are coordinating the strike of 1,700 road employes.

The shot can "only be interpreted as an attempt to substitute force and fear for reason and logic" to settle the issues in dispute. The statement added: "If it was the intention of the would-be assassins to discourage support . . . this atrocious act will fail to achieve that end, just as all such acts have failed in the past."

Council members urged "responsible authorities to use every available means" to bring the parties involved to justice.

Narrow Miss

Tuminello was reaching for the door on the passenger's side, and Roehl was approaching the car on the other side when the shot was fired — apparently from bushes alongside the highway. It missed Tuminello by about four inches.

The two men told Charleston detectives they have no clue to the identity of the assailant.

The shooting was the first note of violence since 3,500 highway workers walked out Mar. 3 for recognition of their union, the Laborers. They were then dismissed by Republican Gov. Arch A. Moore, who has since balked at all attempts to settle the dispute except on his own terms—complete surrender, the union has charged.

Roehl was recently named by the AFL-CIO to coordinate strike activities with Tuminello. The shooting followed a step-up in picketing activities and intensified demands for a settlement.

A federal court hearing is slated later this month on a suit charging Moore with violating the constitutional right of state roads employes to join a union.

The suit was filed by the Laborers District Council and employes from each of the road commission's 10 districts when the Moore Administration refused a mediation plan offered by the union.

The suit charges the firing of highway workers was a "drastic, illegal action" in reprisal for their union activity. It accuses the state administration also of "trying to break the strike by hiring strikebreakers" to replace the workers for political purposes.

The strike remains effective and the strikers' morale is high, the union said. As many as 500 strikers have reported for picket duty in a number of the 45 counties involved.

After the shooting, other reports poured into union headquarters. A caller had threatened the life of Pres. Charles Lazelle of LIU's union of nonprofessional employes at West Virginia University. Brakes were disconnected on the parked auto owned by Alex and Peggy Boyd, strike leaders. The Rev. Gene Fountaine, a striker, received several threats over the telephone.

Broad Support Urged for CBC 'Unity Week'

New York—All state and local central bodies have been urged by the AFL-CIO Executive Council to help make the week of Aug. 24—Unity Week—a success for the Coordinated Bargaining Committee of GE and Westinghouse Unions.

Unity Week has been set aside to inform the public and workers involved of CBC's "demands for justice at the bargaining table," the council noted. The week precedes the start of coordinated bargaining by 10 unions representing 200,000 employes of GE and Westinghouse.

"The AFL-CIO wholeheartedly approves the principle of coordinated bargaining and its application" in this case, the statement said. The council called on all central bodies to "cooperate by adopting appropriate resolutions, publicizing them in the labor press" and other media, and working with CBC regional coordinators to help bring a "just and successful conclusion to the crucial 1969 CBC bargaining program."

Recession Risk Rising, Council Warns

Asks Action to Curb Interest Rate Spiral

the rate of capital investment and serve only to roll up profits for bankers.

The federation president said, in reply to a query, that the rollback of interest rates to a 6 percent ceiling would be a good return for "hiring out money," and that the country had lived comfortably with such a rate in past years.

The council voiced its full support for the coordinated bargaining campaigns under way at GE and Westinghouse and called on all state and local central bodies to cooperate in the drive to set up the week of Aug. 24 as Unity Week for the Coordinated Bargaining Committee. (Story, Page 2.)

The council adopted also a statement condemning apparent attempts to "take the lives of two AFL-CIO leaders who are currently coordinating the strike of approximately 1,700 state roads commission employes in West Virginia." The statement called on responsible authorities to use every possible means to apprehend the parties involved and reaffirmed its full support for the striking workers. (Story, Page 2.)

The council's statement on the danger of recession pointed out that the highest interest rates in 100 years are leading to a collapse of home construction, cutbacks in production and rising unemployment.

Rising interest rates contribute to rising living costs as they are passed on all along the line to the consumer, the council said, and the only beneficiaries are the banks, whose after-tax profits moved up 33 percent from 1965 to 1968.

Meany told reporters that the council had approved a report from the International Affairs Committee recommending that an AFL-CIO committee meet with a like committee of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions to discuss future relations. The AFL-CIO withdrew from the ICFTU earlier this year. Meany said the committees would not meet until after the AFL-CIO convention in October.

The council voted contributions to a number of organizations including the League for Industrial Democracy, National Planning Association, Joint Council for Economic Education, Clergy Economic Education Foundation, Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, Group Research, Inc., and the Commission on Foundations.

A committee was named also to consult with the U.S. Association for the United Nations to improve relationships between trade union membership and the UN and its agencies.

Meany was queried during the press conferences on the Philadelphia Plan—a plan worked out by the U.S. Dept. of Labor for employment of minority workers on federal construction jobs—and said it was the general view of the members of the council that it would not work because there are not enough qualified non-white workers to meet the plan's requirements.

He stressed that despite all the efforts of the building trades unions involved to set up apprenticeship programs and recruit apprenticeship there still are not enough skilled members in the minority groups to do the job. Meany said the plan is a quota system "although they try to conceal it."

There will not be enough non-white apprentices in the unions for some years, Meany said, unless the number of applicants is increased considerably. He noted a number of cases where there has been a failure of non-whites to join training programs despite intensive recruitment efforts.

The council's next meeting will be on Oct. 1, 1969, the day before the opening of the AFL-CIO convention in Atlantic City.

AFL-CIO PRES. George Meany reports to the press during two-day mid-summer Executive Council meeting in New York City. Among other actions, the council adopted a statement urging the Senate to improve and strengthen the House-passed tax reform bill.

Unionists Named To Metric Panel

Two union research directors have been named by the Secretary of Commerce to serve on an advisory panel that will study the feasibility of adopting the metric system of measurements. They are Vernon Jirikowic of the Machinists and James Noe of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

The study was authorized by Congress last year. Metric measurements are in use in many other countries. For the U.S., a change might involve the use of meters, millimeters and centimeters instead of inches, feet and yards; grams and kilograms instead of ounces and pounds; and cubic centimeters and liters instead of liquid ounces and quarts, according to the sponsors, headed by Sen. Claiborne Pell (D-R.I.).

Labor Studies Center Slates First Program

New York—The AFL-CIO's Labor Studies Center will become "officially operative" in Washington on Labor Day when Prof. Fred Hoehler takes over his full-time duties as director.

Walter Davis, AFL-CIO education director, reported to the federation's council meeting here, that the center's first program will begin in December. Initial activities will concentrate on seventeen one-week special institutes on a variety of subject areas. Such institutes will be one to four weeks in length.

The student body will include national officers, union staff, and other persons with key responsibilities in the labor movement.

The center also will provide core institutes where staff development programs will be three weeks in length and will be held five times from January through June 1970.

Among the courses for these institutes will be "the American System of Unionism," "Economics," "American Society and Civilization." There will also be courses in civil rights, labor law, state government and collective bargaining.

The center's budget, program, curriculum, personnel and location in Washington were approved by the board of trustees. Proposed budget for the period Sept. 1. 1969, through June 30, 1970, is $376,322.

Senate Urged to Bolster Tax Reform Measure

would allow a floor vote on his measure.

At that point, Ways & Means Committee Chairman Wilbur D Mills (D-Ark.) stepped into the picture, acknowledging that there had been an oversight due to a "misunderstanding" between the Treasury Dept. and his committee. Mills hastily reconvened the committee and it revised the rate reductions to include the lowest five tax percentages which had not been changed in the original committee bill. The result added $2.4 billion in tax relief, mainly for low- and middle-income families.

The bill then was sent to the floor under a no-amendment rule and passed by a margin of 394 to 30.

In its present form, the council said, the House measure deserves commendation for the following reasons:

- "The working poor are relieved of any federal tax obligation—a measure long sought by the AFL-CIO."
- Hard-working, tax-paying citizens in the low and middle-income brackets, "who have been forced to bear far more than their just share of the tax burden," would receive a "modicum of relief." This, the council said, is a move toward another AFL-CIO goal.
- "The 7 percent investment credit to business, the single most inflationary pressure in the economy, has been eliminated. The AFL-CIO has always opposed this device."
- Some loopholes and gimmicks in the tax structure that have benefited the very wealthy "have been trimmed although not eliminated."

In this respect, the statement noted that the AFL-CIO has long contended that special tax privileges "to the few best able to pay their fair share of taxes are completely unfair and must be eliminated."

"That remains our position," it added, "and while we are pleased with the progress we are not satisfied."

The council urged the Senate to take these actions to improve the House bill:

"1. Strengthen the minimum tax provisions.

"2. Eliminate the so-called maximum tax provisions.

"3. Effectively close the farm shelter tax escape route.

"4. Limit fast real-estate depreciation write-offs to needed low- and moderate-income housing.

"5. Assure that accelerated depreciation on regulated industries is not allowed unless the tax benefits flow through to the consumer.

"6. More effectively close the capital gains loophole."

"Finally," the council concluded, "we urge the Senate to provide more substantive tax relief to those whose incomes are moderate and whose tax burdens are unnecessarily severe."

In another development, the Treasury Dept. indicated displeasure over the last-minute increase in tax relief. Edwin S. Cohen, the department's assistant secretary for tax policy and its number one tax expert, said the bill's excess of tax loss due to reductions over new revenues from reforms "will have to be considered carefully" in the light of budget needs.

The tax reform bill will be the primary issue confronting the Senate when it returns from the three-week summer recess.

All told, the bill provides tax cuts that would total over $8 billion by 1972 and reforms that would bring in an estimated $7 billion by then.

A provision in the bill reducing the oil depletion allowance from 27.5 to 20 percent may also run into opposition from the Administration. During his election campaign, Pres. Nixon opposed any reduction in the allowance. All but four of the 30 votes against the bill in the House came from the oil and gas-rich states of Texas, Louisiana, Oklahoma and California.

Newswoman Gets Top Maritime Post

The maritime editor of the Baltimore Sun, Mrs. Helen D. Bentley, has been nominated by President Nixon as chairman of the Federal Maritime Commission.

If approved by the Senate for the $40,000-a-year post, Mrs. Bentley will share with Interstate Commerce Commission Chairman Virginia Mae Brown the distinction of being the highest ranking woman in government.

Mrs. Bentley, 45, has worked for the Sun since 1945 and served as maritime advisor to Nixon during the 1968 presidential campaign. She replaces John Harllee, a retired admiral who resigned from the post recently.

Call for Czech Freedom Sounded On Anniversary of Soviet Invasion

The AFL-CIO called on the U.S. government to make every possible effort to have Soviet troops withdrawn from Czechslovakia and to place Czech freedom on the agenda for all "future negotiations with Moscow."

The federation voiced its views in a statement adopted by the Executive Council calling attention to the first anniversary of the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia Aug. 21, 1969.

Expressing its "deep sympathy and solidarity" with Czechoslovakia and "in particular its embattled workers," the council detailed the repressive measures taken by the Soviets in the past year and the heroic opposition of Czech workers.

The Soviets are "showing utter contempt for international law, the UN Charter and world public opinion," the council declared, adding:

"The Soviet aggression against Czechoslovakia demonstrates how illusory are the notions about international detente and liberalization behind the Iron Curtain. If the Soviet rulers are sincere in their recently indicated desire for rapprochement with the West, let them prove it by withdrawing their troops from Czechoslovakia and restoring the status quo ante. The Executive Council urges our government to place the Czechoslovak question on the agenda for all future negotiations with Moscow. We further urge the Administration to make every effort to have the forthcoming UN General Assembly call for the withdrawal of all Soviet armed forces from its member state, Czechoslovakia."

The council called also on all free trade unions around the world to continue the ban against exchange programs with Communist "unions," programs that were dropped at the time of the Soviet invasion. "Any resumption" would be an "unpardonable blow" against Czech workers bravely resisting tyranny, the council declared.

Finally the council noted the increase in Czech refugees in Austria and elsewhere and urged the U.S. to have the UN High Commissioner for Refugees take all necessary steps to assist the refugees in beginning life anew in another land.

Postmen Urge Crackdown on Mailed Smut

The Letter Carriers want Congress to rid the U.S. mails of the "poisonous river of revolting filth" which is pouring into the nation's homes, their president told a House subcommittee.

NALC Pres. James H. Rademacher said postmen are not censors nor do they want discretion in deciding what mail to deliver. But many feel "contaminated and degraded" by having to deliver pornographic material, particularly to youngsters who, he said, "have the most pitiably inadequate defenses against sexual aggression."

The union head asked Congress to act decisively, and soon. He quoted a member who wrote "I sometimes feel the courts have transformed me into a sewer pipe. I have been forced to become a transmitter of moral pollution—the most pernicious and damaging type of pollution known to God or man."

Rademacher said he doubts that the standards of community acceptance are as low as proponents of complete permissiveness insist. Some of the material sent legally through the mails today "would have raised eyebrows" in Sodom and Gomorrah, he testified.

The union head said most letter carriers are family men and enjoy a unique personal relationship with many families on their route. Patrons, too, are revolted by the filth they have been getting in the mail, he said.

New York Labor Battles Blue Cross Rate Increase

New York—Medical care plans of many New York unions "will be bankrupted" if New York Blue Cross is granted a pending rate increase request, the New York City AFL-CIO warned at a hearing here.

The warning came from Jay Rubin, chairman of the central labor council's hospital and medical care committee, in strong opposition to a Blue Cross petition to raise its rates to community-rated subscribers by an average of 49.5 percent.

Executive Dir. Walter J. Sheerin of the New York Labor-Management Council of Health & Welfare Plans, Inc., and New York State AFL-CIO Pres. Raymond R. Corbett also called on the State Insurance Dept. to deny the petition.

Rubin urged the state's superintendent of insurance to order Blue Cross to adjust its "rate formula" by eliminating the cost of research, education and allowances "for costs which are not specifically identified."

He recommended that Blue Cross be ordered to draw up a new "reimbursement formula" by August 1970 "that will provide hospitals with effective incentives to keep costs down."

Sheerin and Corbett also urged the state to demand that Blue Cross change its reimbursement of hospitals as a means of bringing health care costs under control.

Blue Cross must assume a "strong voice in hospital management and it should act forcibly in the interests of its subscribers by 'negotiating' the lowest possible rates with hospitals, while seeking quality health care," Sheerin declared.

He also criticized Blue Cross for trying to blame labor for its increased costs without specifying "what percentage of labor costs went to the low paid hospital worker and what percentage goes to medical staffs and officials of hospitals."

Corbett challenged Blue Cross to use a $144 million "investment portfolio" listed as an "asset" to help pay additional hospital costs of subscribers. After all, he said, this "wealth" was built up by subscribers' premium payments.

Questioned about the investments when he appeared at the hearing, Blue Cross Pres. J. Douglas Colman claimed they were needed to cover liabilities. A Blue Cross spokesman was quoted as saying the investments are used to compensate hospitals.

Corbett said he doubted this. Noting that the investments in stocks and bonds had increased by 156 percent in the last 10 years, he added, "It seems clear that these assets are not and never have been employed in the operations of Blue Cross at all."

Corbett additionally pointed out that New York Blue Cross had a $37 million reserve in March 1969, and that its reserve has averaged above 10 percent of earned subscriptions for many years. He compared this with an average of less than 5 percent for three-fourths of the state Blue Cross plans.

79 Unionists Complete Engineering Institutes

Madison, Wis.—Three specialized areas of study were offered during the two-week session of the 12th annual Union Industrial Engineering Institutes at the University of Wisconsin.

The classes were made up of 79 full-time representatives and staff members of 17 AFL-CIO affiliates. There were 39 students enrolled in the institute on Establishing Work Standards; 21 in Job Evaluation & Related Problems and 18 in Collective Bargaining of Work Measurement Problems.

The institute on Establishing Work Standards provided students a working knowledge of the various systems used by management to establish production and incentive work standards. Instruction covered the theories, assumptions and applications of stop watch time study, standards data, work sampling and predetermined motion time systems.

Particular attention was given to the shortcomings and limitations of the theories, assumptions and applications. Machine shop facilities at the university were used to give the participants opportunity to gain practical experience in their studies.

The second institute focused on various systems of job evaluation used in industry. The limitations of the job evaluation process related to contract negotiations and grievance handling were covered in discussions.

Practice was provided in the writing of job descriptions and in evaluating jobs for bargaining purposes. The use of wage curves, labor grades and rate changes related to bargaining problems also was examined.

The collective bargaining institute gave participants a chance to use existing knowledge and experience in solving specific work measurement and wage incentive problems. It emphasized individual and group study and practice in contract language, negotiations, grievance handling and arbitration.

The bargaining institute also had participants analyze a series of cases and tested their solutions in conferences with the faculty and other students.

The institutes were staffed by members of the university faculty and union educators. The students heard addresses by Dir. Robert Ozanne and Assistant Dir. Norris Tebbets of the University of Wisconsin School for Workers and Dir. Nathaniel Goldfinger and Economist Rudolph Oswald of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research.

John Hancock's Striking Agents Vote on Pact

The Insurance Workers reached tentative agreement on a package of benefits providing a $20 per-week increase for 7,000 striking John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Co. agents and sent the proposal to the strikers for a vote.

The union's chief negotiator, Vice Pres. Robert J. Nicholson, said the bargaining committee is recommending acceptance of the offer, made after a six-week stayout in 200 cities across the nation.

The strike will continue while union members meet to vote on ratification or rejection. The contract if approved will run until June 1972.

Union members voted 4,921-194 to strike July 1 after rejecting a company offer of $17.31 a week. Negotiations were resumed Aug. 5 after a five-day recess, with the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service assisting.

IWIU Pres. William A. Gillen had called on management before the old contract expired June 30 to make its employe relations "more relevant" to modern labor-management practices and less backward-looking.

To Revitalize Society:

Social Goals Stressed To OCAW Delegates

Denver Colo.—A call for attention to such social concerns as poverty and unemployment was voiced by speakers at the 10th constitutional convention of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers. More than 1,250 delegates and staff personnel from 40 states and Puerto Rico and nine Canadian provinces attended the week-long conclave here.

Pres. I. W. Abel of the Steelworkers and head of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., told the delegates the labor movement must continue to show concern for the nation's poor and unemployed citizens.

As a member of former Pres. Johnson's Commission on Civil Disorders, Abel told of touring the riot areas of Watts, Detroit and Newark where he observed the conditions that bring about discontent and disorders.

"We must keep pressing to rebuild and revitalize our society," he said. "We must look broader, and we must assume broader responsibilities."

The USWA president also reviewed activities of the IUD. He said coordinated collective bargaining, using such modern aids as a computer for quick information on contracts, is a "partial answer" to the increasing trend of U.S. corporations toward mergers and acquisitions.

OCAW Pres. A. F. Grospiron, in his keynote address, told the delegates the union must do more than negotiate contracts and handle grievances although "these things are important."

"It is said that the working people have never had it so good. We can also say that never have the working people had it taken away from them so fast. This is what we need to consider as we think about the course of our union in the future.

"The OCAW ought to be out in front on every matter of constructive reform, every measure which will redress the balance of power between the haves and the have-nots," Grospiron asserted.

Urging his audience to work in the social and political areas, Grospiron said "we belong on the side of the have-nots. Even though some of our members live in nice homes, own two cars and enjoy a few luxuries, we don't belong in the same league nor on the same side of the conflict with the moneyed powers.

"Our responsibility is to work for basic human welfare."

A look at the United States as seen through the eyes of a Canadian was provided by David Lewis, a member of the Canadian Parliament and deputy leader of the New Democratic Party.

The world has made great scientific progress in recent years, man has landed on the moon and returned to the earth, and computers are "replacing man's hands as well as his brains," Lewis observed. But, he pointed out, in the United States and in Canada, one person out of four lives in poverty.

"Forty to fifty million Americans and four to five million Canadians live in dire need," he declared. "There is no city in which I have visited where there are not slums, overcrowded conditions, unemployment, and air and water pollution.

"We have succeeded beyond dreams in technological advance. But we have failed beyond excuse in providing for human needs.

"Working people—organized working people—do not realize the immense power they have, both economic and political, to correct the evils that beset humanity."

Labor Asks Tightening Of Sex Bias Guidelines

The AFL-CIO expressed general approval of proposed federal guidelines on sex discrimination but submitted recommendations on sections dealing with weight-lifting and retirement.

Anne Draper of the Federation's Dept. of Research told the Office of Federal Contract Compliance that the proposed removal of all restrictions on how much weight a woman may be required to lift on the job "may have gone too far." Miss Draper made her recommendations in conjunction with three days of hearings on the proposed federal guidelines on sex discrimination.

The proposed guideline for employers with government contracts says that in the absence of a state law on the subject, "no employer's policies or practices should exclude women from specific jobs . . . requiring ability to lift and carry weights."

While the guideline would prevent employers from using weight-lifting restrictions as an excuse to transfer or dismiss women employes, Miss Draper said "the proposed OFCC guideline goes entirely too far unless the Dept. of Labor is prepared to require appropriate standards for safety in weight-lifting occupations, applicable to both men and women, to be observed by government contractors."

"Until the department acts to correct this program deficiency," Miss Draper said, "the use of weight-lifting limits by government contractors should be permitted so long as the limits are reasonable," without intent to discriminate.

Miss Draper also pointed out that the proposed guidelines make a flat requirement that there be no difference between male and female employes in either mandatory or optional age requirements.

"While not disagreeing with this in principle," Miss Draper said, "I believe the OFCC should follow the modification allowing for a general phasing out of differences in optional eligibility ages.

"In situations where an optional age for women is raised to that for men, rather than vice versa, existing pension rights of women under a retirement system should not be summarily invalidated."

The OFCC conducted three days of oral hearings, at which Irving M. King, attorney for the Meat Cutters, testified in support of the guidelines and praised the inclusion of alternate seniority systems rather than simply ordering men's and women's seniority lists merged.

However, one of the groups to testify at the hearings was not so sympathetic toward the proposed guidelines. A militant group called "The Feminists" sent a delegation which condemned the guidelines and the hearings on women's employment rights as discriminatory in themselves since no such guidelines were issued for men.

On Welfare, Manpower:

welfare payment of $1,600 a year for a family of four, the plan would allow such a family up to $720 a year in earnings without any reduction in the benefit. For every $2 of additional earnings, the welfare benefit would be reduced by $1 and eliminated entirely at an annual earnings level of $3,920. For larger families, the minimum benefit standard would be increased $300 for each additional child.

The program also would set a minimum standard of $65 a month for the three current adult assistance programs—aid to the blind, the disabled and the aged. The federal government would pay all of the first $50, half of the next $15 and one-fourth of everything beyond that.

The Administration estimated that the proposed program in its first full year of operation would cost about $4 billion more than current federal expenditures for public assistance, estimated at $4.2 billion for fiscal 1970.

In his comments, Meany called this "a bargain-basement price tag" that would have to be "vastly" increased if Congress accepts the proposed new structures.

"But even the structures will fail," he said, "for they make no provision for the basic need—decent jobs and living wages for those at the bottom of the economic ladder.

"Instead of forcing America's worst employers to pay a realistic minimum wage, it is proposed that the taxpayer support those employers who pay substandard wages. Certainly the government must not subsidize employers who pay less than a living wage with public money raised through taxes."

Meany said the plan contemplates training presently untrained workers for "jobs that just do not exist" and relies on business and industry "at the very point the private sector is least able to perform."

"It is the government," he declared, "that must be the employer of last resort, and on that subject the President's proposal is absolutely silent."

Finally, he said, "the President's proposal fails because it relies on the states to do everything but finance their own programs. Without let or hindrance, he would give federal tax dollars to the states, when it is the policies of many of the states that have led to the so-called welfare problem."

Meany noted that the proposed federal payment of $1,600 for family of four is "barely $30 a week"—less than half the government-defined poverty level. He noted, too, that this would guarantee increased benefits to only the most deprived welfare families in just ten states where they now receive less. Living standards for many recipients, he observed, actually would be lowered since the program appears to bar them from food stamps they now get.

As for the working poor, the AFL-CIO president said, the President could have provided direct benefits by joining the federation in its call for a $2 hourly minimum wage and extension of its coverage.

"These improvements alone," Meany noted, "would bring at least eight million Americans out of poverty."

He cited also the Administration's failure to seek federal standards for unemployment insurance and workmen's compensation or to agree on labor's proposals for a 50 percent increase in social security benefits—programs that Meany said would lift millions out of poverty.

But the "key weakness" in both the welfare reform and manpower training proposals, he declared, is the "unrecognized need for jobs—employment with good pay and the honest opportunity for advancement."

The manpower message, Meany went on, "outlines a training mechanism but suggests no plan—and provides no funds—for turning a trainee into a job holder." It assumes, he said, "that only a lack of training prevents the unemployed and underemployed from successfully joining the workforces. Economic conditions do not support this assumption."

For these reasons, he said, the President's manpower proposals represent "little more than an administrative reorganization of the existing structure."

Meany cited the AFL-CIO Executive Council's recent warning that the highest interest rates in 100 years and a rising unemployment rate pose a growing "risk of recession."

Yet, he stressed the President's plan contains "no proposals to expand jobs in either the private or public sector."

The AFL-CIO, he said, "has long maintained that public service employment provides the best avenue for those who cannot find a place in the private sector of our economy."

He cited three studies demonstrating an immediate need for millions of new workers in such public employment as anti-pollution enforcement, education, administration, health and hospitals, highway and traffic control, libraries, police, fire, recreation and sanitation.

But the message contemplates no use of federal funds to help create these jobs by meeting payroll needs, Meany observed.

He re-emphasized labor's support for legislation sponsored by Rep. James G. O'Hara and similar bills co-sponsored by 100 members of the House to establish a program of public service employment and develop "a strong, comprehensive national manpower program."

Summing up, he cited a statement by the AFL-CIO Executive Council last Feb. 21 which observed that there is no "single, simple answer" to poverty but that solutions can be found in "the creation of productive jobs at decent wages, social insurance providing adequate benefits, and a federal welfare program that brings dignity to its recipients."

"Pres. Nixon's welfare and manpower proposals acknowledge some of these goals," Meany said. "Unfortunately, the proposals fall far short—in both direction and need—if America is to move toward their attainment."

Young Trade Unionists Organize for Service

Baltimore—A bunch of young trade unionists with get-up-and-go are getting up and going—to town, that is. In the best union tradition, they pop up wherever they're needed to fight for union and liberal causes.

Encouraged and guided by the Baltimore AFL-CIO Council, the group of young members—men and women, white and black—organized the Baltimore Metropolitan Council of Young Trade Unionists about a year ago. Nearly 200 strong, they have since helped the parent Baltimore council in many of its programs.

- In Baltimore, due to the efforts of the young members and the council, the grape boycott is solid. Grapes are a city-wide "no-no."
- The young members gathered thousands of signatures on a petition demanding tax reform along lines proposed by the AFL-CIO.
- They designed a bumper sticker with the theme "Live Better—Work Union," 20,000 of which now adorn Maryland cars. You can't drive in Maryland without seeing them.
- They're an all-purpose picket brigade, showing up to bolster strikes when they arise.
- They've developed a "hot line" system under which each of a group of members has five others to phone when fast action is needed. Thus, they can turn out at a moment's notice.
- In last year's election campaign, working under the overall Baltimore AFL-CIO program, the young members' group distributed more than three million pieces of literature and staffed the city-wide sound equipment operation for registration and get-out-the-vote drives.

The average age of the group is about 30. Many are in their low and middle 20s. One member is 68, and more older members are joining. "Young in spirit" is the only age requirement. Year of birth is immaterial.

Basic goal of the Council of Young Trade Unionists is "to render assistance to the labor movement when and where needed."

Baltimore AFL-CIO Pres. Dominic Fornaro says that's just what they've done: "We're proud of what this group of young members is doing. They work closely with the council and under our direction. They are a tremendous asset to our program, and I think they lay to rest the myth of the 'indifferent' younger member the press has been peddling. Everyone should be so 'indifferent.' "

Sharp Criticism of Funding Greets Administration's Mass Transit Plan

Pres. Nixon has asked Congress to halt further deterioration in the nation's transportation systems by providing $10 billion over 12 years to develop and improve mass-transit programs.

However, the proposal, as set forth in a message to Congress, drew opposition from a number of lawmakers and transit groups who contend it is inadequate and improperly financed.

The President called for an authorization of $300 million in fiscal 1971 starting next July 1, $400 million in 1972, $600 million in 1973, $800 million in 1974, and finally $1 billion annually from 1975 on.

Over the 12-year period, $9.5 billion is proposed for capital improvements and $500 million for research and development on such projects as better bus and train design, air cushion vehicles and moving sidewalks like those now in use at some air terminals.

His program, the President said, would help replace, improve and expand bus, rail and subway systems; modernize tracks, stations and terminals; and help build new train tracks and stations, bus terminals, and garages.

The funds, he said, would assist private as well as public transit systems. State and local governments would have an opportunity to comment on projects "in order to improve intergovernmental coordination."

Nixon said his program would require public hearings before major transit projects are undertaken and permit localities to acquire rights-of-way in advance of projects to reduce future dislocation and costs.

The President proposed continuation of the method of financing transit projects whereby Congress gives the Dept. of Transportation authority to contract with local transit agencies to develop, improve and expand transit systems.

Sec. of Transportation John A. Volpe, some members of Congress and transit groups have called for a trust fund for financing transit projects, similar to the fund now used in financing highway construction.

The failure of Nixon to recommend such a fund drew criticism from members of Congress who have introduced legislation to establish it, and from the U.S. Conference of Mayors, the American Transit Association and transit officials.

Their opposition was based on a belief that a trust fund is necessary if cities are going to be able to plan transit projects with any degree of certainty that they will get matching help from the government.

Rep. Edward I. Koch (D-N.Y.), for example, said, "A trust fund is essential because without it the municipalities of our country can't be assured that even the $800 million promised will be available in 1974 or the $1 billion in 1975."

Election Victories Cover 202,000

Unions won bargaining rights for 202,000 workers in elections during fiscal 1969, the National Labor Relations Board reported. The victory margin for unions was 55.5 percent of the 7,699 elections conducted from July 1968 through June 1969, the NLRB said.

From January through June 1969, another report broke the 3,815 elections down as to union victories—50.5 percent for AFL-CIO affiliates, 50.2 percent for the Teamsters and 55.9 percent for other unaffiliated unions.

During the 6-month period, these valid votes were cast in board elections: 49,937 in elections won by AFL-CIO unions; 38,000 for unaffiliated unions and 22,000 for no union.

Court Rejects Suit Against Grape Boycott

Fresno, Calif. — U.S. District Court Judge M. D. Crocker dismissed a $75 million damage suit by growers against the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, but gave the growers 30 days to produce acceptable evidence to substantiate their charges.

A group of 81 growers sued the union for triple damages under the antitrust laws. Claiming the union's nationwide California table grape boycott is illegal, the group alleged a "conspiracy in organizing unwilling farm workers, coercion to boycott the sale of grapes, and conspiracy with retail outlets to prevent the sale of grapes."

The judge said the growers had not presented sufficient evidence to justify a hearing but granted their lawyers' request for additional time to amend their petition.

UFWOC has had to file lawsuits of its own to counter actions by other grower groups, Counsel Jerome Cohen noted at union headquarters in Delano, Calif. In one such suit, the union sued growers in Kern County for forming a "company union" of grape pickers. There the courts ordered the union to amend its petition to state a more persuasive cause of action.

'Not for Sale'

THE RECENT APPEARANCE of AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to answer Sen. J. William Fulbright (D-Ark.) resulted in all sorts of press reaction including a Washington column by Mary McGrory pronouncing Fulbright the winner of the three and one-half hour session.

Msgr. George G. Higgins, director of the Division of Urban Life of the U.S. Catholic Conference and author of a weekly column for the Catholic press, "The Yardstick," found Miss McGrory's column too much and came up with his impression of the meeting plus some appropriate comments. Here are some of them:

"The senator had a perfect right to disagree with Meany's approach to foreign policy, but, in my judgment, he had no right whatsoever to say that heavy government subsidy of the AFL-CIO's foreign policy activities through the American Institute for Free Labor Development was a reward or payoff for Meany's 'ardent, ardent' endorsement of Lyndon Johnson's war policies.

"This accusation strikes me as being a rather cheap way of suggesting that Meany is a groveling sycophant. If Fulbright actually believes this, I am afraid he doesn't understand George Meany very well and hasn't the slightest notion of what makes him tick. Mr. Meany's foreign policy may be good, bad, or indifferent but, for better or for worse, it's his own policy, and it's not for sale to any administration, as Sen. Fulbright himself would have discovered if he had ever become Secretary of State and had foolishly tried to bargain with Meany on the issue.

"What I am saying, in effect, is that, regardless of what Sen. Fulbright may happen to think about Meany's foreign policy, he overstepped the bounds of congressional propriety and congressional immunity and took on the role of the haughty schoolmaster in suggesting, rather insultingly, that Meany was a Johnson lackey and that Johnson himself was a deliberate bribester in the field of foreign policy.

"One final point. Miss McGrory noted, in the column referred to above, that 'nobody asked him (Meany) about bringing the ways of freedom and democracy to American trade unionism, or about progress in introducing "fraternal solidarity" to the discriminatory building trades unions, for instance. Fulbright, no champion of civil rights, was not the man to do it. The other members, mindful of Meany's 14 million membership, did not bait the line. Meany, although 74, can still roar.'

"It strikes me that Miss McGrory was being a little too considerate of the senator and, conversely, excessively critical of Pres. Meany. Say what you will about the record of some of the building trades in the field of race relations, the fact is that Meany's personal record on this issue is so far superior to that of Sen. Fulbright that I, for one, find it almost grotesque that the two men should even be mentioned, in this context, on the same page of a daily newspaper, let alone in the same paragraph of the same column.

"In brief, it ill behooves a senator who—for good, bad or indifferent reasons—has played it very cool on the issue of race relations and, to the best of my knowledge, has never once supported a major civil rights bill, to be impugning the integrity, in the field of foreign policy, of a man who has done infinitely more than he can ever hope to do, even if he lives to be 100, to advance the cause of interracial justice in the United States."

Passions Aroused by Viet Nam Blur Overall Asian Picture

By John P. Roche

THE PASSIONS that the war in Viet Nam has aroused have thoroughly blurred the main lines of development in Southeast Asia. In narrow terms, we have failed to "win" the Vietnamese War. But the fact is that from the outset in 1963 (when Viet Nam replaced Laos in John F. Kennedy's strategy) we never aimed at "winning" in the old-fashioned sense. Viet Nam was seen by both Pres. Kennedy and Pres. Johnson as a holding action designed to convince the Communists that we were not going to vanish. And simultaneously to indicate to the non-Communist states in the region that they were not all alone in that part of the globe.

As Pres. Nixon's remarks in Thailand and Viet Nam emphasized, the United States, despite war-weariness, still holds to this perspective. The press has commented acidly on the President's increasing hawkishness, contrasting it with his "no more Viet Nams" theme in Guam.

But this change of mood is quite understandable. It is a consequence of exposure to the realities of non-Communist Asia, to a vitality and dynamism that only a handful of American correspondents (notably Robert Shaplen of The New Yorker) have ever appreciated and described.

Who in the United States, for example, knows anything about Indonesia? It is in population terms the fifth largest nation in the world, one with enormous potential for economic growth. Five years ago it was a rogue elephant, dominated by a megalomaniac, allied with Peking, making war on its Malaysian neighbors. It was generally agreed that nothing could be done to forestall a Communist takeover; Western commentators simply wrote Indonesia off to the Reds.

However, in the fall of 1965, with their country teetering on the edge and Pres. Sukarno cooperating in a Communist coup, the Indonesian military struck back. The result was one of the worst blood baths in recent history; once they knew it was safe, the Javanese peasants drew their knives and the rivers turned red. Over 500,000 people were killed in a savage demonstration of how peasants hate Communists (a point Ho Chi Minh learned in 1956, which doubtless accounts for his bitter opposition to free elections in North Viet Nam).

Indonesia's turn-around was, in my judgment, the most important event in Asia since the fall of mainland China to Mao in 1949. I am convinced that it was triggered by our decision in the spring and summer of 1965 to hold out in Viet Nam. Anti-war pundits have asserted that there was absolutely no connection, but I took the trouble to ask Indonesian leaders when I was there in November 1967.

"DID OUR VIET NAM POLICY make any difference to you?" I inquired of Pres. Suharto and several colleagues. They looked at me as if I had asked if storks brought babies. "We thought we were all alone," one general said, "that you were going to follow the British out of the region. When you went into Viet Nam, we took heart."

Now I am prepared to argue that if Viet Nam had no other consequence than stimulating the Indonesian reversal, the war was worth it. But this is a perspective one cannot get in Washington, so Pres. Nixon's trip (accompanied by Marshall Green, a tough extremely talented foreign service officer who was Ambassador to Indonesia and is now Assistant Secretary of State, East Asia) has significant educational dimensions.

One of them, hopefully, will be the elimination of "no more Viet Nams" from Nixon's arsenal of political cliches. The only meaning that this phrase can have is "Don't get into a fight with a determined enemy." With the exception of Ho Chi Minh, nobody wanted this war in Viet Nam. If we announce in advance that we shall only use our power when we are certain of easy, instant victory, we are declaring an open season for "wars of judgment, the most important event in Asia liberation."

'Risk Grows Daily':

Executive Council Statement On the 'Danger of Recession'

Following is the text of the statement "Danger of Recession" adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its meeting Aug. 7-8, 1969, in New York City.

THE HIGHEST INTEREST RATES in 100 years are leading to a collapse of home construction, cutbacks in production and rising unemployment.

As a result, the risk of recession grows daily.

For the fifth time in six months, the big commercial banks, on June 9, uniformly raised the prime interest rate they charge their richest borrowers and best credit-risk customers. Other interest rates are scaled from this basic price of money. In many parts of the country, effective mortgage rates are already as high as 9 percent to 10 percent and more.

The present 8.5 percent prime rate is up 31 percent in the past year, 89 percent since the end of 1960. It is the biggest price increase of them all. And the average home buyer and small businessman pays even greater interest rates.

In the guise of fighting inflation, these increases contribute to rising living costs. Interest rates are passed on, all along the line—from the farmer and manufacturer to retailer and consumer.

Such price boosts, paid by the consumer, maintain and even widen the profit margins of industrial corporations and utilities. After-tax profits in early 1969 were 94 percent above 1960.

When the consumer borrows money to make a purchase, he pays the interest-rate hike, again, on the installment or mortgage loans—and the high interest-rate costs are built into family living expenses for years ahead.

Moreover, sharply rising interest rates discourage business expansion and result in job losses. As builders' loan costs and mortgage rates rise—and money gets hard to borrow, as well as more expensive—home builders postpone construction. State, county and municipal governments put off building schools, hospitals and roads. Small and medium-sized businesses are compelled to postpone plans for expanding operations.

The beneficiaries of soaring interest rates are the banks. After-tax profits of the nation's banks moved up 33 percent in the three years from 1965 to 1968. According to a tabulation by a New York investment firm, 52 major banks outside New York "had an average gain for the first half of 1969 amounting to 19.6 percent," the New York Times of July 27 reported. As for the major New York City banks, seven giants showed a 9.6 percent increase in after-tax profits in the first six months of the year, according to the same report.

Restrictive monetary policies, however, hit almost every other part of the economy. The effects of skyrocketing interest rates and the government's restrictive economic policies can be seen clearly:

- Housing starts in June were down to a yearly rate of 1.4 million—from 1.8 million in January—and are continuing down.
- The dollar-value of retail sales in the April-June quarter was only 1.4 percent above the summer of 1968—less than the increase in retail prices, indicating some decline in the physical volume of sales.
- Unemployment is inching up—from 3.3 percent of the labor force in the first three months of 1969 to 3.5 percent in the second three-month period and 3.6 percent in July. This increase is concentrated among unskilled workers.

However, prices continue to rise. The cost of living in the April-June quarter was up 5.5 percent from a year ago, washing out substantial portions of recent wage gains. The buying power of the after-tax weekly earnings of the average nonsupervisory worker, in the past several months, was slightly less than a year ago.

YET BUSINESS INVESTMENTS in new plant and equipment—the only economic sector with demand-pressures—continues to boom. Such business outlays rose at an estimated yearly rate of 18 percent in the April-June quarter despite soaring interest rates. Rising interest rates have little, if any, early effect on the profit-inflation and investment boom of the big companies.

The blue chip corporations are the last to be curbed by tight money and high interest rates. With large financial reserves and their own ways of raising funds, they are less dependent on borrowed money from the banks. Moreover, when they do borrow, they pay the lowest interest rates available. Generally restrictive monetary policies affect the blue chip corporations, after the income and demand of other economic groups are so depressed that the sales of the corporate giants are curbed.

The Administration and the Congress should take every possible action to seek a roll-back of the prime interest rate.

The Justice Dept. should quickly report to the Congress on its examination of the big banks' price-fixing actions for possible violation of the anti-trust laws.

Congress should begin a comprehensive examination of the nation's monetary mechanisms and policies—as the basis for much-needed reform of the government's monetary machinery and policies.

The 7 percent tax credit for business investment in new equipment should be repealed, as well as fast write-offs of all real estate investment operations, except low- and moderate-income housing—to curb the major source of inflationary pressures.

The danger of recession will continue to grow, unless the Administration and the Congress act to curb the greed and avarice of the bankers and to reduce the pressures of profit-inflation and the investment boom.

Crisis Growing Worse:

Soaring Cost of Money, Land Stymies Housing Production

THE SOARING COST of money and land blocks volume housing production at a time when America's already desperate housing crisis is growing worse, the AFL-CIO's urban affairs expert charged.

"Housing people are in the same line at the bank as the people who are putting up high-rise commercial buildings, motels and other structures," said John Evans, director of the Dept. of Urban Affairs. But, he stressed, mortgage interest rates are "so high that we simply cannot get any volume production."

Evans pointed out that housing production levels fell off half-a-million units in the first six months of 1969. He said that as a result, total housing production for the year will be only about half of what it should be to make a solid impact on housing needs. He appeared on the network radio interview, Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EDT, on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Evans, formerly a special assistant to the Secretary of Housing & Urban Development, said that neither the Nixon Administration nor the public at large fully understands the extent and urgency of this country's housing needs. He said that "one of the prime causes for the civil unrest we have been experiencing is the really deplorable conditions in which many families find themselves—not only in the urban ghettos, but also in many rural communities."

It is a "great irony," he said, that in the face of "such a critical need for low- and moderate-income housing," the federal government subsidizes housing for "the wealthiest part of the population three times as much" as it subsidizes housing for the poor.

Reporters questioning Evans on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs program were Sam Sharkey of the Newhouse Newspapers and George Riveire of Construction Labor Report, a publication of the Bureau of National Affairs.

MOST CITIZENS are convinced that the Congress of the United States operates in strange and mysterious ways. It does.

Primarily, Congress is based upon the committee system. In the Senate there are, for example, 16 standing committees that are there Congress after Congress. In addition, there are joint House-Senate committees, special committees and select committees.

A bill when it is introduced is assigned to a committee. The committee chairman then turns it over to a subcommittee.

Usually, the subcommittee is where the action is—investigations, studies, hearings, and other steps which lead, sooner or later, to legislation.

Among the 16 standing committees of the Senate there are 102 subcommittees, each with a chairman, members and staff. A profile of one of these—the Migratory Labor subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Labor & Public Welfare—might provide insight and understanding.

In 1959, Labor Committee Chairman Lister Hill of Alabama decided that the problem of migratory labor had reached such a serious stage that a subcommittee was needed to deal with it.

Sen. Harrison A. Williams (D-N.J.) actually prodded Hill into setting up the special subcommittee, and in January 1960 it was authorized by Senate action. The New Jersey senator was named chairman.

Williams continued as chairman of the subcommittee through the 90th Congress. The elections last November then changed the pattern. Hill retired from the Senate. Next in seniority for chairman of the full committee, Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.), was defeated. Sen. Ralph W. Yarborough (D-Tex.) assumed the chairmanship.

Yarborough decided that the special subcommittee status of Migratory Labor, whereby the Senate had to approve its life year by year, needed to be changed.

Williams moved over to the Labor subcommittee and Yarborough selected Sen. Walter F. Mondale (D-Minn.) as chairman.

MONDALE ASKED the assistant majority counsel of the subcommittee, Boren Chertkov, to accept the post as majority counsel. Chertkov is deeply involved with the problems of migratory workers.

As the professional staff member, Mondale tapped one of his legislative assistants, A. Sidney Johnson. There are two clerical workers on the subcommittee, housed in two rooms in the lower confines of the Senate Office Building.

The minority counsel is Eugene Middleman, long identified with Sen. Jacob Javits (R-N.Y.).

The staff started to jell last February. Chertkov and Johnson met regularly with Mondale. And the Minnesota senator was not about to tackle the problem without first-hand knowledge.

He visited Florida, the Rio Grande Valley in Texas and farm areas of California twice, including the headquarters of the AFL-CIO Farm Workers in Delano.

Often Mondale put on old clothes and mingled among the migrants, particularly at the border crossings on the Rio Grande.

The first in a planned series of ten hearings on migrant and seasonal farm labor problems opened on May 21 in the Labor Committee chamber in the New Senate Office Building.

Those who have followed the hearings have received an education. The lack of federal law protections for the farm workers, the legal and illegal barriers to organizing, the ways in which Mexican "green card" workers take jobs of strikers, the startling increases in Pentagon grape purchases undercutting the grape boycott, and the economics of the entire farm industry have been exposed to public view.

The Mondale subcommittee, as it is known, is doing its job—investigating, probing, studying, examining, exposing—so that effective legislation can be prepared.

That's the way all effective subcommittees operate.

HOUSING PRODUCTION sagged half-a-million units in the first half of 1969 as soaring interest and land costs stalled volume production, Dir. John Evans of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Urban Affairs, center, reported on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were George Riveire, left, of the Bureau of National Affairs and Sam Sharkey of the Newhouse Newspapers. The public service radio interview is heard Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EDT, on the Mutual network.

Meany's Statement on Nixon Messages

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany made the following comment on Pres. Nixon's messages on "Welfare Reform" and "Manpower Training" sent to the Congress:

The President has forcefully turned the public's attention toward a major problem in America and has established laudable goals for his Administration. This itself merits commendation.

The AFL-CIO is deeply concerned for those in America who live in poverty and do not enjoy the nation's general affluence. We have long shared, and vigorously pressed, the view that the nation's existing welfare system is grossly deficient and in need of comprehensive reform.

We only wish that the President's proposals met that need and would accomplish a substantial and lasting improvement in the condition of the nation's poor. Unfortunately, they do not.

The Presidential messages recognize the problems confronting the nation, but suggest solutions that fall far short of the need.

If Congress were to accept the proposed new structures, it would have to vastly increase the sums requested, for no adequate solutions are possible at a bargain-basement price tag.

Needs of Low-Wage Workers Ignored

But even the structures will fail for they make no provision for the basic need—decent jobs and living wages for those working at the bottom of the economic ladder. Instead of forcing America's worst employers to pay a realistic minimum wage, it is proposed that the taxpayer support those employers who pay substandard wages. Certainly the government must not subsidize employers who pay less than a living wage with public money raised through taxes.

The President proposes to substitute "work" for "welfare" in American life and, to that end, would train presently untrained workers for jobs that just do not exist. The President here is relying on the private sector at the very point the private sector is least able to perform. It is the government that must be the employer of last resort and on that subject the President's proposal is absolutely silent. In our judgment, it does not serve the nation or its people, to train the unemployed for jobs that do not exist.

Finally, the President's proposal fails because it relies on the states to do everything but finance their own programs. Without let or hindrance, he would give federal tax dollars to the states, when it is the policies of many of the states that have led to the so-called "welfare problem."

The "Welfare Reform" message proposes a $1,600 federal payment for a family of four. This is barely $30 a week per family—more than 50 percent below the official government poverty level. The program would by no means guarantee that "children in any state can have at least the minimum essentials of life."

While $1,600 for a four-person family would help some of the most deprived welfare recipients in 10 states where such families receive even less, there is no incentive for other states to raise welfare payments above present levels.

Subsidies For Employers Opposed

The "Welfare Reform" program also would supplement, to a limited extent, the wages of under-employed workers or those exploited by unconscionable employers paying sub-minimum wages. The AFL-CIO vigorously opposes the use of federal funds to subsidize the employers of cheap labor. Decent wages are the obligation of the employer, not of the taxpayer who finances such subsidies.

The President could have provided direct benefits to the working poor by joining the AFL-CIO in its call for extended coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act and a $2 hourly minimum wage. These improvements, alone, would bring at least eight million Americans out of poverty.

"The Welfare Reform" message provides for the declaration method of determining eligibility for welfare payments, thus eliminating degrading and time-wasting detailed investigations by local welfare agencies. It would eliminate the cruel requirement, practiced in about half the states, that the father must leave his family in order to qualify the mother and children for welfare payments. It provides an expansion, though inadequate, of manpower training for some welfare recipients and day care for their children. We have advocated and endorse those long-overdue steps.

An analysis of the welfare proposal as a whole, however, convinces the AFL-CIO that while the program's aims are laudatory, it represents a far cry from the President's goal of "a full opportunity for every American to share the bounty of this rich land." The overwhelming majority of underemployed and unemployed Americans do seek the dignity of decent jobs with decent pay. The overwhelming majority of working Americans do seek an end to mounting welfare rolls.

Contrary to popular conception, the nation's welfare rolls today cover fewer than 100,000 able-bodied men.

9 Million Poor Not Helped

Benefits from the welfare program would go almost exclusively to families with children. The AFL-CIO shares the President's concern with the poverty of children and their parents, but we are equally concerned with the widespread malnutrition, ill health and deprivation of millions of adult Americans. These too are a national concern. Yet the proposals would not help over 9 million poor people—most of the poor without children plus many families with children whose current payments would not be increased.

Living standards of many recipients would actually be lowered since the proposal appears to bar these recipients from food stamps they now receive.

The AFL-CIO strongly favors a federalized welfare system with national standards. Under such a program, unemployed persons who can't work and their families should, on the basis of their need, receive payments which would be sufficient to lift them out of poverty.

But this is not the full answer to poverty. Most poor people could get out of poverty if they could get jobs at decent wages or, if no longer able to work, their social insurance payments—unemployment insurance, workmen's compensation or old age, survivors and disability insurance—were raised to an adequate level.

In short, the welfare proposal does not even begin to meet squarely the basic poverty problem this nation faces. The program will do nothing to expand real job opportunities at decent wages for the poor who can work and want to do so.

The President has proposed that able-bodied adult welfare recipients, except mothers with pre-school children, be required to participate in work and training programs. But the proposal recommends only a minimal increase in job training and no plan for adding to available jobs.

Without More Training—A Mockery

Without greatly expanded training opportunities leading to useful jobs at decent wages, the work and training requirement in the program will only be a mockery to both welfare recipients and the nation's taxpayers.

Before issuing his welfare proposals, the President said he would favor an increase in social security benefits of only 7 percent, less than the rise in living costs since the last social security increase. To lift millions of the elderly and other social security beneficiaries out of poverty, social security payments should be raised 50 percent and the minimum benefit should be set at $100 a month.

Most people forced to rely on unemployment insurance or workmen's compensation payments are in poverty. Yet the President has thus far rejected the imperative need for federal action to modernize these basic social insurance programs. Legislation should be promptly enacted to provide federal standards requiring adequate unemployment insurance and workmen's compensation payments.

In addition to measures directly aimed at providing adequate incomes for workers and those relying on job-related social insurance payments, many supplemental programs will help the poor to move out of poverty. Such programs—all in need of expansion—include comprehensive housing, transportation, health, day care, and other social services.

For the remaining poor who are unable to work and have no social insurance entitlement, America needs a federal welfare program providing decent incomes. Payments based on need should be adequate to provide living standards with dignity for all who must depend on them.

The cost of such welfare payments will be well within America's capacity if the nation does not substitute welfare payments for jobs at fair wages for those who can work.

It is this unrecognized need for jobs—employment with good pay and the honest opportunity for advancement—that must be considered a key weakness in both the "Welfare Reform" and "Manpower Training" messages. Unfortunately, the two proposals fail to provide this basic ingredient.

Like the welfare proposal, the manpower message outlines a training mechanism but suggests no plan—and provides no funds—for turning a trainee into a job holder.

The manpower message assumes that only a lack of training prevents the unemployed and underemployed from successfully joining the workforce. Economic conditions do not support this assumption.

As the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared in New York, Aug. 7, 1969: "The highest interest rates in 100 years are leading to a collapse of home construction, cutbacks in production and rising unemployment. As a result, the risk of recession grows daily."

No Proposals for More Jobs

The council also noted: "Unemployment is inching up—from 3.3 percent of the labor force in the first three months of 1969 to 3.5 percent in the second three-month period and 3.6 percent in July. This increase is concentrated among unskilled workers."

In the face of this rising unemployment rate, the proposed manpower training program ignores the increasing threat to the jobs of the poor and disadvantaged workers who have just found a place in industry. There are no proposals to expand jobs in either the private or public sector.

The AFL-CIO has long maintained that public service employment provides the best avenue for those who cannot find a place in the private sector of our economy. At least three studies have amply documented the substantial number of job openings in the public sector that would be available if there were sufficient funds at the local and state levels.

Nor are these jobs of the leaf-raking variety. Opportunities exist in such areas as: anti-pollution enforcement, educational institutions, general administration, health and hospitals, highway and traffic control, libraries, police, fire, recreation and sanitation.

The Commission on Technology, Automation & Economic Progress estimated in 1966 that 5.3 million new jobs could be created through public service employment. An OEO study by Greenleigh Associates suggested 4.3 million such jobs. And a 1969 study by the Upjohn Institute indicated that the mayors of 130 cities with populations over 100,000 could use another 280,000 persons on municipal payrolls immediately.

If America is to help the poor and find jobs for the unemployed, why not use federal funds to improve the quality of essential community services? Unfortunately, the "Manpower Training" message includes no such component. There can be training for public service occupations, but there is no provision for the funding of payroll needs.

Insufficient Emphasis on Upgrading

Nor does the message include sufficient emphasis on upgrading. Such upgrading would perform a twofold purpose. It would provide a ladder for presently employed workers seeking advancement from low-paying, entry level jobs, and it would provide entry level openings for the unemployed who could likewise look to future advancement.

These glaring weaknesses in the proposed manpower legislation force the AFL-CIO to view the President's program as little more than an administrative reorganization of the existing structure. In simplest terms, the proposal creates no new jobs and provides no new funds. It does lump present programs under a Labor Dept. umbrella, but then turns actual operations over to the states.

The AFL-CIO is convinced that placing major responsibility for the unemployment problems of the poor and the disadvantaged in the hands of the states—through a block grant system—is a serious mistake. The problems of employment and unemployment are complex and national in scope. The individual states have no mechanisms for coping with these problems. The workforce is highly mobile. Joblessness and underemployment require national solution, not 50 different approaches.

Under the proposed program, the key operating

Sweeping Reorganization:

Nixon's Manpower Proposal Keyed to Operation by States

Pres. Nixon's proposal for a sweeping reorganization of the nation's job training programs would turn over to the states most of the money and power to administer them.

The President described his proposed Manpower Training Act of 1969 as a "new direction in making federalism work." He said his proposal would assure "equitable distribution" of manpower training dollars to urban and rural areas.

Nixon sketched the plan in a nationally televised address on welfare reform then spelled it out in a message to Congress.

The proposed legislation would consolidate manpower programs administered by the Labor Dept. —namely, the Manpower Development & Training Act, Job Corps and Community Work & Training program (both part of the Economic Opportunity Act.)

These programs, Nixon said, would be operated in conjunction with state manpower agencies to continue to provide training activities within the new system.

Under the plan 80 percent of manpower funds would go to state and local programs and 20 percent to the Labor Dept. for continuing some national projects.

In the beginning, a state would get 25 percent of the money allocated to it upon setting up a manpower agency and demonstrated "planning capability."

State control would be increased to 66.6 percent when a state showed capability of operating a comprehensive manpower program and reached agreement with its cities for sharing money and responsibility.

The state would control all of its share of funds when the Labor Dept. decided its program met "objective standards of exemplary performance." The federal government would administer the funds until the state qualified for the money.

The new law would seek to employ the manpower system as an "economic stabilizer" by automatically increasing funds for manpower services by 10 percent if the national unemployment rate equals or exceeds 4.5 percent for three consecutive months.

Labor Sec. George P. Shultz said this provision would help prevent serious recessions by channeling people into "constructive activity" when they lose their jobs. He conceded that this automatic increase in funds might be difficult to get through Congress.

Formula for Allowance

The basic allowance to individuals enrolling in a manpower training program would be based on the average weekly wage in jobs covered by a state's unemployment compensation law. The allowance would go from 40 percent of the average wage to 50 percent between 1971 and 1973.

Trainees with family responsibilities would be allowed an added $5 per week for each dependent up to six. Welfare recipients who enter training programs would receive $30 per month above their welfare payments.

Workers employed in "work experience" programs would be paid at wages not lower than the lowest rate prescribed in the Fair Labor Standards Act. Workers in employer-paid, on-the-job training would get the applicable minimum wage rate or the prevailing wage rate in the locality, whichever is higher.

The law would establish a National Computerized Job Bank in each state, or on a regional basis where states are sparsely populated, to match job seekers with job options.

In his message, Nixon said manpower training must be looked at "as a continuing process to help people get started in a job and to get ahead in a career."

It means, he said, (1) making it possible for the unemployed to become permanent workers (2) giving the working poor the opportunity to get better jobs and (3) "discovering the potential" for work in people now considered unemployable.

'Fresh Approach'

Noting that the government spends about $3 billion a year on manpower programs, Nixon said his "fresh approach" to manpower training was needed to remove duplication of government effort and red tape.

He said nothing about increasing the government's spending for manpower training. He observed that private enterprise's investment in manpower programs, "given impetus by the profit motive as well as a sense of social responsibility, is the fundamental means of developing the nation's labor force."

Shultz, at a news briefing, made it clear that the President's proposal would not by itself increase funds for job training or the number of persons being trained. He said the measure centers on improving administration of programs.

Shultz said each governor would be responsible for his state's manpower plan, determining how it is used, assuring that the plan benefits both rural and urban areas and monitoring its performance.

He also said plans would be developed in consultation with mayors and city officials, admitting that this might be difficult in a number of states.

Basic Steel Plan Guards Against Earnings Slump

Pittsburgh—The Steelworkers have reached agreement with 11 basic steel companies on an "earnings protection" plan for 400,000 workers in the industry who may be hit by pay losses due to automation, technological changes, or other economic factors.

The plan, agreed to in principle in last year's contract settlement between the union and the employers, became effective for benefit payments Aug. 1, USWA Pres. I. W. Abel said. It is financed by a fund into which the companies have been contributing 2 cents for each man hour worked in the mills by union members since last Jan. 1.

Abel said the financing plan will provide quarterly income benefits equal to the difference between the average hourly earnings of an employe in any quarter-year and 85 percent of his average hourly earnings in the previous four quarters of the year.

A worker whose income has been reduced will continue to receive quarterly payments as long as his average quarterly earnings are less than 85 percent of his average earnings in the preceding four calendar quarters, the plan specifies.

Other features include a provision that payments will be included in computing base period earnings, thus enhancing the benefits. General wage increases will be "neutralized" under the plan to make benefits payable in addition to any general wage boost.

The benefits also will be counted in calculating vacation and pension income. Benefit payments will be made automatically, without the need for filing an application.

Abel said the union has negotiated several other income maintenance programs for members but the basic steel plan introduces "some totally new concepts."

"This new program represents a genuine breakthrough toward the achievement of our long-desired goal of safeguarding the earnings of union members who may suffer economically because of constantly changing operating conditions in the industry," he said.

The new plan provides the "most massive coverage" ever devised by unions and management to soften the impact of pay cuts on employes hurt by job changes, according to Abel. The parties to the plan tried to account for "all possible contingencies" to protect earnings and meet the needs of steelworkers, he said.

Negotiating committees were headed by Paul J. Fasser, Jr., for the union and Vice Pres. C. T. Spivey of the United States Steel Corp. for the companies. USWA District Dir. William Moran and Joseph Senturia, union consultant, also participated. The companies besides U.S. Steel are Bethlehem, Republic, Youngstown Sheet & Tube, Armco, Jones & Laughlin, Colorado Fuel & Iron, National (Great Lakes) Steel, Inland Steel, Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel and Allegheny Ludlum.

Painters Hold Contest To Change Union Name

The Brotherhood of Painters, Decorators & Paperhangers of America—known by this title since its founding in 1887—will turn to the delegates to its 22nd convention opening Aug. 18 at Bal Harbour, Fla., to decide upon a new name for its organization.

To select a new name, the Painters' executive board staged a "name your union" contest. Eligible to submit entries in the contest were members in good standing and their immediate families. A vacation in Bermuda for two or $1,000 in cash will go to the winner.

The contest closed June 30, and the winning entry will be selected by a committee designated by Pres. S. Frank Raftery at the convention, with delegates having the final vote of approval. The winning name is then subject to consideration by the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

Action to select a new name for the union was prompted by a resolution introduced at the 1964 convention, which was subsequently referred to the union's executive board.

The desire for a new name was prompted by the changing nature of the union's makeup. While there has been a drop in total number of paperhangers, because of changing public tastes, for example, there has been an increase in the number of members in allied trades, such as paint making, carpet and linoleum layers, scenic artists, etc.

In recent years, a number of other AFL-CIO affiliates—the Barbers, the Laborers, the Service Employes, the Machinists, and others —have undergone name changes to better describe the nature of their memberships.

Despite technological changes in the painting and allied industries, which have eliminated some jobs, the union goes into convention with a current membership of more than 210,000—highest since the peak year of 1957.

Nixon's Goals 'Laudable,' Solutions Far Short

agency will be the state employment service. The past record of many of these state agencies does not suggest they will aggressively press for either job placement or job development for the poor or members of minority groups.

Any decentralized manpower program must result in severe inequities at the expense of the unemployed worker seeking to prepare himself for entrance into the job market. Under the proposed legislation, for example, there will be a substantial differential in the wage allowances payable to those enrolled in various state manpower programs. The proposed allowance will not be based on national standards, but upon a formula determined by a state's average wage rates covered by unemployment compensation. As such, two workers in different states will receive widely different allowances for the identical job training.

The AFL-CIO has consistently favored a comprehensive national manpower program based on a federalized employment service to meet the needs of workers and employers in an economy where activities cut across state and local boundaries. The AFL-CIO has urged creation of a massive public service employment program; greater emphasis on upgrading workers who are presently employed; and job-training programs that are directed toward existing jobs paying decent wages. These essential elements of a comprehensive national manpower program are either entirely missing or present in only limited degree in the "Manpower Training" message.

For these reasons, the AFL-CIO continues to strongly support the legislation proposed by Congressman James G. O'Hara, H.R. 11620, and similar bills co-sponsored by over 100 members of the House. These bills recognize the urgent needs of America's disadvantaged and minority workers. They meet the required standards for a strong comprehensive national manpower program.

As the AFL-CIO Executive Council said on Feb. 21, 1969, in its statement entitled "Toward Eliminating Poverty," we are well aware that there is no single, simple answer to poverty, but there are solutions. These solutions are to be found in the creation of productive jobs at decent wages, social insurance providing adequate benefits, and a federal welfare program that brings dignity to its recipients.

Pres. Nixon's welfare and manpower proposals acknowledge some of these goals. Unfortunately, the proposals fall far short—in both direction and need—if America is to move toward their attainment.

House Rollcall Vote on School Aid Hike

The House on July 31, voted 294-119 for an amendment by Rep. Charles S. Joelson (D-N.J.) which increased federal funds for education more than $1 billion above the Nixon Administration's budget request.

Right votes (R) for the amendment were cast by 195 Democrats and 99 Republicans. Wrong votes (W) against the amendment were cast by 81 Republicans and 38 Democrats.

Numerals show congressional districts; PR—paired right; PW—paired wrong; A—absent and not paired.

Legislative Output Lags:

Congress Recesses, Faces Big Backlog

Congress recessed for a three-week vacation leaving behind a heavy backlog of unfinished business to tackle when it returns after Labor Day.

The legislative output of the 91st Congress to date hasn't measured up to that of its immediate predecessors. But the current Congress has had to mark time waiting for Pres. Nixon to submit his proposals.

Just as lawmakers prepared for their vacation, Nixon sent them new plans for welfare transformation, delegation of manpower programs to states and localities and sharing of federal revenue with states.

One or more of these programs may reach the committee-hearing stage this year but congressional leaders regard them as sweeping changes that will require study.

The construction safety bill, a long-sought objective of building trades unions is one of the most important enactments to date. Nixon has just signed it into law.

But the broader issue of occupational health and safety standards in all industries is still before Congress. House and Senate committees are expected to hold hearings on the subject in September.

Hearings also are set for September on a bill to increase workmen's compensation benefits for longshoremen and harbor workers, workers in the District of Columbia and employes on offshore defense installations.

The House is scheduled to vote shortly after it returns on the proposed constitutional amendment to abolish the Electoral College and substitute procedures for the direct popular election of the President and Vice President.

Two major items slated for future Senate attention are the House-passed tax reform and tax reduction bill and the House's action in approving $4.2 billion in school funds, about $1 billion more than the Nixon budget request.

Although the Senate temporarily ended its debate on the Administration's program to begin building the Safeguard anti-ballistic missile system, the issue is far from settled.

Still ahead for Congress also are potential showdowns on legislation involving housing, mine safety, voting rights, water pollution, food stamps, anti-poverty programs, foreign aid, bank holding companies, trade, veterans educational benefits and a whole series of money bills.

In pre-recess developments:

- The Senate passed a bill to permit banks to charge up to 10 percent interest on loans to college students, with the government paying all interest charges above 7 percent, which is now the ceiling under the Higher Education Act.

The measure is designed to facilitate loans to students who have been having trouble getting money at 7 percent. A similar bill was held up in the House when Rep. H. R. Gross (R-Iowa) objected to a unanimous consent procedure.

- The Senate Banking & Currency Committee approved a $6.3 billion housing bill that goes beyond Administration recommendations.

The committee earmarked $3 billion for urban renewal in 1971 and 1972, $1.2 billion for the Model Cities program, $75 million for rent subsidies, and $240 million to help subsidize mortgage interest payments for poor families who want to buy homes or apartments.

Count of Votes Ordered In J. P. Stevens Case

Another unlawful effort by J. P. Stevens & Co., Inc., to prevent its employes from organizing has been checked by the National Labor Relations Board.

The board took a new look at a 1967 election because of company unfair practices and ordered a count of 17 challenged ballots at the firm's Black Hawk warehouse in Greenville, S.C. If the Textile Workers Union of America wins a majority it will be certified as bargaining agent. If not, a new election will be ordered, the board decided.

The union had challenged the ballots of three Stevens employes who were not on the payroll before the eligibility date, and the NLRB regional director overruled the challenges.

The director did, however, sustain the union's charge that Stevens had failed to furnish an employe address list, as the board requires. Also at issue was a board agent's challenge to the ballots of 14 former employes who the union charged were laid off because of their union sympathies.

The board sustained a trial examiner's ruling that 17 warehouse employes were laid off just before the election to weaken the union's support. The warehouse was the main source of union strength, the examiner found. The union got 22 votes of the 46 counted ballots, and filed objections to the election.

The board found that Stevens previously had shipped all its cotton through the warehouse but changed its practice "without plausible explanation at a time critical to the union's campaign" shortly before the election. Then it laid off 17 employes, blaming a reduced volume of business, the NLRB found.

Stevens, a major government cloth contractor, previously had been cited seven times for violating the rights of its employes to organize. It has lost six appeals, one in the Supreme Court.

Pilot Labor-Arts Project Draws Workers to Galleries, Concerts

On a recent summer evening in Minneapolis, a T-shirted carpenter, his wife and her sister and a baby-in-stroller came to a musical evening at the city's art institute. For this family group, it was the first time inside the building though they had lived in the city all their lives. Their story is not unique among other union families.

But it is precisely this family—and others like it—whom the AFL-CIO Demonstration Arts Project plans to reach.

Sponsored by the 15 local unions for their members and the community-at-large, the Minneapolis "Cooperation with Labor" evening was only one part of labor's program to involve union members and their families—nationwide—in the arts.

"A first step toward this goal must be to get rid of the idea of the black-tied concert and theatre-goer," said Leo Perlis, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services, which is directing the arts project in four pilot cities—New York, Buffalo, Minneapolis and Louisville.

"The point to all cultural events is to get there and enjoy it—come as you are," added Biddy Bastien, labor-arts coordinator for the Minneapolis project, who was instrumental in arranging the musical evening and a "Summer Art Sampler, 1969" which offers union members a "package" program from theater tickets to art exhibits at greatly reduced cost.

Bastien's weekly "Labor-Arts News" column in the Minneapolis Labor Review hammers home the idea that play-going, library participation and music listening are family affairs and, further, can be geared to appeal to young unionists whom he calls "the key to the labor-arts projects' success."

A taste for the arts depends on a "taste" of the arts, agreed the other AFL-CIO Community Services representatives who coordinate the remaining pilot projects: Michael Sampson, New York; Robert J. Jarnot, Buffalo, and Charles Clark, Louisville.

Among the inducements offered Buffalo's 100,000-plus labor unionists are discount tickets to cultural events, speakers furnished by local organizations to appear in labor halls, and a community-wide effort to "save the Philharmonic" from extinction.

Being considered for the future are an AFL-CIO family night at the main library with special labor exhibits and tours of facilities, bookmobile stops at union meetings, and a United Arts Fund campaign to solicit public contributions to support all the art institutions in the city.

New York City—with built-in problems and advantages because of huge size and a comparable fund of talent—is concentrating on three demonstration arts projects at present:

- A labor chorus of union volunteers to hold a "songfest rally" representative of the entire New York labor movement.
- Four open-air Labor Day concerts with a "salute to labor" theme to be given by Musicians' Local 802 in the heart of the city, Greeley Square.
- Ten performances of the New York Philharmonic—all 2,800 seats to be bought for each performance by five local unions for members and their families.

While New York's unionists will have to wait until summer or fall of 1970 to buy their $2 Philharmonic tickets, the deliberate pace of the labor-arts program is no measure of the energies or aspirations of its union sponsors.

"We're making history. Everything we're doing is brand new," said Perlis. "But labor's involvement in the arts, whether by buying tickets, creating a poem or a painting or by changing a family's pattern of leisure activities to include regular library visits or museum tours, is a long-range goal.

"Once the worker discovers it takes little more effort to take in a concert than a ballgame or see a play as to watch TV—and often yields as much satisfaction, if not more—the arts project will leave the demonstration stage and become demonstrable fact."

APPRECIATION FOR CONTRIBUTIONS to tornado victims by state labor unions is recognized with the presentation of a Red Cross plaque to Mississippi AFL-CIO Pres. Claude Ramsey, left. The state federation and local union affiliates contributed $1,475 for relief of the tornado victims. Walter H. Holmes, a Red Cross labor liaison representative, makes the presentation.

Moffett to Assist J. Curtis Counts

Kenneth E. Moffett has been named special assistant to Dir. J. Curtis Counts of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service. Moffett, 37, has been a U.S. mediator since 1961.

For the last two years Moffett mediated disputes of national interest. His specialties now will include public employe disputes, Counts said.

Boyd Leedom Dies, Headed NLRB

Boyd Leedom, former National Labor Relations Board chairman in the Eisenhower years, died in his sleep at his Arlington, Va., home. He was 62.

Leedom, a Republican, was board chairman from 1955 to 1961, and remained a member of the five-man board until 1965, when he was appointed an NLRB trial examiner. Hospitalized in July for cardiac examinations, he returned to work a few days before his death.

Leedom was a South Dakota Supreme Court judge from 1951 to 1955.

As a trial examiner, Leedom in 1967 found J. P. Stevens & Co., Inc., giant textile firm, guilty of widespread law violations to destroy its employes' right to organize. Such violations, he said, "must stem from the decision of one man or a very few men at the top of the management structure; and a signal from the top" would end them, he advised.

Courts' Role Opposed:

Job Bias Proposal Termed 'Surrender'

Brown testified on the Williams-Javits bill just three days after the Administration proposal was presented to the Senate by Sen. Winston L. Prouty (R-Vt.).

Javits recalled Brown's testimony of last April on the importance of the EEOC's having cease-and-desist orders and Sen. Walter F. Mondale (D-Minn.) referred to a speech Brown had made the previous week in which he reaffirmed the necessity. "It appears to me you've had some kind of deathbed conversion," Mondale told Brown.

Sen. Thomas F. Eagleton (D-Mo.) cited Administration actions in regard to southern textile mills, voting rights and school desegregation and told Brown the Administration proposal on the EEOC "is just another surrender, purely and simply. It's another backdown by the Administration in the civil rights field and you're an unwitting handmaiden," Eagleton said. "You must have a troubled conscience."

"I assure you, Senator, I sleep well at night," Brown countered in admitting his previous stand. Brown said he considered the Administration plan "a more effective and quicker approach."

Brown first announced his preference for the Administration plan after meeting with two Justice Dept. aides. That meeting came a few days after Brown issued the call for cease-and-desist orders in the speech quoted by Mondale.

Later in his testimony, Brown said he had been for the court method all along and said he had fought for it through the highest ranks of the Administration.

One of the Justice Dept. officials with whom Brown had met, Deputy Atty. Gen. Richard D. Kleindienst, testified that 15 years of practicing before the National Labor Relations Board convinced him that cases would move faster through the federal courts.

"A lawyer can assure his client of three to four years delay in an NLRB case," Kleindienst said. "In the federal district courts, however, a decision can be obtained in nine months to a year and more importance is attached to it than to a cease-and-desist order from an administrative agency."

Two of Brown's fellow members of the EEOC disagreed sharply with this position.

"Any legislation that grants less than cease-and-desist authority to our commission would be the perpetration of a cruel hoax on women and minorities in this country," said Clifford L. Alexander, Jr. Alexander is a former chairman of the EEOC who resigned last spring after Sen. Everett McKinley Dirksen (R-Ill.) accused him of "harassing" business.

Another EEOC member, Vincente T. Ximenes, called the Williams-Javits bill "the most comprehensive and meaningful job discrimination legislation ever proposed."

Hearings on the Williams-Javits bill will continue after the congressional recess, with the AFL-CIO scheduled to testify then.

At the close of the pre-recess hearings, Dirksen said he would fight giving the EEOC cease-and-desist power, "until the hubs of Hades freeze over."

Besides authorizing the cease-and-desist orders, the Williams-Javits bill would also give the EEOC authority to investigate discrimination charges brought by employes of state and local governments. It would also transfer federal discrimination cases from the Civil Service Commission to the EEOC.

Discrimination against public employes in both the local and federal governments was brought up by two studies released during the hearings on the Williams-Javits bill.

Pres. Nixon issued an executive order urging all federal departments and agencies to take the initiative in "continuing affirmative programs" to prohibit discrimination. Nixon also proposed recruitment and special training to help the disadvantaged.

Nixon's executive order was accompanied by a Civil Service Commission report which said that while members of minority groups are broadly employed by the federal government, most of them hold menial jobs.

The report, signed by Robert Hampton, chairman of the Civil Service Commission, said a recent study showed that almost 20 percent of 500,000 federal employes were minority group members. Non-white employment in the federal government is almost 50 percent higher than in the nation's workforce overall, the report said.

In a similar study, the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights reported that serious job discrimination exists among employes of local and state governments. The report concluded that such employes should be brought under the protection of the EEOC.

The survey, which covered 243,000 employes, said minority-group members are denied access to responsible government jobs and in many localities "are totally excluded from employment except in the most menial capacity."

The report said discrimination was highest in police and fire departments of the 600 local and state governments surveyed. "Some 27 percent of all central city jobs surveyed were in these two (police and fire) departments," the report said, "but only 7 percent of all Negro employes were either policemen or firemen, and very few of these held officer rank."

Jerry Wurf, president of the State, County & Municipal Employes, said his union joined the Civil Rights Commission in calling on Congress to extend federal anti-discrimination laws to employes of state and local governments.

"We sincerely hope that the commission's concern will result in a concerted campaign to bring to these 8 million forgotten working Americans the same protection against job discrimination that is available to workers in private industry," Wurf said.

PRES. NIXON signs first federal safety law covering nearly 4 million building trades workers. Among witnesses at the signing were, left, Pres. Edward J. Leonard of the Plasterers & Cement Masons and Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. and second from the right, Labor Sec. George P. Shultz. Haggerty said the law is the first major labor bill of the Nixon Administration and the 91st Congress.

Clothing Workers Assail Abuses Under Alien Green-Card Permits

A Mexican-American official of the Clothing Workers has given Congress a vivid look at the way U.S. employers exploit alien green-card workers from Mexico.

The witness before a Senate Labor subcommittee was Antonio M. Sanchez, a Mexican-born, 17-year resident of the United States who is an ACWA business representative in El Paso, Tex.

Sanchez and ACWA Vice Pres. Howard D. Samuel supported bills before the subcommittee to prohibit employers from using workers under green-card permits to undercut wages and working conditions or act as strikebreakers.

Holders of green cards technically are supposed to be resident aliens in the U.S., but widespread evidence indicates many of them are "commuters," working in the U.S. and living in Mexico.

The measures to crack down on employer abuses of the "green-carders" were previously endorsed by the AFL-CIO in testimony from Organizing Dir. William L. Kircher.

40,000 Commuters

Sanchez estimated that more than 40,000 green-card holders work for U.S. firms along the border during the day, then return to homes in nearby Mexican communities at night.

In many El Paso men's apparel plants, he told the subcommittee, they make up as much as 50 percent of the total force.

For the most part, Sanchez said, green-card holders are not union members, so when a strike situation arises or a strike occurs "they take the employer's side and continue to work" for fear of losing their jobs.

The Mexican alien knows he might be fired by his employer for "union activities" and "he might not be able to find other work in the U.S. or even in Mexico, where unemployment is widespread," Sanchez pointed out.

The ACWA official noted that most green-card workers in the U.S. are hired at the "mere $1.60 an hour minimum wage" but this makes him relatively well-off if he lives in Mexico.

Living costs in Mexico are much lower than in the U.S. and Mexicans with green cards are actually earning four or five times as much as a worker in Mexico.

How about organizing the green-card workers?

"I have tried to explain to them the various benefits of union representation," Sanchez said. "They do not argue or disagree with my reasoning. But always it is the same story. They need a little more time to think it over."

"We have been told by a number of sources," he continued, "that this reluctance to join the union is due to intimidation by their employers who have warned them that if they join the union they will lose their jobs."

Wants Abuses Ended

Samuel emphasized that the union is not opposed to immigration—"in fact the Amalgamated was founded largely by immigrants"—but is strongly opposed to allowing the continuation of abuses of green-card holders.

They are hired at only the minimum wage in cases where the Wage-Hour Act applies, many of them work for much less—as low as 81 cents an hour—where the federal standard does not apply, Samuel said.

This wage exploitation, he stressed, has been responsible for a high unemployment rate among U.S. workers along the border—a rate that decreases the farther one gets from the border.

"It doesn't take much scholarship to realize that the typical green-carder is an economic anomaly," Samuel said.

It is time that "commuter aliens" be given an opportunity "to become either the permanent resident aliens they are supposed to be, or the aliens they actually are," he concluded.

Labor Backs Permanent ICC Chairmanship

The AFL-CIO has expressed its support of Pres. Nixon's proposal of a permanent chairman for the Interstate Commerce Commission instead of the present system of rotating one-year terms among members of the commission.

In a letter to Rep. John A. Blatnik (D-Minn.), chairman of the House Government Operations Committee, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller pledged the federation's support.

The proposal, part of Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1969, would also give the ICC chairman authority over such administrative functions as appointment and supervision of personnel. However, personnel employed in the immediate offices of other members of the commission would not be affected.

At present, Virginia Mae Brown is ICC chairman. She was elected chairman of the commission last January under the rotating plan based on length of service.

Meany Urges Wage-Hour Crackdown

Labor Dept. Asked to Add Investigators

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany called for more wage-hour investigators to ferret out cheating employers and told the Labor Dept. that its priorities were mixed up if it depended on an education and information program to enforce the Fair Labor Standards Act.

At the same time, Meany announced a step-up in the AFL-CIO's own campaign to protect workers, "organized or unorganized," from employers who violate the wage-hour and equal pay laws.

Meany wrote Labor Sec. George P. Shultz that the $89 million in underpayments to more than 477,000 workers last year couldn't be ascribed to employer "ignorance" of the wage-hour law.

"These violations are unconscionable," Meany stressed. "America has had a Fair Labor Standards Act for 31 years and no responsible employer can be ignorant of the law's intent and his duty under it."

Meany said he "emphatically" disagrees with a statement by Wage-Hour Administrator Robert D. Moran that finding violations is not his division's goal. Moran said he is "more concerned with improving the level of compliance through informing employers and employes of their rights and obligations."

Information programs are commendable, Meany said. But he insisted that "finding violations must be the goal of the division if the intent of the law is to be observed and the minimum wage, overtime pay and equal pay for equal work provisions are to have any real meaning."

Meany noted that the growing number of wage-hour violations makes even more urgent the AFL-CIO's recommendation earlier this year that the number of investigators be increased by one-third.

"The facts make it abundantly clear that the most effective way to get full compliance is through full enforcement by an adequate investigating and enforcement staff," he told Shultz.

In a letter to AFL-CIO state and local central bodies, Meany urged that labor's own enforcement program initiated in 1967 be continued and expanded.

"Fair labor standards are being flouted, ignored or undermined by employers," Meany told the central bodies. "In fact, only about

Haynsworth Record Scored as 'Hostile'

The AFL-CIO will ask the Senate to reject Pres. Nixon's nomination of Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., to the Supreme Court, on the basis of a judicial record marred by "decisions hostile to workers and Negroes."

Federation Pres. George Meany expressed labor's "grave concern" over the nomination of the conservative South Carolina judge, whose decisions in a number of key trade union and civil rights cases have been reversed by the Supreme Court.

Before the appointment was made, Meany had informed Pres. Nixon of labor's objections to Haynsworth. The Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, the major coalition of Negro, labor, religious and civic groups, also vigorously challenged Haynsworth's qualifications.

Meany urged the Senate to consider Haynsworth's "total record, including the caliber of the judge's decisions, and his lack of understanding of the aspirations of workers and minorities."

He added. "We believe that it is a record which does not merit reward and which does not qualify Judge Haynsworth for the nation's highest court."

The President's nomination of Haynsworth was announced by White House Press Sec. Ronald L. Ziegler more than a week after Senate Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen had revealed the choice.

It was promptly applauded by Sen. James O. Eastland, the Mississippi Democrat who heads the Senate Judiciary Committee and by Sen. Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.), the former Dixiecrat presidential can-

Outreach Enrollment Sets Mark

Craft unions and community action agencies helped enroll a record 1,537 minority youths in the Apprenticeship Outreach program during the first six months of 1969, the Labor Dept. reported.

The number of minority youths placed as apprentices in programs registered with the Labor Dept. rose from 2,325 to 3,862 from Jan. 1 through June 30. This is an average of 255 a month during the six-month period, the department noted.

Labor Sec. George P. Shultz termed the achievement "one example of what can be done in attacking the manpower problem" through cooperation. He praised the craft unions and the community agencies for their "affirmative action."

The Apprenticeship Outreach program is sponsored by the AFL-CIO local building and construction trade councils in 14 cities, the Urban League in 21 cities, the Workers' Defense

$25,000 Given Red Cross:

AFL-CIO Mobilizes Aid to Storm Victims

Labor mobilized a nationwide drive to help the victims of Hurricane Camille and called for contributions to the Red Cross as the "fastest, surest way to help sufferers and homeless, many of them union members."

The AFL-CIO started the fund drive rolling with an emergency $25,000 donation and Federation Pres. George Meany wired all affiliates and AFL-CIO central bodies asking them to rush contributions to their local Red Cross chapters.

"Help is urgently needed," Meany stressed.

An estimated 22,000 union members lived and worked in the area hardest hit by the hurricane, according to Kenneth L. Kramer, AFL-CIO Community Services liaison representative with the American Red Cross.

In the immediate aftermath of the nation's most disastrous hurricane, presidents of two AFL-CIO state federations along with community service staffers were in the storm-battered Gulf Coast area to assist in rescue and salvage operations.

Missisippi State AFL-CIO Pres. Claude Ramsay stood in the rubble of the Longshoremen's Hall in devastated Gulfport to talk to local union leaders about emergency needs.

Off to the area west of Gulfport, Louisiana State AFL-CIO Pres. Victor Bussie was working with a truck unit bringing in medical supplies from the Red Cross.

The completeness of the devastation—leaving some 200,000 persons homeless—dictated the immediate emphasis on aid for the victims.

2.3 Million Emerge From Poverty in '68

The Census Bureau estimated that 25.4 million people were living in poverty in 1968—a decline of 2.3 million from the year before.

The total represented 13 percent of the nation with incomes below the government-defined poverty level at the end of the year. But among Negroes, 33 percent were in the ranks of the poor.

The report showed marked gains in the economic status of poorer families in the past decade. For the nation as a whole, 22 percent were classed as poor in 1959, including 56 percent of the Negro population.

In the past year, about 1.6 million white persons and 800,000 Negroes and persons of other races moved above the poverty level, the bureau reported.

The report, based on a sample survey taken in March, came—by coincidence—on the fifth anniversary of Pres. Johnson's signing of the Economic Opportunity Act that launched the "war on poverty."

It showed that nearly 11 million persons have climbed above the poverty level since 1964, including 3 million Negroes.

But most experts agree that the reason for the gains is more a result of the boom in the economy,

Union Leaders Featured In Labor Day Broadcasts

AFL-CIO leaders will appear on several nationwide radio and television programs during the Labor Day weekend.

Pres. George Meany will be on the ABC-TV network interview program, "Issues and Answers," on Sunday, Aug. 31 at 1:30 p.m., EDT. The program will be rebroadcast on ABC radio Sunday night at 10:30 p.m. EDT.

Meany and three federation vice presidents will also make major radio broadcasts on Labor Day itself.

The schedule: Pres. John H. Lyons of the Iron Workers, 7:20 p.m., ABC; Pres. I. W. Abel of the Steelworkers, 7:35 p.m., CBS; Pres. Joseph A. Beirne of the Communications Workers, 9:15 p.m., Mutual; Meany, 10:15 p.m., NBC.

All times are Eastern Daylight. Actual broadcast hours may vary and listeners should check local program listings.

Also scheduled for television over the Labor Day weekend is "The Vine and the Fig Tree," a half-hour film dramatizing the early service of Frances Perkins, Pres. Roosevelt's depression-era Secretary of Labor. (Schedule, Page 6.)

New Booklet Aimed At Young Workers

A new AFL-CIO pamphlet asks—and answers—the question, "Why Unions?"

The 16-page booklet is aimed at young workers and students, the new generation entering the nation's workforce. It traces the history of trade unions and explains the goals of collective bargaining, strikes and political action.

Single copies of the pamphlet, Publication No. 41, are free from the AFL-CIO Pamphlet Division, 815 16th St., NW, Washington, D.C., 20006. The price is 10 cents each for orders up to 100 and $7.50 per 100 for larger orders.

Apprenticeship Outreach Rolls Hit New Peak

League in 10 cities and seven other groups in six cities.

Of the total 3,862 minority apprentices, the Urban League placed 1,400, the Workers' Defense League 1,273, the craft union councils 870 and the others 319.

The young apprentices are learning one of 18 skilled trades in the building and construction field, including carpentry, iron work, machinery operation and others.

Apprenticeship Outreach uses the "tutor and cram" method to assist the youths—mainly Negro, Puerto Rican, Mexican-American and Indian—in preparing for a specific apprenticeship examination.

Sec. Shultz also reported that the activities of the 35 Apprenticeship Information Centers across the nation reached peak operations in the year ended June 30. During the 12-month span, 8,902 apprentice applicants were referred and indentured as apprentices in programs registered with the Labor Dept.

Agents Ratify Contract With John Hancock Co.

The Insurance Workers ended a seven-week strike against the John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Co. after membership ratification of a new three-year contract recommended by the union's bargaining committee.

The new pact provides a first year pay and benefit package averaging $20 a week. IWIU Pres. William A. Gillen said members approved the agreement by a 5-2 margin.

Crafts Urged to Fill 'Chasm of Ignorance'

Lafayette, Ind.—Building tradesmen must fill in a "chasm of ignorance" by conducting an education program about their crafts among the public and government leaders, Pres. Peter T. Schoemann of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters declared here.

His appeal for the program—termed "operation fill in"—came in an address at the union's 16th apprentice contest and instructor training course at Purdue University.

Schoemann, an AFL-CIO vice president and chairman of the federation's education committee, received Purdue's Continuing Education Award for 1969 at an awards banquet held in connection with the week-long program.

On hand for the annual event were 994 plumbing, pipe fitter and sprinkler fitter instructors, and 118 apprentices from the United States and Canada competing for more than $5,000 in cash and special trophies and awards.

Schoemann charged that the mass media of daily newspapers, radio and television have been "serving up large doses of misinformation" about the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters and other building trades unions for many years.

Thus, he added, it isn't difficult to understand why much of the public and many government leaders "don't have the faintest idea" of what building tradesmen do and the skill required in the performance of their work.

Building trades unions, Schoemann said, have been wrongfully blamed for manpower shortages, the housing crisis, inflation and other "sins" because "those who point the finger have found it convenient to do so."

As an example, he noted that building trades wages are frequently blamed for high costs of housing.

He said this "fairytale" continues to be told even though a December 1968 report submitted by the Committee on Urban Housing appointed by Pres. Johnson shows that labor costs are a minimal part of the total cost of houses and apartments.

The committee, headed by Edgar F. Kaiser, president of Kaiser Industries, found that on-site labor costs amounted to 19 percent of the development and construction cost of a single-family house, 22 percent of the cost of an apartment unit.

By contrast, the committee found that roughly 50 percent of the monthly occupancy cost of a home is involved in debt retirement—payments of interest. Debt retirement accounted for 42 percent of the monthly rent in an elevator apartment house.

At the awards banquet, prizes were presented to apprentices competing for championships in plumber, steam fitter-pipe fitter and sprinkler fitter categories. Top prizes were $1,000 for first place, $500 second, and $250 third in each division.

Top winners were:

Plumber Division—First, Charles J. Schoper, Jr., Chicago, Local 130; second, William D. Sanford, Des Moines, Local 33; third, Richard A. Gould, Detroit, Local 98.

Steam-Pipe Fitter Division—First, Richard E. Willits, St. Paul, Local 455; second, Henry A. Wendt, Philadelphia, Local 420; third, William C. Evinger, Kansas City, Local 533.

Sprinkler Fitter Division—First, Robert L. Fique, Baltimore, Local 536; second, William Drahonovsky, Milwaukee, Wis., Local 183; third, Frank L. Reese, Dallas, Tex., Local 669.

Elusive 'Repaint' Field:

Painters to Expand Organizing Efforts

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A major effort to organize "repaint workers" must be a top priority for adding to the Painters membership rolls, Pres. S. Frank Raftery told the union's convention.

In a keynote address to 1,340 delegates, the largest number in the union's 82-year history, Raftery also reported on Painters' growth, benefit programs and challenges for the future.

The convention re-elected Raftery, Sec.-Treas. O. T. Satre and six vice presidents: Joseph F. Cerveny, Frank J. O'Connor, Michael DiSilvestro, Jack T. Cox, G. K. Fritz, Jr., and Robert J. Petersdorf. All were re-elected without opposition.

Delegates added a seventh vice president to the union's leadership and named Mel Eccles, who had been executive assistant to the president, to fill the new post.

Raftery told the convention that commercial, industrial and residential repainting offers "the biggest work opportunity for our members" and "historically, it has been the hardest area to organize."

"In the residential field," he pointed out, "we compete with the home owner, the pot-and-brush man, part-time painters, moonlighters and especially the non-union, fast-buck home improvement crews."

In the commercial area, he went on, the union's "competition" might be the stock boy, delivery boy or janitor "performing the work in off hours in order to supplement weekly earnings."

Raftery reported that the union's current membership is approximately 210,000, indicating recovery from a slump suffered in the early 1960s when automation and economic setbacks left membership at 195,000 in 1964.

The Painters' head also cited "healthy growth" in the union's National Pension Plan, established in 1967 by authority of the union's executive board. About 2,000 employers are now participating in the plan, he said.

On the negative side, his report expressed concern that not enough progress was being made in securing supplemental unemployment benefits in the painting, decorating and allied industries.

Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. addressed the convention on the "staggering" future needs of the nation in building schools, hospitals, houses and highways.

It is the obligation of building trades unions, he stressed, to see to it that this building job is done under decent wages and working conditions.

A convention resolution pledged the union's fullest support for the National Council of Senior Citizens, calling upon its local unions to form retired members' clubs and affiliate them with the council.

In other major resolutions, the convention:

- Endorsed a plan to enlarge the AFL-CIO's Executive Council from 27 to 33 vice presidents, to be selected at the federation convention in Atlantic City in October.
- Gave wholehearted support to coordinated collective bargaining by 10 AFL-CIO unions with General Electric Co. and Westinghouse Corp.
- Urged Congress to initiate "a massive program" of housing, construction and urban development "so that every American family will have a decent home and a suitable living environment."

Devastation caused by Hurricane Camille was much on the minds of delegates. Those from affected states reported that some of their local union halls were damaged or destroyed. The convention voted to offer all financial aid and assistance possible to the union's Gulf Coast locals with emergency needs.

California Apprentices Nail Down Top Prizes in Carpenters' Contest

Chicago — Californians dominated the competition at the second annual International Carpenters Apprenticeship Contest as they captured all three top prizes of $1,500 each.

The "world series" of carpentry was sponsored by the Carpenters union in cooperation with the Associated General Contractors of America and the National Association of Home Builders.

The contest was conducted by the Carpentry National Joint Apprenticeship & Training Committee, with the Chicago District Council of Carpenters as host.

Sixty-one contestants—the best of 30,000 Carpenter apprentices—came to Chicago as winners of statewide and provincial contests in the United States, Puerto Rico and Canada. All are fourth-year apprentices.

The winners were:

Carpenter Division—First, James O. Kenney, Jr., Local 642, Richmond, Calif.; second, Leonard Merdan, Local 930, St. Cloud, Minn.; third, Michael Cunningham, Local 833, Berwyn, Pa.; fourth, Herb Wiltz, Local 110, St. Joseph, Mo.; fifth, Bill C. Frandrick, Local 1346, Vernon, B.C.

Mill Cabinet Division — First, John Schmidt, Local 721, Los Angeles; second, William S. Meyer, Local 971, Reno, Nev.; third, Jay Hambleton, Local 359, Philadelphia.

Millwright Division—First, Robert E. Erwin, Local 1607, Los Angeles; second, Glen Cowan, Local 1916, Hamilton, Ont.; third, Randy George Estes, Local 1311, Dayton, Ohio.

Each contestant took a four-hour written test and a day-long practical test.

Carpenters Vice Pres. Finlay C. Allan told apprentices and their wives and representatives of labor and management at the awards banquet that it was fitting that the most successful of the union's apprenticeship contests would be held in Chicago.

"Eighty-eight years ago," he noted, "36 carpenters from 11 different cities met in Chicago to bring into being the United Brotherhood of Carpenters & Joiners of America. From that beginning has grown an organization of more than 800,000 hard-working, conscientious journeymen and apprentice members in over 2,600 local unions throughout the United States and Canada."

Allan said that if apprenticeship is to be a laboratory from which answers to social problems can be developed, then the building trades have a tremendous opportunity, since they have about two-thirds of the 200,000 apprentices in the country.

"But we need much more enthusiasm and hard work if we are to expand our programs to meet today's needs—especially the needs which will come when the war in Viet Nam ends and the first priority of this nation will be the rebuilding of our cities."

"We want our members to earn good wages," he declared. "A carpenter's skill is the basis of his livelihood and the key to his economic advancement" and "a requirement for the development of skill is a strong, well planned, well-conducted apprenticeship training program."

Other banquet speakers included Mayor Richard J. Daley; George Vest, Jr., president, Chicago District Council of Carpenters; Hugh C. Murphy, administrator, Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training; Carl M. Halverson, president, Associated General Contractors of America; and John A. Stastny, vice president and treasurer, National Association of Home Builders.

On Hours, Pupils:

Teachers Launch Campaign To Lift Classroom Standards

By Eugene A. Kelly

New Orleans—The American Federation of Teachers opened its 53rd annual convention with a call from its president to rally all teachers behind the twin goals of 20 classroom teaching hours a week and no more than 20 pupils per class.

AFT Pres. David Selden told 658 delegates from 153 union locals he considered the matter so important he was inviting "our rival non-union organization"—the National Education Association—to join in planning a campaign "designed to achieve the 20-20 standard as soon as possible."

Selden reported that "our relations with the AFL-CIO were never better," adding "no one who observes the AFT functioning over a period of just a week or so could doubt the value of AFL-CIO affiliation."

The AFT president reminded delegates that beginning in September, by 1968 convention mandate, their locals must be affiliated with all appropriate AFL-CIO bodies to maintain good standing within the teachers' union.

AFL-CIO Dir. of Education Walter G. Davis read a message from Federation Pres. George Meany congratulating the AFT on its growth in numbers and strength and pledging the continued cooperation and support of the AFL-CIO in its efforts to improve the quality of education in the United States.

"The struggle in which we are jointly involved," Meany wrote, "is against distorted values."

"A school system that forces a teacher to moonlight at a second job in order to raise a family is an inferior one.

"A board of education that denies teachers their lawful right as Americans to join a union, bargain collectively and strike when necessary is out of step with the democratic ideals that our schools must advance."

School authorities who would "repay devotion to the cause of education with a court injunction," Meany declared, "are so lacking in common sense as to be a liability to their community." And those who have failed to end segregated, dual systems of education "must be brought into compliance."

He said "it is a travesty of justice to continue to finance them with federal funds."

The convention's opening session was delayed when 50 delegates staged a protest demonstration against the presence on the speakers' platform of Pres. Robert Smith of the Orleans Parish School Board, which broke a recent teachers' strike by refusing to permit a representation election among city teachers. The demonstration ended when Smith left the hall.

Selden noted that while the strike was lost, "we serve notice on those who control the affairs of this city that the teachers' union is here to stay."

A major share of convention time was devoted to 17 proposed changes in the AFT constitution, including an Executive Council proposal to permit the appointment of trustees to take over and manage locals whose conduct is "contrary to accepted democratic practices" or whose affairs are being administered "in an illegal or improper manner."

Still ahead as the AFL-CIO News went to press were other issues, including the election of AFT presidents by secret ballot referendum of the membership, and the election of a successor to the late Vice Pres. Roy B. G. Mort of Niagara Falls, N.Y.

Action was expected also on the report of a special convention committee on race discrimination by some New Orleans business establishments against Negro delegates.

Sec.-Treas. Robert G. Porter reported that with 89 new union charters issued in the past year, AFT membership increased by 10,000 to an all-time high of 170,694.

Convention speakers, besides Davis, included Los Angeles Councilman Thomas Bradley, U.S. Education Commissioner James E. Allen, Jr. and Chairman Carl Perkins (D-Ky.) of the House Committee on Labor & Education.

Bradley told the union's annual civil rights luncheon that the Coalition of Conscience that backed his recent campaign against Mayor Sam Yorty is still in business as the Coalition for Better Government. Teachers can play an important role, he said, in joining the "search for truth" to eliminate violence and misunderstanding among the races.

Davis asked for public support of the AFL-CIO effort seeking full funding of aid-to-education and the student loan program. More than 220,000 college students will be unable to return to class this fall because banks will not loan them money under the program, he said.

Selden urged delegates to endorse a voluntary levy on AFT locals equal to $5 a member per month to replenish the union's Militancy Fund, now almost depleted because of prolonged strikes.

ITU Locals Get Right To Trade Reproduction

Seattle—Delegates to the Typographical Union's 111th convention voted to amend the ITU's bylaws to give local unions greater leeway at the bargaining table.

By a 3-1 margin, the convention approved amendments permitting—but not requiring—locals to trade off their traditional "reproduction" practices in exchange for improved benefits and working conditions.

The reproduction rights, principally affecting newspapers, protect printers when a publication uses advertising material prepared elsewhere. The newspaper's own printers then are credited with an equivalent amount of working time. The practice was upheld in a 1953 Supreme Court decision.

ITU Pres. John T. Pilch described the bylaw change as "strictly permissive legislation" which would give locals the option of negotiating other benefits in place of the work protection clause.

The convention also amended the ITU's overtime laws by giving locals full authority to adopt regulations governing assignment of overtime. The union said the change is intended to enable locals to better fulfill their contractual commitments to their employers in meeting demands for help.

Resolutions adopted by the convention included:

- A call for meaningful tax reforms and a higher personal exemption.
- Continued strong support for unions involved in the strike-lockout at the Los Angeles Herald-Examiner.
- Endorsement of legislation to set a basic 35-hour workweek for federal employes and opposition to a bill to increase the ceiling on apprentices at the Government Printing Office.
- Support for the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee and participation in the boycott of California grapes.

The convention also reiterated its opposition to the so-called Newspaper Preservation Act pending in Congress. The bill would exempt newspapers from certain provisions of the anti-trust laws involving price-fixing, profit-sharing and market allocation.

The ITU general counsel, Gerhard P. Van Arkel, told the delegates that the legislation "is totally bad public policy."

He warned that it would increase the trend to newspaper monopolies. The AFL-CIO and unions in the graphic arts and newspaper fields have been actively fighting the legislation.

The ITU's 1970 convention will be held in Buffalo, N.Y., and delegates voted to schedule the 1971 convention at Miami.

The union's biennial referendum election of officers will be held next May.

Fund Started to Assist Upholsterers in Texas

The AFL-CIO set up a strike relief fund for Upholsterers who have been on strike for nine months against the Economy Furniture Co. in Austin, Tex., and urged all affiliates to contribute generously.

The federation contributed $10,000 to start the national fund-raising effort to aid the strikers and their families.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said in a letter to all affiliates that Economy workers are fighting for the most basic union cause—recognition.

The Upholsterers won representation rights in a National Labor Relations Board election in May 1968. Thirteen months later the NLRB found the company guilty of unfair labor practices for refusing to bargain, and Economy appealed the ruling.

"It is probable there will be a long delay before there is a decision," Meany wrote unions and labor central bodies.

The Upholsterers reported fear tactics, police coercion and the use of strikebreakers in the company's drive to smash the union and break the spirit of the workers. The union also charged that open discrimination has been demonstrated.

The workers, most of them Americans of Mexican descent, have been assailed with slurs on their racial origin and their religious belief, the union said.

Contributions may be sent to the Economy Furniture Strike Fund at AFL-CIO headquarters.

Economy makes wooden and upholstered furniture for Montgomery Ward & Co., White Discount Stores and other outlets. It uses the labels Smithtowne Maple, Western Provincial and Built-Rite. All company products are on the "Don't Buy" list of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept.

The NLRB in its June ruling ordered Economy to end its defiance of the law, bargain with the Upholsterers and offer all strikers immediate and full reinstatement, dismissing if necessary any persons hired after the strike started Nov. 27, 1968.

Company tactics forced the employes into an unfair practice strike, the board ruled in upholding a trial examiner's findings.

Maryland-D.C. Labor Pushes Drive For Public Employe Union Rights

Full union rights for Maryland public employes under state law were pressed by the Maryland State & D.C. AFL-CIO at its seventh biennial convention in Washington.

Delegates called on the state legislature to give top priority consideration for the passage of a collective bargaining bill that would ensure secret elections and guarantee public employe unions full recognition.

The state federation urged that the legislation be patterned after the National Labor Relations Act to include provisions to guard against unfair labor practices.

The resolution noted that no effective procedures exist in Maryland to assure the union rights of public employes and that this has caused them to fall behind in wages, job protection and additional benefits. It also pointed out that the lack of public employe bargaining rights has caused bitter strikes during the past year in Baltimore city and Harford County.

The convention also called for support of a federal workmen's compensation act that would fix minimum standards for all states and urged continued efforts to seek additional benefits for workers in Maryland.

It promised to maintain efforts to raise workmen's compensation benefits to at least two-thirds of the state's weekly average wage in covered employment.

In other resolutions, the convention reaffirmed its stand in support of wide-ranging civil rights provisions covering housing, education, public accommodations, employment and voting practices.

The convention went "on record as unequivocally opposing the retrogressive actions of Pres. Nixon" in the field of civil rights.

Delegates also called on the Maryland legislature to adopt legislation to guarantee every student a tuition-free college education.

The convention re-elected the federation's four top officers and expanded their terms from two to four years. The officers are Pres. Charles A. Della, First Vice Pres. Culver B. Winsor, Second Vice Pres. J. C. Turner and Sec-Treas. Andrew M. Lewis, Jr.

The 400 delegates—largest number ever to attend the state federation's conventions—also voted to have the executive board set the salaries of the key officers.

Per capita payments of members were raised from 10 cents to 16 cents a month. From the funds, 8.5 cents will go into general operations and 7.5 cents to COPE activities.

Hardesty Named to Federationist Post

Rex Hardesty, former editor of the Communications Workers newspaper, has joined the staff of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Publications as associate editor of the American Federationist.

Hardesty, 32, was a copy editor for the Washington Evening Star before becoming editor of the CWA News in 1967. A native of Oklahoma, he was a sports writer for the Tulsa World after graduation from Benedictine Heights College.

Hardesty succeeds Robert B. Cooney who has joined the Center for Political Research in Washington.

The Other Youngsters

THERE WERE SOME CONTRASTS last week in the problems facing the young people in the country but none starker perhaps than the youngsters frantically searching for money to attend college this fall and the over 300,000 mostly affluent youth who flooded a farm in Woodstock, N. Y., for a rock-music festival.

The festival has been widely reported by the media—at least as to its external appearances. This was obviously not a gathering of the poor with tickets to performances at $7 a day, ample funds to purchase a seemingly inexhaustible supply of drugs and all the trappings of the reasonably well-off.

Not so widely reported is the plight of youngsters scurrying around seeking loans so they can attend school this fall—loans which are extremely difficult to secure.

The Wall Street Journal summed it up well in a headline which read "College Crisis: Many Students Unable to Find Enough Money for School This Year." The paper went on to say, "Federal funds are reduced; banks cut back on loans; and tuition keeps rising." It underscored a major point also: "Minority Groups Hit Hardest."

The Journal explained the situation this way:

"Banks are withdrawing from government-backed low-interest loan programs to seek higher returns elsewhere. Federal help programs are leveling off after years of expansion and some major ones are even being cut back by the Nixon Administration and Congress. And some state legislatures—angered by the campus disruptions of the past few years—are tightening up on programs designed to help minority group and other disadvantaged students get a college education."

An attempt to have Congress save the low-cost bank loan program before the opening of schools this fall by sweetening the return for banks came too late as the House recessed for three weeks without taking final action after the Senate had okayed the measure.

So in a few weeks perhaps as many young people as swarmed over the cow pastures of Woodstock will be turning away from the possibility of college, of a higher education that would help them make a contribution to society and to in turn help others on the way to a better life.

IT IS TRAGIC ENOUGH that in this country there are hundreds of thousands capable of going on to college who lack any sort of funds or who must work to help support a family. But that others must be turned away from the campus because they cannot borrow the money or because loan funds are depleted is incredible.

The banks must begin to understand at some point that they too have a social responsibility in our society including the making of low-cost, government-insured loans to students, even if they don't make the same profit as lending the money elsewhere.

The government itself has the responsibility—amply documented in legislation—to keep various loan programs operating at a level to meet the needs of both old and new students.

Only in this way can we discharge our obligations to the young.

A Word Edgewise:

'New Federalism' Sets Stage For 50 State Bureaucracies

By John P. Roche

PRES. NIXON'S talk on welfare reform was a carefully crafted address. On one level, it seemed to be an affirmation of high altruism; on another, it was a code message to the "forgotten American"—the lower middle class white. It is one more example of the Nixon style in conservatism. He is not going to hit anything head-on, but the major Democratic innovations will die the death of a thousand cuts; they will be administered to death.

Few people, even academic specialists in government, appreciate the degree to which structure determines function. That is, the extent to which the success of any program depends upon the people who are charged with the task. Politicians learn this in their cradles; it is one of the key principles of what might be called the "fail-safe" dodge in legislation.

The public, for example, works itself into a fury over thalidomide (the drug that led to the birth of deformed babies), and the alert liberals immediately try to ride this crest and establish effective national regulation of the drug industry.

Opponents of regulation immediately put their wagons in a circle and start to stall, figuring that the assault will blow itself out. The ensuing debate on drug regulation has a dreamy quality: nobody defends the drug industry, all hands deplore the birth of deformed infants, and the underground battle rages not over any issue of principle but over seemingly trivial points of administration.

As far as the public can discover, the Congress is united behind stern regulation. How can one dramatize the real meaning of a crucial vote when the apparent issue is whether the individual (or corporation) charged with fancy footwork shall carry the burden of persuasion? Before any reader puts this aside with a yawn, let me hastily note that such a minute point may determine whether a regulatory program succeeds or fails.

The John Mitchell strategy for sabotaging the Voting Rights Law is based on a number of neat little changes of that sort which would have the net consequence of putting squarely behind the legal eightball any individual who feels his rights have been violated.

Unlike Barry Goldwater and his frenzied enthusiasts, who set out with charming honesty to shoot down the Democratic sheriff, Pres. Nixon will award the sheriff a medal—and take away his gun.

There has been much talk about Nixon's southern electoral strategy, but this indicates that his real indebtedness lies in the area of administrative sabotage, which the southern Democratic barons developed into an art-form. The southerners had a few bad years because the master of the art became President; Lyndon Johnson could spot a marked deck blindfolded. Now they have a chief executive who will eagerly cooperate.

IT IS CLEAR that the death-cell Pres. Nixon has devised for the Democratic innovators is the "new federalism." He argued that a rebirth of state government is in order because "a third of a century of centralizing power and responsibility in Washington has produced a bureaucratic monstrosity, cumbersome, unresponsive and ineffective."

This has a surface plausibility, particularly if you have worked with the "monstrosity" and one may begin to contemplate the renaissance of decentralization in the United States with some sympathy.

But then comes the horrible question: Who is going to guide this renaissance? And you suddenly realize that the "new federalism" will turn power over to 50 bureaucracies whose collective level of accomplishment makes the federal "monstrosity" look like Plato's philosopher kings.

And assuming Mr. Nixon's intelligence, he knows it too. The implications of this deliberate policy of undermining federal power will be explored in a later column.

Big Investors Sip 8% Gravy:

Small Savers Getting Short End Of High Interest Rate Rake-Off

By Sidney Margolius

FROM MEAT AND MEDICAL BILLS to interest rates, working families are paying the highest prices on record this summer and early fall. But of all the living cost gouges, the most cynical is today's high interest rates. Small savers are paying the bill for high interest but are failing to share in the rewards.

While banks are charging the highest rates in our generation on business, mortgage and personal loans, and large investors get 8 percent on corporate bonds and 6 percent on tax-free municipal bonds, ordinary families are still getting the same 4-5 percent on their savings.

Even the government now is paying large investors over 7 percent on short term notes for the money it borrows. But it continues to pay series E Savings Bond buyers the same 4.25 percent, and 5 percent on the Freedom Shares available with E bonds.

It is not unusual for a family in effect to borrow its own money from a bank, and pay the bank anywhere from 8 to 15 percent, while its savings remain on deposit at 4 percent.

This is called "How to Stay Poor," or, "Where Are the Customers' Yachts?" But it is a trap that working people have walked into with both feet. Even while costs of borrowing have jumped, consumer debts rose to an all-time high of $116 billion this summer, $11 billion more than a year ago.

There is a relatively cheap place to borrow this year. If you have an insurance policy with cash value, you can borrow on it at the 5 percent rate listed in the policy (4 percent on GI policies.)

The insurance companies are really stuck with this one. For years they have pushed the kind of policies that build cash value, citing that you could borrow on it if you later needed cash. Now they are putting out press releases telling policyholders about the disadvantages of borrowing on their policies.

Naturally the insurance companies are unhappy about lending you money at the old 5 percent rate agreed on in your contract, when they can get 8-10 percent lending that money to businessmen.

You would do well to avoid borrowing this year unless urgent, but seek the lowest rates if you must borrow. In addition you ought to make sure you get the highest rates available on your own savings. Compare at your credit union (usually the highest payer), as well as at savings and loan associations and savings banks. Banks and savings associations usually pay a higher rate on long-term certificates or deposits on which you don't draw for six months or longer.

If you do buy E bonds because of the valuable tax postponement privilege, also buy the companion 5 percent Freedom Shares. Instead of buying $200 of E bonds, $100 of E and $100 of Freedom Shares would raise your effective yield to 4.6 percent. In any case, avoid cashing E bonds in this year of high tax rates, and if you must, cash in the youngest bonds first.

Hopefully, Congress will soon wake up and change the law so that the government can raise the E bond rate. Then small savers will get fairer treatment, and the government and taxpayers will save on the high rates now paid to large investors in government notes.

IT WOULD BE NICE if you, too, could put your savings into corporate bonds and get some of that 8 percent gravy now going to large investors. After all, you have to pay for those rates in the prices these corporations charge for their products. Unfortunately, most corporate bonds are issued in $1,000 denominations, and you usually need to buy $5,000 worth at a time. There are some $100 and $500 corporate bonds which can be bought with a smaller investment.

Here are other tips and trends:

New Cars: September is the month factories and dealers give extra discounts to clear the remainder of this year's models. There are not as many current models left over this year as there were last fall, so you may have to do extra shopping.

But if you are in the market, the extra shopping may be worthwhile. The 1970 cars are expected to carry higher price tags. Manufacturers already have announced increases of 5 percent on 1970 truck models. This is a strong indication that passenger cars also will go up $100 to $150.

Ford's new small Maverick, designed to compete with the Volkswagen and other imported small cars, already has proved to be a popular seller. Other domestic manufacturers will bring out similarly small cars in 1970 and '71.

Food Buying Calendar: High meat prices this summer, up 9 percent in just six months, produced several organized but sporadic boycotts by housewives.

But there has been a more widespread if silent boycott. It has been noticeable that while retail food prices went up over 5 percent this year, retail food sales rose only 3 percent, indicating that moderate-income families have been switching to lower cost substitutes where available.

With meat and poultry supplies larger this fall, you can expect prices to recede a little. Cattle prices already are down from the recent highs, and more pork, broilers and turkeys will be available.

The U.S. Agriculture Dept. has not been much help in this period of high prices. On their "plentiful" list for September are peanuts, limes and dry split peas. Try that diet.

States Fail to Act:

Federal Standards Stressed To Upgrade Jobless Benefits

FEDERAL MINIMUM STANDARDS for unemployment insurance benefits and eligibility are the key factors to good protection for workers and their families, an AFL-CIO staff expert stressed.

Bert Seidman, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. f Social Security, warned "it is futile for the President to rely on the states" to improve their unemployment compensation systems.

"The states," he said, "have shown that they are either unwilling or unable to do the job."

Seidman recalled that Pres. Eisenhower appealed to the states in 1954 to raise jobless insurance benefits to 50 percent of wage level, which experts generally agree is needed for the great majority of unemployed workers. The states "completely disregarded" that appeal, Seidman said, adding that by the end of the Eisenhower Administration, the percentage of wages covered by unemployment insurance was lower than it was in 1954.

"WE SEE NO REASON whatsoever to think that Pres. Nixon will have any greater success," he asserted, as he was questioned by reporters on the network radio interview, Labor News Conference. The program is broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EDT, on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Seidman said that the lack of federal minimum benefit standards has let the states compete for new industry with cheap, restrictive unemployment insurance programs.

Such bidding has kept jobless insurance benefits low and denied any protection at all to some of the workers who need it most, "particularly low-paid groups, like farm workers and domestic workers." Many states don't even protect their own state and local government employes, he added.

The "experience rating" system now used to set employer contributions for unemployment insurance should be ended, Seidman urged. He said it is based on "the false theory that employers are able to control their unemployment." But the real effect of experience rating, he said, is that employers push hard in state legislatures for "harsh and unreasonable disqualification provisions."

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

IT MAY BE STRETCHING the point somewhat, but Pres. Nixon's attack on the "bureaucratic monstrosity" of centralized power in Washington, would appear to raise the whole question of "state's rights" all over again.

In announcing his welfare proposals, the President took off on "a third of a century of social experiment" which he said had produced programs that have outlived their usefulness. Instead, he came up with a program that retains federal subsidies but throws much of the welfare program and standards back on the states without federal control.

Actually, most of the major domestic programs that the President has proposed so far call for a return to the days when the states and local communities were basically responsible for social programs and standards rather than the federal government.

They would downgrade the philosophy of the New Deal of Franklin Roosevelt, the Fair Deal of Harry Truman, the New Frontier of John F. Kennedy and the Great Society of Lyndon Johnson.

- Nixon has supported industrial safety legislation that still leaves major power in the hands of the states with the federal government playing a secondary role.
- He is advocating a manpower training program that places major emphasis on state and local community direction of training programs with the state employment agencies playing a key role in job finding.
- His program for "strengthening" the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission would throw enforcement powers into district courts, many of which reflect local prejudices, notably in the South.
- He has proposed a system of federal revenue sharing with the states "without strings" that, in effect, would make the federal government a tax collecting agency for the states without control over what happens on the state and local level.

Obviously all these proposals, if enacted into law, would open the way to a return to the pre-Roosevelt period of state responsibility in these fields, would weaken Supreme Court decisions that have called for federal standards in such fields as education and civil rights, and would be certain to please those southern and northern conservatives who have long bitterly opposed federal standards in the name of "states rights."

Yet, there is little to indicate that the record of the states under the Nixon proposals would be any better than it has been in the past in such fields as welfare, unemployment compensation, education, civil rights, anti-pollution, housing or a score of fields where powerful conservative and business interests would prefer to operate on the state rather than the federal level.

EVEN WITH TODAY'S "third of a century of centralizing power," as the President has put it, there are wide discrepancies in the treatment of citizens among the states, discrepancies that are likely to increase should the Nixon's anti-federal view prevail.

- State minimum wages vary so widely that the federal minimum, where it applies, is now the single unifying force on wages.
- State unemployment compensation benefits vary widely from one state to another, especially in the South where benefits are lowest in the nation. Although all states have had unemployment insurance laws for 30 years, the average weekly benefit as compared with average wages has been dropping steadily. It is now 34.3 percent as compared with 43.2 percent in 1939.
- Welfare benefits vary widely from one state to another. So widely do they differ that the President's indicated elimination of food stamps would have these results: In 30 states, the poor would lose their food stamps and gain nothing; in 14 states, they would actually lose benefits while in only six states would they gain.

There is nothing whatever to indicate that the states—or at least the less progressive ones—are going to mend their ways or that all of the nation's more than 200 million citizens are going to be treated alike from one end of the country to the other.

The chances are more likely that, as in the past, millions will find themselves more unequal than others.

FEDERAL MINIMUM STANDARDS for benefits and eligibility are the key to making unemployment insurance solid protection for workers and their families, AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman, center, declared on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Murray Seeger, left, of the Los Angeles Times and Frank Swoboda of Business Week magazine.

Dystrophy Appeal Issued by Meany

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has urged unions and their members to support the annual fund-raising "march" of the Muscular Dystrophy Associations of America.

In a letter to comedian Jerry Lewis, MDAA's national chairman, Meany praised the organization for helping to relieve those suffering from the crippling muscle disease and conducting research that will eventually lead to its conquest.

For the fourth year, Lewis will hold a Labor Day telethon to raise money for MDAA. It will feature noted television and film personalities and run for more than 19 consecutive hours on TV stations in 20 Eastern cities.

Court Rejects New Delay in Airline Dispute

A U.S. District Court judge refused to delay an order that the National Mediation Board make a proffer of arbitration in the long dispute between the Machinists and National Airlines.

Judge Gerhard A. Gesell of the district court for the District of Columbia refused a stay of execution asked by the board which may appeal his order to the U.S. Court of Appeals.

The IAM has been trying since January to get National Airlines to settle the argument which started Jan. 21 when 1,000 members stopped work in a safety dispute and were locked out by the airline. IAM went to court to compel the NMB to assign a mediator, then to get it to admit there is no reasonable prospect of a negotiated settlement and to proffer arbitration.

Once the arbitration proffer is turned down by either side, the union will be free to take economic action. Until such a proffer is made. union members cannot strike.

When Gesell held a hearing on the dispute, the NMB said it felt progress was being made in settling it, but declined to give any reason for its optimism. The judge ruled that it is "entirely appropriate for the union to challenge the board's unwillingness to abandon mediation." He said the board "not only refused to supply the information requested . . . but continued to resist after the court ordered that answers . . . be filed."

'The Vine and the Fig Tree':

Story of Frances Perkins Scheduled By TV Stations as Labor Day Special

"The Vine and the Fig Tree," a half-hour dramatization based on the life of Frances Perkins, will be shown during the Labor Day period by at least 130 television stations in 40 states and the District of Columbia.

Mrs. Perkins, a quiet but solid champion of workers' rights, became the first woman Cabinet member when Pres. Franklin D. Roosevelt chose her to head the Dept. of Labor in the depression-ridden 1930s.

"The Vine and the Fig Tree," produced under the auspices of the George Meany Foundation in conjunction with the Jewish Theological Seminary, has been scheduled as a public service program by the following stations:

DESPERATE STEELWORKERS meet with Sec. of Labor Frances Perkins, the first woman Cabinet member, at the Homestead, Pa., Post Office in a scene from "The Vine and the Fig Tree." The documentary drama depicts the struggle for workers' rights in the depression of the 1930s. It will be broadcast by at least 130 TV stations during the Labor Day weekend.

IUE Gets Grant for Training

About 10,000 members of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers will receive training to upgrade skills and education through a nine-city program helped by a number of universities.

The Labor Dept. announced the granting of $170,000 from manpower training funds to assist the program in its planning and development stages. Upgrading will be done without further expense to the government.

Cities where training will be developed and the approximate number of expected trainees are: Dayton, 3,500; Newark, N.J., 1,000; Memphis, 1,250; Indianapolis, 1,000; Philadelphia-Camden, 1,000; St. Louis, 750; Chicago, 500; and Jersey City, 500.

William S. Gary, IUE's social action director, said a number of universities have agreed to assist in the educational portion of the program.

They include American University, University of Chicago, Cornell University, University of Massachusetts, University of Minnesota, Ohio State University, Pennsylvania State University, Rutgers University, and University of West Virginia.

At UPP Convention:

Merger Explored By Paper Unions

Pittsburgh—Merger was the dominant topic during the first two days of the Papermakers & Paperworkers Fifth Constitutional Convention here.

It was raised originally by UPP Pres. Harry D. Sayre in his keynote speech to delegates and was echoed by Pres. Joseph P. Tonelli of the Pulp, Sulphite & Paper Mill workers when he appeared before the delegates.

Sayre predicted that the question of the merger would again come before the convention and said he is prepared "to make every personal sacrifice to bring about merger of all unions in the paper industry."

Tonelli told delegates that so long as the Pulp Workers and UPP remain separate entities, "they are not functioning in the best interest of the trade union movement or of the membership of these two unions."

Both presidents suggested that only through the vehicle of merger could workers achieve what they really deserve in wages, conditions and security.

Sayre told the union's 250 delegates and alternates, plus several hundred visitors, that the convention was being held with the UPP in the strongest position in its history. It represents 150,000 workers in the United States and Canada.

Sayre also voiced pride in the 1968 record of UPP on the political action front, noting that its COPE contributions were almost double the quota.

In early convention business delegates adopted a resolution raising the monthly per capita payment to the international union by 25 cents per month. At the same time they turned down a resolution to raise their minimum monthly dues from the present $4 to $5 per month.

Tonelli, who is chairman of the pulp and paper section of the International Federation of Chemical & General Workers which met in Geneva in June, reported that many paper workers throughout the world have unusual conditions and benefits as a result of either negotiations or legislative sponsorship that could serve as models for U.S. unions.

He offered as an example workers in West Germany where union members serve on the boards of directors of companies and have a voice in hiring the industrial relations managers.

He also reported that in West Germany the Paper Workers' union has an agreement with a large company on protection of workers' jobs in the face of automation. The agreement, he said, prohibits the dismissal of any worker who has reached 50 years of age or 20 years seniority. Workers with 15 years of seniority must be provided with 12 months advance notice of dismissal, plus another 12 months gross income in case of unavoidable dismissal, plus training and retraining paid for entirely by the employer.

AFL-CIO Organization Dir. William L. Kircher described the four-year struggle of California grape workers to establish the right to have a union and bargain on conditions of employment.

These workers, he said, still are second-class citizens because of their exclusion from the labor laws that protect most workers.

Battle Nominated In Virginia Runoff

William C. Battle won the Democratic nomination for governor of Virginia in a runoff primary. But a labor-backed liberal, Henry E. Howell, came close to pulling off a major upset.

Howell, who campaigned heavily on consumer issues and tax reform, had nearly 48 percent of the vote—204,000 to 225,000 for Battle. The most conservative candidate in the contest had been eliminated in the first primary.

Battle, who has sought to present a middle of the road image, faces a strong challenge in the November election from Republican Linwood Holton. Virginia has gone Republican in four of the last five presidential elections and has an evenly split congressional delegation. But the GOP has not yet been able to make inroads in the state government.

Time Flies

Oil Workers Approve Higher Per Capita Rate

Denver—A 30-cent monthly increase in the union's per capita payments to strengthen organizing efforts and meet higher costs was approved by the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers convention here.

The union's new per capita rate is $3.60 per month. Of the increase, 23 cents will be used for general operations and 7 cents will go into the union's strike-defense fund.

Pres. A. F. Grospiron, an AFL-CIO vice president, was unanimously re-elected to his third term as chief executive officer of the 180,000-member union.

Other top officers, re-elected without opposition, were Sec.-Treas. B. J. Schafer and Vice Presidents A. C. Sabatine and E. D. Swisher. Schafer and Sabatine also are beginning third terms. Swisher has been a vice president since 1955.

Named to the union's executive board were E. C. Vaughan, Long Beach, Calif.; Rex Donohue, Kearns, Utah; W. E. Trapp, Oak Ridge, Tenn.; Frank J. Arnaud, Port Arthur, Tex.; Charles Madsen, St. Louis; Melvin King, Hastings, Minn.; Kenneth Eddleman, Lowell, Ind.; Angelo Augustino, Niagara Falls, N.Y.; and Thomas Towler, Corunna, Ont. All were re-elected except for Arnaud, chosen for his first term.

The convention, attended by nearly 1,000 voting and fraternal delegates, acted on a number of constitutional amendments in addition to the per capita tax hike.

Delegates rejected a constitutional change proposed by the union's officers whereby conventions for the purpose of amending the constitution and electing officers would be held once each four years. The union would have kept its system of biennial conventions but the other conventions would have been devoted solely to strengthening programs of bargaining, organizing and political action.

Major resolutions adopted by the convention called for election reform, adequate health and safety legislation and reaffirmation of stands taken by previous conventions.

At no time during the five days of sessions was an issue so sharply contested that a roll call vote was necessary, a contrast from past OCAW conventions where lengthy debates and roll calls have been the pattern.

Sen. Ralph W. Yarborough (D-Tex.), in an address to the delegates, urged them to press Congress for enactment of legislation that he and other lawmakers have introduced to provide federal standards on occupational health and safety.

Yarborough emphasized that on-the-job illnesses and injuries are costing the American economy $7.3 million a year, 10 times more than the annual cost of time lost by work stoppages, "mainly because we don't have any powerful health and safety law."

The Texas senator set forth a program of "priorities" for the nation in the 1970s that included educational opportunity for all citizens, full health care for every American and an end to hunger and malnutrition.

Also on the agenda of needs for the '70s, Yarborough said, must be adequate housing and the elimination of air and water pollution.

In another area, Yarborough stressed the importance of political action by unions in preparation for the 1970 elections. If conservatives gain control of Congress in those elections, he warned, the stage will be set for a wave of anti-labor legislation.

Youth Training In Optics Set By IUE Group

New York—A cooperative education program for training young people from disadvantaged neighborhoods in optical mechanics will be started in September by the Optical Workers, the Board of Education and optical employers.

The program is designed to keep boys and girls from dropping out of school before graduation, to teach them useful skills and meet a shortage of beginning workers in the field, according to Sebastian J. Rebaldo, business manager of Optical Workers Local 408 of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers.

Students will be trained in surface grinding, cutting, edging, bevelling, bench work and other requirements of the trade. They will work in pairs, Rebaldo said, alternating between the work site and the school for a week at a time.

After successfully completing training, graduates will be referred to prospective employers.

Trainees will not be required to apply for union membership but graduates who gain permanent jobs in union establishments will be governed by union contract conditions and wage rates.

Students while training will work a 40-hour week and be paid $2 an hour, with employers reimbursed by 40 percent under the Vocational Education Act. State approval of the program is expected by September.

Rebaldo and John Burnell of the New York City Central Labor Council are labor members of a committee set up to evaluate the program.

Banquet to Honor ILO's David Morse

New York—David A. Morse, director-general of the International Labor Organization, will be honored here at a banquet, Sept. 17, sponsored by the Clothing Workers.

Speakers will include AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, United Nations Sec.-Gen. U Thant and Labor Sec. George P. Shultz. Clothing Workers' Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky will serve as toastmaster.

Morse served as Under Secretary of Labor during the Truman Administration.

Meany Urges New Effort To Help Hearst Strikers

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany urged all affiliated unions to step up their contributions to the men and women on strike against Hearst's Los Angeles Herald-Examiner.

The Executive Council has voted unanimously, Meany said, to contribute an additional $15,000 to the Her-Ex strike relief fund. The council established the fund in June 1968 with an initial contribution of $25,000.

The strike, involving 2,000 members of eight AFL-CIO unions, is now 20 months old. It started Dec. 15, 1967, when contract negotiations between Hearst and two unions bogged down in futility and members walked out. Hearst then locked out members of all other plant unions.

The Executive Council action in aid of the strikers followed a full report on the status of the union struggle. The strike involves the Typographical Union, the Newspaper Guild, Printing Pressmen, Lithographers, Stereotypers, Service Employes, Machinists and the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

Meany said the strikers seek a fair wage and other union working conditions, such as a pension plan. These are taken for granted today "except at staunchly anti-union establishments," he noted.

Hearst's anti-union operation, Meany said, is financed by numerous other Hearst interests from magazines to oil wells.

The publisher has continued his effort to produce the Herald-Examiner, using strikebreakers protected by police and court injunctions.

"Hearst is obviously not seeking to end the strike," Meany continued, "but to deal a crippling blow to the trade union movement throughout Southern California. So this fight is clearly the fight of all labor."

Pointing out that Hearst management has rejected offers of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service to help conduct genuine negotiations, Meany urged all affiliates to contribute generously, for "these 2,000 workers desperately need your help."

Haynsworth Record Scored:

AFL-CIO Opposes Nixon Court Choice

didate who has become a key political adviser to Pres. Nixon.

Haynsworth, 56, was a wealthy corporation attorney who served as a director of major companies when he was named to the Court of Appeals by Pres. Eisenhower 12 years ago. Although a titular Democrat, he had supported Eisenhower in his presidential campaigns.

Just last June, the Supreme Court unanimously overruled Haynsworth and other judges of the 4th Circuit Court of Appeals in a series of decisions involving the right of the National Labor Relations Board to order an employer to bargain with a union on the basis of a cardcheck after the company had used unfair labor practices to destroy the union majority.

If decisions written by or concurred in by Haynsworth had been permitted to stand, the NLRB would have been unable to deny an employer the fruits of his illegal union-busting policies.

One 1967 decision written by Haynsworth contended flatly that the NLRB does not have the right under any conditions to order an employer to bargain with a union on the basis of signed authorization cards, even though it finds that it would be impossible to hold a fair election.

Perhaps the best known labor case in which Haynsworth was overruled by the Supreme Court—again in a unanimous opinion—stemmed from the closing of the Darlington, S.C., textile mill after its workers had voted for union representation.

Haynsworth cast the deciding vote in a 3-2 decision by the 4th Circuit Court which rejected the NLRB's effort to compel the parent Deering Milliken textile chain to provide jobs and compensation for the hundreds of fired workers. The court said in effect that an employer has an absolute right to close any plant for any reason.

In reversing the decision the Supreme Court made one important qualification. It said an employer could not close a single plant in a chain so as to "chill" unionism in the other plants.

In a follow-up case involving an NLRB order to Deering Milliken to provide jobs and back up pay of up to 12 years for the 500 fired workers, Haynsworth joined in upholding the labor board. But his separate concurring opinion argued strongly for reducing the corporation's back pay obligations to the fired workers.

Haynsworth in an earlier case held that the Rubber Workers could no longer picket the O'Sullivan Rubber Co. after they had lost representation rights when strikebreakers hired to replace the workers were allowed to vote but the strikers were not.

Until a series of Supreme Court decisions clearly pointed the path, Haynsworth took the position that southern school districts weren't obligated to integrate schools as long as they did not impose compulsory segregation.

In one prominent case, overruled by the Supreme Court, Haynsworth had upheld a so-called "freedom of choice" plan, a device used by some southern school districts to avoid more than token integration. In reversing him, the Supreme Court said such plans are unconstitutional unless they succeed in eliminating dual school systems.

The vacancy on the Supreme Court was left by the resignation of Justice Abe Fortas last May. Pres. Nixon earlier named Warren E. Burger to succeed Earl Warren as Chief Justice and thus has his second opportunity to alter the complexion of the nation's highest court.

Rail Unionist Named To Canada Labor Board

Ottawa—Vice Pres. R. C. Smith of the Transportation-Communication division of the Railway Clerks has been named to the Canada Labor Relations Board by Labor Minister Bryce Mackasey.

The board is composed of four members each from labor and management, plus an impartial chairman and vice chairman.

INSTANT HOUSING is erected at Massena, N.Y., with 100 percent building trades labor as the result of a recent nationwide contract signed by the Carpenters and Stirling Homex Corp. The $1 million project is expected to be completed in 50 days with homes for 50 families. The firm has projects in progress at several other cities around the nation.

Meat Cutters Hit Move To Ease Fish Inspection

The Meat Cutters union repeated its call for full-time, continuous fish inspection in opposing proposals by the Nixon Administration which the union said would "water down" the bill now before the Senate.

The Meat Cutters' statement came after Administration officials testified before a Senate Commerce subcommittee on the federal fish inspection bill. The union accused the Administration of "false labeling, misrepresentation and gimmickry" in its testimony.

The bill was introduced by Sen. Philip Hart (D-Mich.) last year with strong backing from the Meat Cutters. It would bring the fish industry under much the same inspection regulations passed earlier for meat and poultry.

The Meat Cutters had testified earlier on the bill, urging a "strong, continuous" system of inspecting fish processing.

"The Administration called its inspection proposal a 'continuous surveillance system,'" the union said, "Yet it would not be continuous at all. The Administration clearly showed in its testimony that it contemplates periodic visits and other occasional checks by inspectors of most fish plants and their products."

The union also accused the Administration of inflating the estimates of the cost of full-time inspection. "The two Administration witnesses cannot agree on the explanation for their newly-sprung $70 million cost for full-time inspection as opposed to a $30 million estimate by former Food & Drug Commissioner James Goddard," the union said.

The witnesses also made "a gimmicked effort" to show that the Administration bill was stronger than the Hart bill, the union said. "The witnesses claimed the latter (Hart) measure would exempt fish houses—establishments icing, boxing and shipping, but not processing fish—while their bill would inspect these operations," the Meat Cutters said.

On the contrary, the statement said, the Hart bill would provide the same type of occasional inspection for the fish houses that the Administration bill would apply to the entire fish processing industry.

The Meat Cutters statement, signed by Pres. Thomas J. Lloyd and Sec.-Treas. Patrick E. Gorman, said that while the Administration testimony argued against full-time inspection, it also provided some telling points on why it is needed.

The union quoted Administration witnesses as saying that 18.6 percent of the plants inspected were in violation of adequate health regulations and that one of every four samples inspected was in violation.

"The fact is that full-time inspection is needed every bit as much in the fish industry as in meat and poultry," the statement emphasized.

Illinois Congressman Daniel Ronan Dies

Chicago—Rep. Daniel J. Ronan (D-Ill.) died here of an apparent heart attack at the age of 55. He was serving his third term in Congress from a district including Chicago's West Side and an adjoining section of Cook County.

Ronan, who had a liberal voting record during his service in Congress, was a former member of Local 7 of the Firemen & Oilers.

Job Trainees Stranded By Camp Closings

The closing of 58 Job Corps centers this spring in a Nixon Administration economy wave has left several thousand youngsters without jobs or training, despite efforts to help them through local employment offices.

The Labor Dept. said it has lost track of more than 1,100 trainees who did not request special placement assistance. And it said nearly 1,300 others who signed up for further help did not report to employment offices.

Of the 4,565 who did report, 1,953 were placed in jobs and 930 enrolled in training, with another 178 scheduled to begin training.

Some 3,000 of the stranded trainees have received at least one weekly benefit check to tide them over during the counseling period. Former trainees from the closed centers are entitled to up to four payments of $25 to $41.

About half of the trainees at the camps at the time the closings were announced last April either completed training before the centers were actually shut down or transferred to other centers.

However, Labor Dept. plans for a series of city-oriented "mini-centers" where displaced trainees and other youngsters could be accommodated have not yet been realized. Only one of the scheduled 30 centers—in Honolulu—is actually in operation.

The department first reported a higher number of stranded trainees not yet placed in jobs or training in a letter to House Education & Labor Committee Chairman Carl D. Perkins. But only hours after the letter was made public, the department issued revised figures.

2.3 Million Emerge from Poverty, 13% of Nation Remains Trapped

rather than the government's anti-poverty programs.

Coupled with the economic expansion, said Dir. Nat Goldfinger of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, are the greater number of jobs, reduction of employment and higher wages. All these were factors in lifting the millions of persons out of poverty, he emphasized.

Taking increases in the cost of living into account, the government now sets the poverty level income for a non-farm family of four at $3,553 in 1968, compared with $3,412 in 1967 and $2,974 in 1959.

Of the total 25.4 million poor people, 17.4 million were white and 8 million were from Negro and other minority groups.

While the percentage of poor people has been declining overall, it has increased for persons over 65 in the past decade. The report revealed that the poverty rolls for the aged rose from 15 percent in 1959 to 18 percent in 1968.

Children accounted for about 20 percent of all poor persons in both 1959 and 1968. About 41 percent of all poor children were members of races other than white in 1968, the Census Bureau noted.

The bureau also pointed out that as a result of changes in the method of establishing the poverty level, the number of poor persons in 1967 was some 1.6 million higher than originally figured. The number of families included in the category was boosted by about 360,000.

Originally, the poverty index was based on the Agriculture Dept.'s definition of a "nutritionally adequate" food plan. The Census Bureau now bases the poverty threshold on the Consumer Price Index as a whole, rather than on these items alone.

The Census report further disclosed that the median family income rose 8.3 percent last year to an all-time high of $8,600. But after adjustment for the rise in prices, the gain in purchasing power for the average family was only 3.9 percent over 1967.

Median earnings of white families in 1968 amounted to $8,937 and $5,360 for Negro families, or about 60 percent of that for whites. The bureau noted, however, that Negroes have been gaining in income steadily for the past several years toward parity with white workers.

The Census Bureau also reported:

- Sizable gains have been made in recent years in the proportion of persons — male and female, white and Negro—having at least a high school education. In 1966, for example, the percentage of Negro males 25 to 29 years old who had completed high school was 49 percent. The figure is now 60 percent.
- One-fifth of the population—about 36 million persons—moved during the 12-month period ended March 30. About two of the three movers remained in the same county.
- The average size of households in the country continued to decline. Since 1964 the average size per family dropped from 3.33 persons to 3.19 persons in 1969.
- Ratios of own children under 5 years old between 1960-69 per 1,000 women declined about one-fourth for whites and about one-third for Negroes, the bureau reported.

half the violators are caught each year. The Wage & Hour Division of the Dept. of Labor does not have enough investigators to achieve full compliance."

Because of this, Meany urged, each AFL-CIO central body should:

- Set up or reinvigorate a wage-hour enforcement committee to receive and help process complaints.
- Publicize the work of the committee and stress its availability to all workers, including the unorganized.
- Help workers bring their complaints to wage-hour investigators and press for prompt action by the government.
- Keep a record of the disposition and outcome of all cases.

Meany concluded: "The AFL-CIO has an obligation it will fulfill—to assure the effective enforcement of the minimum wage laws."

Meany Asks 'Commitment' To Nation's Urgent Needs

High Court Nominee Hit By Charges

A serious conflict of interest charge added new fuel to the controversy over Pres. Nixon's nomination of Appeals Court Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., to fill a Supreme Court vacancy.

Haynsworth confirmed a newspaper report that he was a major stockholder in a vending machine firm doing substantial business with the Deering Milliken textile chain at the time he cast a tie-breaking vote upholding Deering Milliken in a landmark labor case.

During part of the time the case was before the court, Haynsworth was an officer of the firm, which was then bidding for additional Deering Milliken contracts.

"But I did not recognize, then or now, any impropriety," Haynsworth told reporters.

The 3-2 decision in which Haynsworth participated upheld the right of Deering Milliken to shut down its Darlington, S.C., textile mill after workers had voted for union representation.

A unanimous Supreme Court ruling later reversed the key part of the decision, thus enabling some 500 fired workers and the Textile Workers Union of America to pursue claims for back pay and jobs at other Deering Milliken mills.

Even before the conflict of interest issue surfaced, the nomination of Haynsworth had come under fire from the AFL-CIO and civil rights groups.

The conservative South Carolina jurist had been frequently reversed by the Supreme Court on decisions upholding management in labor

GROUNDED SHIPS at Gulfport, Miss., typify destructive force of Hurricane Camille. Members of the rescue teams included, from left, Mississippi AFL-CIO Pres. Claude Ramsay; Walter Holmes, AFL-CIO liaison officer with the Red Cross, and Pres. Wilson Evans II of Longshoremen's Local 1303, whose union hall at Gulfport was destroyed. The AFL-CIO launched a nationwide relief fund drive with a $25,000 donation.

Union Volunteers Ready:

Hurricane Creates Vast Rebuilding Job

New Orleans—Union building tradesmen will be flown into the Hurricane Camille disaster area to rebuild the homes of 150 storm victims who lost everything but their lives, the Louisiana AFL-CIO announced here.

The rebuilding will be done on weekends by union volunteers from all over the state with materials supplied by the Red Cross, and money donated by unions and members to pay for transportation, power tools and portable generators.

Thousands of homesites are still under water in Plaquemines and St. Bernard Parishes, among others, so the rebuilding job must wait until floods subside and the areas dry out, Louisiana AFL-CIO Pres. Victor Bussie said. But money is being raised, storm victims are being fed and housed, and work crews are being lined up for the rehabilitation phase.

Money, materials and men began pouring into the stricken Gulf Coast area after winds reaching 210 miles-an-hour slammed into Gulf Coast towns and flood waters buried thousands of homes and business places in Louisiana, Mississippi and southern Alabama. Heavy rains driven by the hurricane extended the disaster area into southern Virginia and West Virginia.

Hits 'Profiteering' As Cities Fester

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany lashed out at "profiteering and greed" in a Labor Day message calling for a "total national commitment" to jobs, housing, education—and brotherhood.

He said the nation's festering urban problems have been studied and diagramed, but then "relegated to low priority status by the nation's policy makers and leaders."

Meanwhile, Meany warned, swollen corporate profits and exorbitant interest rates have sent living costs up and purchasing power down to the point where "the American worker is already entering a recession."

The AFL-CIO president and other leaders of the trade union movement used labor's holiday as an occasion to emphasize their confidence in America's ability to overcome its problems—if approached with the same determination that led to the moon landing.

"This nation did commit itself to putting men on the moon and it did the job," Meany declared. "It can commit itself to enriching and ennobling the lives of its people here on earth, and it must," he said.

"Behind the commitment," Meany stressed, "there must be a willingness to back it up with deeds, money and resources."

Meany spoke bluntly of the consequences of disordered priorities:

With basic housing at a virtual standstill because of high interest rates and speculative land costs, "high-rise luxury apartments and towering new office buildings cast

Real Wages Still Lag As Prices Soar

Consumer prices jumped sharply in July for the second straight month and workers' pay checks continued to buy considerably less than they did last year, the Labor Dept. reported.

The Consumer Price Index rose by five-tenths of 1 percent to 128.2. This means that it cost $12.82 to buy goods and services that sold for $10 in the 1957-59 base period.

The July rise, following a six-tenths of 1 percent leap in June, was caused mainly by big increases in food, housing and service costs, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

Arnold Chase, BLS assistant commissioner, said prices for the first seven months of the year rose at an annual rate of 6 percent, the largest rate of increase in 18 years.

Indiana Crafts Tackle Area Home Shortage

East Chicago, Ind.—Building trades unions have broken ground on an ambitious project to construct 500 houses in three Indiana cities and aid low-income families in buying them.

The project was jointly developed by the Northwestern Indiana Building & Construction Trades Council and East Chicago architect Wendell J. Campbell. It calls for building 200 homes here, 200 in Gary, and 100 in Hammond.

The council has announced that to the extent possible the houses will be built by workers from the areas in which the homes are located.

Council Pres. Sam Spitale said integrated work forces will be given on-the-job training along with courses to prepare them for union apprentice programs. Many of the workers will come from the unemployed.

Only 35% Recovered From Wage Cheaters

The Labor Dept. collected $31.7 million in fiscal 1969 out of the $89 million it found employers had unlawfully underpaid their workers. This was about 35 cents per dollar of wages due.

The department's Wage-Hour and Public Contracts divisions said the collections on behalf of 275,000 employes were about $5 million higher than the amount collected a year earlier for 228,000 workers.

The wage violations occurred under the Fair Labor Standards Act, the Walsh-Healey Public Contracts Act, the Service Contract Act and the equal pay law prohibiting discrimination against women workers.

The AFL-CIO Dept. of Research noted that not much more than a third of the wages withheld from employes by cheating or careless employers ever is collected, and charged that prosecution of offending employers is not vigorous enough.

Recently AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany called for more wage-hour investigators to uncover law violators. Meany told Labor Sec. George P. Shultz that the $89 million in underpayments to more than 477,000 workers last year cannot be blamed on employer "ignorance" of wage-hour laws and that "information" programs alone are not an adequate solution.

Although 50 percent more business places were made subject to the law in 1966, Congress has failed to appropriate funds to hire additional staff investigators.

Authorize Special Convention:

Papermakers Vote To Pursue Merger

Pittsburgh—More than 1,200 delegates to the Papermakers & Paperworkers convention called for trade union cooperation at the bargaining table and the ballot box to improve conditions of workers in the United States and Canada.

The convention voted to continue exploratory merger talks with other unions in the paper industry and authorized the union executive board to summon a special convention if a tentative merger agreement is reached.

In the more immediate area of bargaining strength, delegates were briefed by I. W. Abel, president of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., on the growing use of coordinated bargaining and computer research to achieve labor's goals.

The growth of corporate conglomerates—resulting from mergers of companies in unrelated industries—has spurred the need for unions dealing with the same employer to coordinate their bargaining goals and strategy, Abel stressed. The IUD, he said, now assists 50 coordinated bargaining committees with many more likely to be set up.

He told the delegates that computer technology has enabled the department to analyze more than 1,000 contracts, preserve a record of National Labor Relations Board elections over the past eight years, and keep current a bank of pension and insurance information.

Canadian Labor Congress Pres. Donald MacDonald told the convention that the growth of conglomerates requires still further extension of the principle of "international trade unionism."

The "octopus-like" corporations, he said, have "tentacles extending to the most remote parts of the world."

MacDonald noted that "decisions vitally affecting workers and their families now are often made in board rooms thousands of miles away, by financiers who have never seen the plant where these people work."

As far as most Canadian workers are concerned, MacDonald said, membership in international unions linking them to U.S. workers "provides far greater union strength than would otherwise be within their reach."

Harry D. Sayre, who succeeded to the presidency early in 1968 after Paul L. Phillips resigned because of ill health, was elected without opposition to a three-year term.

In a contest for secretary-treasurer, William L. Franks of Bogalusa, La., was elected by a margin of more than 2-1 over John R. Strattan. Franks succeeds Al. E. Brown who is retiring. Both contestants had been regional vice presidents and Strattan was re-elected to his post at a regional caucus. John Defee was elected to succeed Franks as regional vice president.

In the only other unionwide contest, George O'Bea, Jr., easily won re-election as vice president at-large, defeating Ernie Weiss, who had been the union's research and education director before entering the race.

All incumbent regional vice presidents who sought re-election were returned to office except Patrick W. Harte, who lost the New York state caucus vote to John T. Galluccio. Raymond Laplante was elected in the New England region to succeed Frederick J. Rochford, who did not seek re-election and will serve as a regional adviser until his retirement next spring.

Convention delegates dug generously into their pockets in floor collections to aid both striking farm workers and hurricane victims.

Resolutions adopted included strong support for federal standards for both workmen's compensation and unemployment insurance.

Other resolutions covered a broad range of labor's legislative program, including tax justice, a higher minimum wage, and improvements in medical care.

Early in the convention, delegates had approved a 25-cent increase in the per capita, to $3 a month.

Indiana Crafts Tackle Area Home Shortage

spring, the project moved from the planning stage when East Chicago Mayor John B. Nicosia shoveled the first scoops of dirt for four pilot houses to be built here.

The ground breaking ceremony was attended by more than 200 representatives of labor, government, civic groups and the clergy. The national AFL-CIO was represented by William J. McSorley, Jr. of the Building & Construction Trades Dept. and Robert McGlotten of the Dept. of Civil Rights.

Rep. Ray J. Madden (D-Ind.), Nicosia and McSorley praised the council and Campbell for initiating the project. They described it as an example of efforts needed throughout the nation to resolve housing and job problems.

Council leaders and Campbell emphasized that the project is still in the beginning stage and has a long way to go.

The homes will be widely scattered, Campbell said, because "large blocks of land are no longer available in the Chicago area. Urban renewal officials are cooperating with us in finding sites."

The interim financing and FHA-insured mortgage funds will be furnished by the council. The three-bedroom homes designed by Campbell will sell for $16,900 with a $200 minimum down payment for buyers who qualify.

Buyers will be helped by the council to secure interest subsidies from the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development under the Housing Development Act of 1968.

The law permits HUD to make such monthly payments to certain low-income home buyers as a means of reducing their interest costs on mortgages to as low as 1 percent. The program applies to families whose mortgage payments would exceed 20 percent of their monthly income.

The project may be extended into the construction of four-bedroom homes to sell at less than $20,000.

Neither the council nor Campbell has any doubts about demand for the homes. They had 50 requests for the four pilot homes here and Campbell said "at least another 30 came in after the ground-breaking was publicized."

Initial requests have come from people of many races, colors and nationalities—whites, blacks, Mexican-Americans and Puerto Ricans, the council reported.

IUD Issues Analysis Of 100 Major Pacts

The AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. has completed a computer analysis of 100 major collective bargaining agreements covering some 2 million workers.

It is intended, the department said, as ammunition for union negotiators in contract bargaining. Printed copies of the computer analysis are available from the IUD at $2 each.

The computer data will also be summarized by IUD Research Dir. Stephen J. Harris in a series of articles for the department's monthly newsletter.

St. Louis Pact Ends Strike of Iron Workers

St. Louis — Members of Iron Workers Local 396 returned to work after an 84-day strike with wage increases and other benefits totaling $2.85 an hour over a 39-month period.

Members voted 632-100 to take down picket lines that had been respected by 20,000 other craftsmen. Local Pres. James Adams said journeymen's pay will rise during the contract term to $8.875 an hour by 1972.

The 90-cent first year hike was retroactive to May 1, the expiration date of the former contract. Increases of 95 cents an hour in the second year and $1 in the third also are provided.

The Associated General Contractors of St. Louis, representing area employers, refused a major objective of the strikers—showup pay for men unable to work because of weather. Adams said the strikers settled instead for a higher wage settlement.

Iron Workers traveling more than 35 miles from the union hall to their jobs will receive travel pay of $3.50 a day the first contract year, $4 a day the second year and $4.50 the third. They previously had no travel allowance.

Unionists Appointed To Rail Safety Panel

Transportation Sec. John A. Volpe has named an industry-government-labor task force to examine problems of railroad safety and report to him "at the earliest possible moment" with recommendations for solutions.

Labor members are Chairman George E. Leighty, Railway Labor Executives' Association; Donald S. Beattie, RLEA executive secretary; Vice Pres. Al H. Chesser, United Transportation Union, and William E. Skutt, assistant grand chief, Locomotive Engineers.

Rate of Early Retirements Remains High

Almost half the men who retired under social security last year were under 65—a surprisingly large number to choose the reduced benefits of early retirement, the Social Security Administration reported.

Early retirement benefits averaged about 17 percent lower than the full social security payments at age 65, the SSA noted. This meant an average monthly benefit of $95.50 for early retirees compared with $115 for those who waited until 65 before retiring.

The option for men to retire at 62 for reduced benefits became available in 1961, an article in the Social Security Bulletin noted. It was expected that the number of early retirements would taper off once a backlog of men in the 62-64 age group who had not been working took advantage of the option.

But the anticipated decline has not occurred and early retirement has remained popular, the article said, either because many men apparently have sufficient resources to make it or because they have difficulty finding full employment in later years.

Most of the early retirees have low lifetime earnings and sporadic employment before retirement, whereas almost all those retiring at 65 were employed in the year before retirement, the article added.

State-County Wins N.Y. Unit of 7,000

New York—A unit of the State, County & Municipal Employes won bargaining rights for nearly 7,000 state employes, but another unit failed to dislodge the Civil Service Employes Association in four other statewide elections.

Employes of the security unit cast 2,733 votes for SCME Council 82; 1,825 for CSEA; 328 for the Teamsters and 24 for no union.

SCME charged that abuses by the state and CSEA made fair elections impossible in the other units. It asked the state Public Employes Relations Board to set aside the other elections.

At New Orleans Convention:

AFT Vows Fight For Better Schools

By Eugene A. Kelly

New Orleans—The AFL-CIO Teachers gave full backing at their 53rd annual convention to the policies that have increased the union's prestige and growth—policies keyed to responsible militancy on behalf of better schools and full civil rights for all Americans.

U.S. Commissioner of Education James E. Allen, Jr., cited the American Federation of Teachers' vigor and success and appealed for the union's help in improving the public schools and gaining public support for a better educational system.

The convention needed several night sessions to complete its agenda because of unscheduled interruptions—a fire in a hotel storage room which halted the annual AFT awards banquet and Hurricane Camille, which delayed the arrival of some delegates.

The union presented its Charles B. Stillman award for outstanding service to education to Rep. Carl D. Perkins (D-Ky.), chairman of the House Committee on Education & Labor. Perkins has introduced a bill to improve and equalize education in all the states based on recommendations by economist Leon Keyserling in a 1968 survey made for AFT.

The convention honored Pres. Rudy Zupetz of the Minot, N.D., Federation of Teachers, on strike since last spring, and gave its support to the striking unionists. In Minot 22 teachers were jailed and about 45 were fined for refusing to teach without a contract.

Support also was given Chicago teachers in their threat to walk out Sept. 3 unless the Board of Education and the state restore a proposed salary cut.

Delegates voted strong opposition to the appointment of U.S. Appeals Judge Clement F. Haynsworth to the Supreme Court because of his "reactionary stand" on civil rights issues.

Allen, in his address to the convention, thanked AFT members for their continuing interest in improved schooling and said "your victories at the bargaining table can properly be regarded as advances not only for your membership but for the cause of good education."

"You have fought and won battles for working conditions more befitting the professional status of teaching," he noted.

Where discrimination was practiced, he said, "you have intervened, and continue to intervene effectively in the cause of justice and equity. Many of you have been in the forefront of the civil rights movement."

Allen said "you have begun to involve teachers in decisions vitally affecting their professional lives and have proved to yourselves, to American schoolmen and the nation that teacher needs can be translated into negotiated responsibilities."

The commissioner announced that his office "stands ready to lend technical assistance and as much financial support as possible to those districts and schools which can demonstrate that they are ready to put new models of teacher education and school operations into practice."

The Nixon Administration's school chief agreed that the nation still has a public school system "that is failing to educate large portions of its clientele." The AFT, he said, "must use its recently won prestige and the momentum of its progress to spearhead the revitalization" of the schools.

A 17-year-old boy was arrested on suspicion of arson after the fire which drove delegates out of the Hotel Roosevelt banquet room.

When two AFT vice presidents reported discriminatory treatment in two nearby bars, delegates recessed the convention to picket in protest against local segregationist practices. The city council took up an improved public accommodations ordinance that had been dormant, and the New Orleans Times-Picayune called editorially for its prompt passage.

AFT Pres. David Selden set the convention keynote in a report calling for continued support of the union's "no contract, no work" policy. Sec.-Treas. Robert G. Porter said AFT issued charters to 89 new union locals in the past year and added 10,000 new members for an all-time high of 170,694.

Vivian Gallagher of Chicago Local 1 was elected as an AFT vice president to fill a vacancy.

After the convention, the AFT executive council met with a delegation of Negro members and agreed to frequent consultations with them.

Meany Asks 'Total Commitment' To Conquer Nation's Basic Needs

long shadows over old, dilapidated and squalid housing in the ghettos below."

Lack of money bars thousands of young people from a college education—or even quality elementary and high school education.

"Congress has been ready with words," but "reticent with money."

"And too many American corporations run away from American wage scales to build plants and manufacture products in other countries, taking advantage of poverty-stricken workers who will labor for as little as 30 cents an hour."

There is no conflict in America's major goals, Meany declared. The nation's resources "can provide for the nation's defense, conduct a reasonable space program and secure the general welfare for all the people."

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland stressed in his Labor Day message the trade union movement's long-standing commitment to "participatory democracy"—long before the phrase was adopted as a political slogan.

To the labor movement, this means "working within the democratic framework to strengthen it and make it function effectively to meet the needs of all citizens."

Labor is "not uncritical" of the nation's institutions, Kirkland noted. But it considers the American democratic structure "fundamentally sound and capable of increasing responsiveness to the demands of a nation undergoing wrenching change."

The involvement of America's unions in the "total life" of the community is "broad and expanding," Kirkland declared.

He cited labor's support of United Fund drives, its contributions of money and manpower to aid disaster victims, its participation in civil rights and anti-poverty activities.

And "no single group devotes more time or effort to engage citizens in the democratic process than the trade union movement," Kirkland stressed.

It helps register voters and brings them to the polls. It seeks to educate its members on the issues and the records of public officials "on the theory that public servants ought to be judged on what they do, not what they promise."

To the labor movement "participatory democracy" is "not just a slogan or a fad, but a way of living and working in a free country where all are equal."

Pres. Nixon's Labor Day message expressed confidence that, "with the cooperation of all Americans, we can prevent another wage-price spiral and restore stability to our economy."

He affirmed that "the process of collective bargaining must be strong and effective and exercised with self-restraint on all sides. But the process cannot work unless the participants are free to reach their own decisions. This Administration will always respect that freedom," the President pledged.

I. W. Abel, president of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., stressed in his Labor Day message that labor's program must be fought for on an issue-by-issue basis, winning support through "fact and reason."

For better or worse, Abel said, "there is no dominating political leadership in view. The labor movement cannot look to a president or a senator to personify the cause of progress."

It may be harder to bring about change through thought rather than emotion, Abel noted, but "many of this country's toughest problems were solved that way."

To C. J. Haggerty, president of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., this Labor Day is a time to emphasize both the goal of "a just and decent society" and the importance of taking the right path to achieve it.

Unions, he said, "have preached freedom under law, rather than freedom from law."

And while "dissent is dramatic and quite often necessary," Haggerty cautioned that "there is no justice under anarchy."

Sec. of Labor George P. Shultz cited the progress "since the first Labor Day in 1894 when workers labored 60 hours a week and were paid 20 cents an hour."

But he stressed that "progress is still needed" in safety standards, unemployment insurance, farm worker bargaining rights and job training and equal opportunities.

"The nation," Shultz said, "owes it to her workers to honor them all year by making working life as satisfying and as secure as possible."

He added: "At the same time, human justice demands that this country also provide those who cannot become productive workers—those barred from the work place by lack of education or skills or by accident of birth—the opportunity of decent jobs."

'Day of Shame' Marks Czechoslovak Invasion

The AFL-CIO has reiterated its "clear, unequivocal support" for the heroic struggle of Czechoslovakians to free themselves from the year-old Soviet occupation.

A message of labor's support was delivered by Henry Kirsch of the AFL-CIO Dept. of International Affairs to a protest meeting calling attention to the anniversary of the August 1968 invasion by the Red Army and other Warsaw Pact troops.

The meeting to mark the "day of shame" was sponsored by Czechoslovak democratic organizations in the United States. On hand were more than 200 persons, including prominent Americans from many fields.

Kirsch expressed "pride" at being designated to represent the AFL-CIO at the meeting and proclaim its backing of suffering Czechoslovak people in their quest for freedom and independence.

He spelled out the federation's views as expressed in a statement adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its recent meeting.

The statement challenged Soviet rulers to show the sincerity of their indicated desires for rapprochement with the West by withdrawing troops from Czechoslovakia and restoring the status quo that existed prior to the invasion.

The protest meeting adopted a proclamation appealing to all governments and citizens of free nations to "insist on an immediate withdrawal of the Soviet invaders from Czechoslovak territory."

It asked the United Nations to secure "the restoration of fundamental human rights" for Czechoslovakia and all other Soviet satellites.

Educational Project Set For 2,000 Rail Workers

The basic education of about 2,000 employes of seven railroads in the Chicago area will be upgraded through a pilot project supported by railroad labor and management and the federal government.

The purpose of the project, launched through contracts signed in Washington, is to give undereducated workers, especially those from minority groups, a better opportunity to advance to higher-paying jobs.

The project involves the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare, Railway Labor Executives Association, Association of American Railroads and managements of the seven carriers.

They are the Penn Central; Santa Fe; Chicago, Burlington & Quincy; Illinois Central; Baltimore & Ohio-Chesapeake & Ohio; Indiana Harbor Belt and Chicago Belt.

Under an HEW grant for $1 million, the 14-month education program will be conducted by the Board of Fundamental Education of Indianapolis.

Classes will be held in facilities provided by the participating railroads. Selection of trainees will be made jointly by the representatives of railroad management and labor.

George E. Leighty, RLEA chairman, commended the seven railroads and HEW for their role in "this humane undertaking" and voiced labor's satisfaction in participating.

"Because of this program," he said, "these men and women will be fitted with basic skills and knowledge that may help them get and hold better jobs, improve their feeling of economic security and raise their self-esteem."

Labor's Manpower Network Helps To Cut Red Tape, Reach the Needy

Labor's network of manpower representatives across the country is designed to help overcome two major shortcomings in the nation's manpower policy, an article in the August issue of the American Federationist points out.

The network, launched through the AFL-CIO's Human Resources Development Institute, is discussed by Julius F. Rothman, HRDI president and associate director of the Dept. of Urban Affairs.

His article, A New Look at Manpower Policy, also traces the development of the national effort to match workers with jobs beginning with passage of the Manpower Development & Training Act in 1962.

One of the most persistent charges by critics of federal manpower policy, Rothman writes, is that programs "overlap" and federal agencies have "conflicting areas of responsibility."

A second criticism, he notes, is that there is no guarantee that even the best conceived and administered program will really work "in terms of reaching the disadvantaged for whom it was designed."

The institute established by the AFL-CIO Executive Council last September "was launched as a frontal assault on both problems," Rothman says.

Under a contract signed with the Dept. of Labor, the institute has assembled and trained—in one year—a staff of 50 manpower representatives assigned to cities with high rates of hard-core unemployment.

The staff of representatives, trained through a series of regional meetings, was recruited from 27 different national unions.

Their training and orientation on government developments, the article says, will enable them to cut through "the maze of federal programs" in the manpower field.

Another advantage is that they have "backgrounds of involvement in a wide range of civic and community organizations as well as familiarity with organized labor."

Thus, they are well equipped to identify the unemployment problems in their communities, reach the people who need job training and match them with available jobs.

Also, the labor backgrounds of the institute's manpower representatives give them an opportunity to "tap the resources of great numbers of union members" in their respective cities, Rothman observes.

For example, the institute's "Buddy" system trains experienced union workers to team up on a volunteer basis with new employes—to help them overcome job-related problems during the probationary period.

The article stresses that the institute can only "help to ease the strain of the lack of coordination among various federal manpower programs"—that federal legislation is needed to correct the shortcoming.

For this reason, Rothman says, the AFL-CIO has endorsed a bill proposed by Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.) as "a new and invigorated approach to the nation's manpower problems."

It would consolidate job training under the MDTA and the Economic Opportunity Act into a single, flexible program; create a new program to encourage employers to upgrade workers to meet skill shortages; and establish a system of public service employment, backed by the federal government.

Rothman calls the plan to create jobs in the public service sector as an "important aspect" of the legislation.

A well-conceived manpower program "must recognize the need to provide jobs for all those who want to work," he states. "And since the private sector of the economy cannot do the job alone, a public service employment program should be developed."

In other areas, Rothman stresses the need for more funds for manpower programs and "federalization" of the employment service to make it "more responsive to the needs of the disadvantaged and the minorities."

But on the whole, he finds that a "good start" has been made in job training in the 1960s.

If that start were given "the added support called for in the O'Hara bill," Rothman concludes, "America could take a giant step toward eliminating poverty and achieving the goal set in 1946—of providing a job for 'all Americans able to work and seeking work.'"

Bottle Blowers Nearing Industry-Wide Pay Rate

Philadelphia—The first step toward achieving a uniform wage structure in the nation's glass container industry has been taken under a Glass Bottle Blowers collective bargaining program.

The union said the program negotiated last year with the Glass Container Manufacturers Institute "now is being implemented throughout more than 90 percent of the nation's glass container plants."

Under the program, embodied in contracts covering 38,000 workers, three steps will be taken toward achieving uniformity in wage rates for workers performing like work.

The first adjustments in rates became effective Aug. 1. The second and third adjustments will be made before contracts expire Mar. 1, 1971. At that time, the aim is to have uniform wages for like jobs fully established.

Any disputes in determining job classifications will be discussed at the plant level. If they cannot be resolved there they will go to a panel consisting of one representative from the union and one from industry with Dr. William Gomberg, professor of industry at the University of Pennsylvania, acting as mediator. Issues that cannot be resolved by the panel will be submitted to binding arbitration.

Union Pres. Lee W. Minton said the uniform wage structure program "can be the most significant development in our long history of bargaining in the glass container industry, with incalculable benefits for many members."

He and industry leaders believe it is the first uniform wage structure plan to be initiated throughout an entire industry.

They acknowledged that problems are likely to arise under the program and appealed to plant management and union leaders to show cooperation and patience in getting it under way.

Convention Re-Elects Berg:

Boilermakers Cite Organizing Gains

Kansas City, Mo.—The Boilermakers added up the record of union gains in the last four years and set their sights on more advances in the field of organizing, political action and legislation.

Some 900 delegates to the union's 23rd convention voted new four-year terms for Pres. Russell K. Berg, Sec.-Treas. H. E. Patton and 11 vice presidents. They chose Buddie Falls of Fort Worth, Tex., to succeed Vice Pres. Joseph P. McCollum, who is retiring, and raised monthly per capita payments from $2.75 a month to $3.50.

After prolonged debate the convention voted to take over the $1,000 death benefit fund from a private insurance company and to maintain it for members with 25 years of continuous membership.

Berg reported that union rolls have grown by 12,619 since the 1965 convention despite job losses to automation and the closing of some shipyards.

He said the union won 84 of 107 representation elections; negotiated wage increases averaging 20.3 percent and fringe benefits estimated at 10 percent for members in shops, plants and shipyards.

He announced that trustees of the union-management pension trust fund voted improved benefits effective Oct. 1. The annual basic benefit will be increased from 22 percent of contributions to 25 percent, the maximum death benefit lump-sum payment will go from $2,000 to $3,000 and the past-service monthly base will be increased from $1.75 to $2.

The trustees also voted to allow vested benefits for workers 45 and older after 10 years of pension plan coverage. They increased monthly benefit payments by 30 percent for those on the pension rolls as of next Sept. 30.

Many workers have benefited from the joint pension program and the health and welfare program, both of which are portable—that is, they are not lost when a union member changes jobs, Berg said.

Salaries of the officers and staff were raised by convention vote. The new salaries are $36,000 a year for president, $28,800 for secretary-treasurer, $1,800 a month for vice presidents and up to $1,440 a month for international representatives.

In other actions, the delegates rejected a proposal to hold conventions every five years instead of four, called on every local lodge to support the union political education program, chose Denver as the site of the 1973 convention and endorsed a $2 minimum wage, a more equitable tax system, and increased social security and Medicare payments for retirees.

The delegates collected $2,193 for victims of Hurricane Camille—a sum to be matched by the international union.

Convention speakers included Maritime Administrator Andrew E. Gibson; Pres. Maywood Boggs of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept.; James Yost, assistant to the president of the federation's Railway Employes Dept.; Sec.-Treas. Frank Bonadio of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

Gibson reported on the new supertanker, the Manhattan, built by union members at a Chester, Pa., shipyard, which is now on its way via a new Northwest Passage to the oil fields of Alaska.

"New tankers, built by American shipbuilders such as yourselves and manned by American seamen, will be required in large numbers," he told the convention.

"Some 40 new supertankers will be required to deliver this newly discovered Alaska oil. Even more important, the Manhattan's successful operation in her new career will graphically prove to the world the initiative and foresight of American maritime management, and the skill and resourcefulness of the men who design, build and man American ships," Gibson said.

Drive For Wage Law Opens in South Carolina

Charleston, S.C.—The South Carolina AFL-CIO urged all the state's unions to make political action their continuous commitment in 1969-1970, to press for passage of a state minimum wage law, and to launch local organizing drives.

More than 200 delegates from 125 unions called on every member to help generate maximum efforts in support of COPE register-and-vote drives and behind the campaigns of COPE-endorsed candidates.

Speakers at the 13th annual convention, besides State AFL-CIO Pres. Sinway Young and Sec.-Treas. E. T. Kirkland, included Executive Sec. Sam Ezelle of the Kentucky AFL-CIO, Legislative Dir. William DuChessi and Wayne Dernoncourt of the Textile Workers Union of America, Area COPE Dir. Wilbur Hobby of Durham, N.C., Harold McIver of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., and Robert Graham of the AFL-CIO regional staff.

A report on organizing noted that many thousands of South Carolina workers remain unorganized because of the "powerful opposition of the state's political and economic" interests.

Many workers cannot exercise their rights to bargain collectively and to secure fair representation from the state legislature and the federal government because of their powerlessness, the convention said.

The delegates asked each local union and central body to set up its own voluntary organizing committee, to survey each community and select an organizing objective, to notify the state body when progress has been made, and to cooperate with the appropriate union in winning representation rights.

The convention approved an appeal to Congress and the Secretary of Labor to restore funds cut from the Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training and to reopen a state office in place of the one at Greenville, S.C., vacated last year. Instead of cutting services the bureau should double its personnel to meet a "serious shortage of skilled manpower" in the state, delegates said.

They urged state party leaders to replace the Democratic Party chairman with a man "more interested in the workers of the state" than the present chairman, Crosby Lewis of Columbia. As lobbyist for the Chamber of Commerce, Lewis opposed several laws of benefit to employes, the convention said.

The right of public employes to organize also was stressed by delegates, who urged legislators to give government employes the same rights as those benefiting other workers.

At Painters' Convention:

Meany Spells Out Challenges to Labor

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A broad agenda of "new problems and new challenges" facing the labor movement was set forth by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to the Painters' 22nd convention here.

Meany's address traced labor's progress in "making life better" for union members and all of the people in our communities. But, he added, "despite the fact that much has been accomplished, there is much more to be done."

A big challenge for labor, he emphasized, is to harden its "political muscle" to block a conservative take-over of Congress in next year's elections. "So when we turn our thoughts to 1970, think of COPE," Meany exhorted.

Delegates to the four-day convention agreed to change the union's full name from the Brotherhood of Painters, Decorators & Paperhangers to Painters & Allied Trades.

The new name, subject to AFL-CIO Executive Council approval, was adopted by a convention vote after a committee selected it from 1,854 entries in a union-wide "name your union" contest.

Several contestants submitted the winning name, but Edward G. Tardy of Painters Local 1244, New Orleans, was declared the winner because his entry bore the earliest postmark. He will choose between a Bermuda vacation for two or $1,000 in cash.

In another action, the convention approved a new youth incentive program to be known as Labor for Youth Fitness and Employment. It will promote employment and training opportunities as well as physical fitness for young persons.

Meany and Stan Musial, a member of baseball's Hall of Fame, have agreed to serve as honorary co-chairmen of the program, Musial was adviser to Pres. Johnson in his Youth Fitness Program and has served as chairman of a Plumbers' youth program.

William Duval, director of apprenticeship and training for the union, will head the new program. Pres. S. Frank Raftery has expressed hope of eventually expanding the program into a youth department within the union.

The convention approved an increase in the union's per capita tax from $1 to $2.25 per month, along with a hike in the fee each local pays to the international on initiating a new member. The fee goes from $15 to $25. The increase in the union's per capita is the first in 10 years.

The additional revenue will go toward increased organizing activity, increased salaries for union officials, an expanded apprentice program and meeting higher union expenses.

The delegates also approved an emergency assistance fund in which the union's executive board will put aside $150,000 a year to aid locals involved in strikes. Allotments from the fund must receive executive board approval.

Meany told the delegates that labor's progress can only be measured by a "yardstick of human values: What we are accomplishing to make life better for the people we represent as well as the people and the communities in which we live."

"By that yardstick," he said, "the American trade union movement rates high marks."

Meany said that the AFL-CIO agrees with Pres. Nixon's conclusion that the nation's welfare system needs an overhaul, but "we find very little to commend in the proposal that he has put forth for badly needed improvement."

He said the federation intends to present to Congress in the months ahead "alternative proposals to meet the real needs of the people," and added:

"But perhaps it would not be out of order to suggest to Pres. Nixon . . . that one big giant step forward would be to accept the AFL-CIO proposal for a national $2 an hour minimum wage law that would include coverage for 8 to 10 million people now excluded from the law."

In other areas, Meany emphasized that labor's present and future battles will center on:

- Changing an "unjust system of taxation" that lets the wealthy escape paying a fair share of taxes.
- Helping to alleviate "miserable conditions" in cities by creating more jobs.
- Obtaining decent housing for workers and low income families.

Labor will use its "economic strength" to help find solutions to the problems and it will use its "political strength" to help elect concerned lawmakers, Meany concluded.

IATSE Board Elects Forde To No. 2 Post

Miami Beach—John A. Forde, vice president of the Theatrical Stage Employes since 1968, was elected IATSE secretary-treasurer at a union executive board meeting here. He succeeds John A. Shuff, who retired for reasons of health.

Board members also elected Michael J. Sweeney of Philadelphia Stage Employes Local 8 and Patrick H. Ryan of Studio Mechanics Local 476, Chicago, as vice presidents to fill vacancies caused by the deaths of Harry J. Abbott and LeRoy Upton.

Pres. Richard F. Walsh announced the election of James J. Riley, business agent of Operators Local 160 in Cleveland as trustee succeeding Sweeney, and the appointment of Martin Torreano, business agent of Operators Local 171 in Pittsburgh as an international union representative.

Forde previously served as president of Operators Local 162, San Francisco, in 1950 and 1951; business agent of that local; member of Stage Employes Local 134, San Jose, Calif., and as an international representative from 1954 to 1968.

Utah Delegates Reject Changes in Structure

Salt Lake City—Lively debate over proposed constitutional changes and a four-way race for a top federation office highlighted the 13th annual convention of the Utah AFL-CIO.

Delegates enacted more than a score of resolutions, received reports from Pres. C. E. Berger and other officers and heard addresses from labor, farm and government leaders.

The convention voted down a proposed change in the constitution under which the post of secretary-treasurer would have been eliminated, a new $12,000-a-year post of executive secretary would have been created, and the presidency would be a part-time position.

A proposal to raise the salaries of the president and secretary-treasurer to $1,000 a month was tabled until next year's convention. The president now receives $775 and the secretary-treasurer, $725.

Also tabled until next year's convention was a move to increase per capita payments to the state labor body from 15 to 25 cents a month. The raise would have been earmarked to cover the proposed salary increases.

The delegates approved new machinery for filling vacant offices in the federation and pensions and insurance for full time employes. Details of both are to be worked out by committees appointed by the president.

Berger and A. A. Thon, federation vice president, were re-elected without opposition. Berger will be serving his third two-year term and Thon was named for a sixth term.

The convention chose R. Boyd Clark as the federation's new secretary-treasurer, succeeding Ormond Konkle, who retired from the post in May.

Clark, a leader in Steelworkers Local 3736, defeated three other candidates: S. Ralph Van Dam, Iron Workers Local 27; William H. Call, Typographical Union; and Arthur D. Coleman, State, County & Municipal Employes Local 1084.

Major resolutions adopted by the delegates called for federal action to roll back "soaring interest rates;" rejection by Congress of a bill to establish a postal corporation; investigation of the auto insurance industry; abolishment of the state sales tax on clothing, food and drugs; and passage of the AFL-CIO's tax reform proposals.

One resolution urged Utah's government officials and educators to do less boasting about the state's educational system and spend more time trying to bolster the economy of the state, whose per capita income is 21 percent below the national average.

It declared that bright, ambitious high school and college graduates "have to leave the state to make a living for themselves and their families."

IUE Completes Proposals to GE, Asks Early Reply to Avoid 'Crisis'

New York—The Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers completed presentation of the union's 1969 contract proposals to the General Electric Co., and urged management to respond promptly in order to avoid "crisis bargaining."

The presentation, two months ahead of contract expiration, was in response to GE's request for early talks.

"Now it is GE's turn to start negotiating on the issues we have raised," said IUE's chief negotiator, John Shambo. "Tell us where you agree, where you have a counter-proposal, and where you disagree."

IUE hopes GE will respond on each issue early enough for full-scale, give-and-take discussion wherever warranted, Shambo said. Three years ago, he recalled, GE "held back, refusing to give its position on individual issues. Finally it submitted an old-fashioned package offer accompanied by intensive pressure to accept."

That led IUE and GE to the brink of a strike, Shambo said. "This year we need a more constructive approach," he added.

At Shambo's side were IUE Sec.-Treas. David J. Fitzmaurice, longtime member of IUE's negotiating team at GE; IUE Gen. Counsel Irving Abramson; representatives of IUE locals at GE locations and members of other GE unions.

The IUE and nine of the unions have formed the AFL-CIO Coordinated Bargaining Committee to expedite the spread of information about management's responses—a device approved by the courts. The others are the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, the Steelworkers, Technical Engineers, Carpenters, Plumbers, Flint Glass Workers, Machinists, Allied Industrial Workers and Sheet Metal Workers. Chairman of the CBC Steering Committee is James D. Compton.

Another member of the IUE committee here is Daniel Benedict, assistant secretary general of the International Metal Workers Federation, representing unions of GE employes in Europe, Asia, Latin America and North America.

IUE economic proposals called for wage increases which reflect cost-of-living rises as well as increased productivity and settlements in other industries; supplemental increases to salaried and hourly workers for improved skills; elimination of all area wage differentials; a 37.5-hour work week; improved pensions and a non-contributory insurance program for GE workers and their families.

Canadian Living Costs Increase 5% in Year

Ottawa—Canada's consumer price index, pushed by higher food and housing costs, rose by half a point in July to 126.4 against the 1961 base of 100, the Dominion Bureau of Statistics reported here. The index was 5 percent higher than last July.

Food costs rose eight-tenths of 1 percent; housing costs were up four-tenths of 1 percent. Higher restaurant prices accounted for most of the food rise, while higher mortgage interest rates and rents were responsible for the spurt in housing prices.

Inner Cities Food Pricing Bias Noted

Food supermarket chains in the inner city do not provide the same pricing and services as their stores in the suburbs because of a lack of competition, a staff study conducted by the Federal Trade Commission declared.

The study of food chain selling practices in Washington, D.C. and San Francisco disclosed that low income families in the central city often pay more than the higher income families in the suburbs.

The recommended cure, according to the study, is more supermarket competition in the inner city, stress on price competition, and government agencies helping to create the competition through various programs of aid and renewal.

The study showed that advertised food items are frequently unavailable in a chain's inner city stores and that city buyers sometimes pay higher prices for other reasons. Some of the price variations were not authorized by the chain, it noted, and in those cases the variations were on the side of higher prices.

A Call for Help

FOR THOUSANDS of American workers, there will be no picnics, parades or trips to the ball park this Labor Day.

In the hurricane-ravaged Gulf Coast, in the flood-devastated areas of Virginia, homes and jobs have been swept away.

From the very first days, labor's community service teams have been working with the Red Cross in the rescue operations and the mammoth task of providing emergency shelter, food and clothing for the refugees.

Union building tradesmen—volunteers all—are being flown into the Gulf Coast area to contribute their skills and labor to the reconstruction effort.

Those of us further away from the scene can mark this Labor Day with a meaningful expression of solidarity with our union brothers and sisters—and our fellow Americans in all walks of life.

We can give generously to our local Red Cross. As AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany urged, it's "the best way to do the most good in the fastest possible time."

Trickle-Down Housing

ADMINISTRATION ECONOMISTS have apparently opted for the slowest, most uncertain and most inequitable method of meeting the nation's critical shortage of housing.

Even if military expenditures drop, we are told, there will be no "peace dividend" since the plan is to reduce the government debt through bigger and bigger budget surpluses.

This, the theory goes, will ease the strain on the private money market and thus free more funds for investment in home mortgages—hopefully at less usurious rates than banks now charge.

And the so urgently needed and so long underfinanced domestic programs—including housing—will have to depend on this torturously slow trickle-down policy.

Of course, the federal budget last fiscal year showed a multi-billion dollar surplus and is headed for an even bigger one this year. And interest rates have moved higher, housing starts lower.

It is not too small a surplus that is responsible for the lack of decent housing at prices the average worker can afford, despite the hopes raised by last year's Housing Act.

It is not the lack of bigger budget surpluses, but the lack of congressional financing that has blighted the bright promise of the Model Cities program.

Congress passed a magnificent program on paper. Hundreds of cities develop impressive plans to rehabilitate entire neighborhoods—and ended up competing fiercely for the crumbs of available federal money.

A big budget surplus won't bring good housing within the reach of the average worker—not without federal subsidies to hold down land acquisition costs and reduce mortgage rates. Nor will it provide the schools, the mass transportation, the health facilities needed.

There are ways—as the AFL-CIO has persistently advocated— of holding down interest rates and freeing private funds for mortgage investment. It is the inflationary capital goods boom, the unneeded tax incentives to land speculation, a wrong-way monetary policy—and underfinancing of federal programs—that have brought on the housing crisis.

It won't be solved by bookkeeping.

A Word Edgewise:

Poor Record of States Mars Proposal for 'Fund Sharing'

By John P. Roche

PRES. NIXON'S MESSAGE to Congress on "fund sharing" sets out quite clearly his assumptions about the dangers of centralized federal power. The thesis, in broad outline, is that events of the last 36 years (that is, from F.D.R.'s accession to the presidency) have led the American people to place increasing reliance on their central government. Thus "power and responsibility flowed in greater and greater measure from the state capitals to the national capital," the stature of the national government suffered because it "promised so much and delivered so little," and the people have lost faith in Washington.

The message is an interesting, cleverly prepared document. Absent is the paranoia of the right wing: Nixon uncovered no sinister conspiracy. There is only one reference to the Father of the Republic, whose curse is usually invoked freely on centralizers. (The President condemned the "gathering of the reins of power in Washington" as a "radical departure from the vision of federal-state relations" held in 1787. Anyone who appreciates the experimental zest of the framers of the Constitution should realize that they would disown as nit-wits those who would apply the wisdom of 1787 to 1969.)

The key assumption is that there is something politically wholesome about state and local government. A secondary proposition is that, while the national government is remote and unresponsive, state and local governments are models of participatory democracy. A third implies that decentralization of power and responsibility will develop efficiency.

If one assumes that Republican control of the statehouse is a guarantee of wholesome government, Mr. Nixon has a point, politically speaking. The GOP dominates the state scene. But if we use a few other indices of wholesomeness, the picture changes. In most states, for example, the spoils system still runs rampant (over 95 percent of federal employes are under civil service procedures).

Federal civil service regulations do create inflexibility, but they also offer considerable protection against grand and petty larceny. If Congress does agree to pass federal funds out to the states, I hope it will make the governors post bond.

Similarly, the national government may be somewhat unresponsive and remote, but public opinion analyses make it clear that the average American feels a far closer bond to Washington than he does to his state government.

HOW MANY READERS of this column know the names of their state representatives? Their state senators? (As a matter of fact, I just asked my wife who our senator is. I had forgotten, but as a member of the League of Women Voters she is always reliable on such things.) Or check the fall-off in elections between the votes for national officials and those for state and local office.

Paradoxically, state governments have become more responsive to their constituents in the last decade because the Supreme Court finally broke the back of malapportionment by implementing the "one man, one vote" principle in state elections.

This finally made it possible for the cities and suburbs to exercise their rightful weight in the electoral process, but it took the power of the central government to bring the states to heel.

Which brings us to the final point. Why are the states in such dire financial condition? Broadly speaking, the answer is that they have been incapable for setting up an effective tax system. Massachusetts, for instance, is tottering on the abyss of bankruptcy because we cannot get approval for an effective, progressive income tax. Why not? Because the people of the commonwealth do not trust the governor and the general court to spend the money.

Right or wrong, the average American believes that an honest grand jury would indict half his state officials—a fact that Nixon should consider before he goes too far with his handouts.

Labor Day Messages:

Religion Leaders Laud Labor For Role in Aiding Minorities

LABOR'S ROLE in bringing oppressed minorities into the mainstream of American life was emphasized in Labor Day messages from leaders of the Catholic and Jewish faiths. An analysis of the crisis in modern society was suggested as appropriate for the day by a Protestant church group.

Rabbi Solomon J. Sharfman extended cordial greetings to the labor movement on behalf of the Synagogue Council of America, representing six national Orthodox, Reform and Conservative organizations. The Rt. Rev. George G. Higgins issued a statement for the United States Catholic Conference. The National Council of the Churches of Christ released a message by the late Rev. Truman B. Douglass.

Rabbi Sharfman said that, since Judaism has always spoken in understanding terms of labor and its place in the world, "our acknowledgement of the noble spirit of Labor Day is therefore in the best tradition of Jewish faith; and on this Labor Day the Synagogue Council of America salutes the American labor movement and wishes it well in its dedication to the strengthening of the good and meaninful life for all Americans."

"Regrettably, not all Americans have a share in the good life.

"There is appalling poverty in our land—families who live in slums that are a national disgrace; Americans from whom the respect-giving vitality of useful employment is withheld.

"In city after city, antagonism between white and black Americans has fearsomely erupted into mindless destruction, and is writing a shameful chronicle that is a strain upon our land.

"It is the alienation and the hopelessness of desperate people that is at the heart of the malaise that threatens to destroy our society."

Rabbi Sharfman called on American labor to "live up fully to its own unique responsibilities in doing those things it can do best—to bring this aleinated citizenry back into the mainstream of American life by giving them a stake not just in the dream . . . but in the reality of affluent America."

There must, he said, be an expansion of job opportunities for the disadvantaged. Apprenticeships, and the enlargement of union membership can "play a most decisive role in opening closed doors," he wrote.

He added that "obviously the American labor movement cannot by itself right all existing wrongs." American business and industry and "above all, federal and state governments, must assume responsibility and initiative without which the challenge will remain unmet."

Msgr. Higgins noted the development of a strong reaction against the increasing demands of minority group citizens. He said:

"The splendid history of organized labor in this century in helping the workingman gain his rightful dignity in our industrial society should offer hope that the remaining problems of poverty and oppression can be met with equally good results.

"What seems to be lacking, however, is a national determination to solve our problems by creative and positive action.

"Our leaders in both the private and public sectors claim to be aware of the great need for social development in the urban and rural 'pockets of poverty.' Yet no one seems able to arouse the national will or form the broad coalitions to get the needed massive development programs under way."

Msgr. Higgins deplored the fact that not enough attention has been paid to Pope Paul VI's 1967 message on the Development of Peoples, addressed to the plight of the poor of all lands.

At this "turning-point into the '70s," he declared, the Catholic Church is in a position to show the way by "making a generous portion of its limited resources available . . . for the poor and the powerless."

The churches alone, he said, cannot "significantly develop the capital resources needed" to change the economic and social plight of minority group citizens, but they can "set an example" of moral leadership for the rest of the nation.

Hand in hand with renewed Christian social teaching, Msgr. Higgins said, must come "action programs to support the poor in their drive for ecenomic development and human dignity." Such programs may "hopefully encourage labor and management and government agencies, local, state and federal."

The statement of the late Dr. Douglass declared that "our country is in deep trouble. We Americans, who have prided ourselves on our resourcefulness, our inventiveness, our virtuosity in improvisation, do not know how to handle our present situation."

He said that "for the first time in our history we have ground to a halt and do not know how to get in motion again. Ironically, this American defeat is occurring at a time when American capability is at an all-time high."

It is becoming increasingly clear, Dr. Douglass wrote, "that the crisis in American society is a crisis in priorities—in decisions and choices.

"We are in trouble today because we have not made the choices and taken the consequent actions that put first things first.

"We have not been humble enough to face our own finiteness. We cannot police the planet in the enforcement of our ideas of economic and political organization and at the same time make our own society such that others will be tempted to emulate it.

"We cannot commit three-fourths of our national income" from taxes to pay for past, present and future wars, and at the same time achieve conditions of justice and order that will persuade men that peace is worth preserving.

"We cannot give some of our people unlimited hope while closing the door of hope to others, and expect a united and dynamic growth of American aspirations."

Paycheck Chiseling:

Flouting of Wage-Hour Law Linked to Weak Enforcement

VIGOROUS ENFORCEMENT of the federal wage-and-hour law is the only way to curb employer violations that most often victimize workers at the lowest end of the economic scale, an AFL-CIO economist declared.

"In spite of the talk of law and order," charged Rudolph Oswald, "the employer who robs a man of $50 in his paycheck often gets away with it." Oswald said that the official tally of federal wage and hour violations last year was $89 million in underpayments. Nearly half a million workers were cheated in these instances, he said.

Worse still, the total number of violations may be "three to four times those actually discovered," Oswald noted. He pointed out that although 50 percent more establishments were added to Fair Labor Standard Act coverage in 1966 Congress has failed to appropriate funds to expand enforcement machinery.

He said that the Labor Dept.'s Wage & Hour Division has "about 1,000 investigators . . . the same number" it had five years ago, and that they are currently limited to inspecting "only about 3 percent of the establishments covered by the act."

Questioned by reporters on Labor News Conference, Oswald rejected the contention that boosting the minimum wage from the present $1.60 to $2 an hour, as strongly urged by the AFL-CIO, would lead to an even higher level of violations.

"THE VIOLATIONS come largely from chiseling employers who undercut," he said, and raising the minimum wage would not necessarily add more to that group. Most employers, he said, do try to comply with minimum wage, overtime pay and equal pay for equal work requirements, and they should be concerned about employers who evade the law.

Employers who cheat are unfair competition to employers who abide by the law, he said.

THERE ARE NINE SEATS on the U.S. Supreme Court. Although in the White House only a short time, Pres. Nixon has been in position to fill two of the seats.

First, he named Judge Warren E. Burger as Chief Justice of the United States, replacing Earl Warren. Now, he has nominated the Chief Judge of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit, Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., to fill the vacancy left by the resignation of Abe Fortas. It adds up to two conservatives replacing two liberals.

The nomination of Haynsworth, a South Carolinian, is tinged with both irony and significance as far as trade unionists are concerned.

One of Warren's last decisions as a member of the court, handed down on June 16, 1969, upset a 4th Circuit ruling. If the 4th Circuit decision, in the Gissel Packing Co. case, had been upheld it would have denied to workers an essential protection against anti-union employers.

It was Haynsworth who cast the deciding vote in the 4th Circuit in the Gissel case, against the National Labor Relations Board and labor—specifically, the Meat Cutters. He wrote the decision in an earlier, similar Logan Packing case.

This protection is actually a legal remedy which requires an employer to recognize and bargain with a majority labor union when the employer has been found unlawfully threatening, coercing and discriminating against his workers, making free choice in a fair election impossible.

Rep. Frank Thompson (D-N.J.), chairman of the House Labor subcommittee, rose on the floor of the House recently to praise Warren's "brilliant" 43-page decision.

"This decision," said Thompson, "has rich significance in the field of labor-management relations because it confirms the commitment of the Congress and of this society to the principle of free choice for the American worker."

The Gissel ruling actually reviewed and upheld a 1950 "Joy Silk" decision by a lower court.

It held that when workers are forced to vote in a Labor Board election out of fear for their jobs and families' security, as a result of the employers' illegal acts, other evidence of employe choice must be utilized.

Union authorization cards are considered such other evidence in the Gissel decision. The high court found that the board reliance on union authorization cards as evidence of employe choice—particularly when coupled with safeguards which the board has developed for testing the authenticity and reliability of these cards—carries out Congress' policies.

IN 1961 A SUBCOMMITTEE of the House under Rep. Roman C. Pucinski (D-Ill.) spent many days probing this matter and concluded that the "Joy Silk" remedy was necessary, proper and underutilized. Another subcommittee reached a similar decision in 1966.

"While the 'Joy Silk' remedy has been sparingly used by the NLRB," said Thompson, "there can be little doubt that it has been the 'finger-in-the-dike' for America labor relations."

"If employers were free to intimidate, coerce and threaten their employes before or after an NLRB election without being subject to a bargaining order remedy, there would be simply no legal remedy for the right of employes to select a bargaining agent freely."

Thompson said that "it is hardly surprising that the Supreme Court approved the 'Joy Silk' remedy. It is obviously right. Every court of appeals in the nation—except the 4th Circuit in recent years—has previously approved it".

Under Haynsworth since 1967, the 4th circuit has been consistent in ignoring the "Joy Silk" decision. This policy has now been struck down by the Supreme Court, but Haynsworth himself, if confirmed by the Senate, will move up to the high court.

That's the irony and significance.

EMPLOYERS WHO CHEAT on the wage-and-hour law most often victimize workers at the lowest end of the economic scale, AFL-CIO Economist Rudolph Oswald, center, said on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Alexander Uhl, left, of Press Associates, Inc., and William Eaton of the Chicago Daily News. The public affairs radio interview is broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EDT, on the Mutual radio network.

How to Buy:

Meager Funding by Congress Saps Consumer Safeguards

By Sidney Margolius

CONGRESS HAS BECOME increasingly consumer conscious. It has shown awareness of both your safety in relation to the products you buy, and of the money-wasting difficulties in selecting fair values in the face of today's high-pressure merchandising.

But at the same time Congress has been reluctant to put muscle into recently-enacted consumer-protection laws by providing enough money to make them effective. Obviously, laws with inadequate enforcement are not much better than no laws at all.

That's why you still have trouble in the supermarket comparing values among different sized packages. It also is why you still may be tapped by deceptive TV commercials into overpaying for household medicines. Inadequate funding also threatens the potential effectiveness of the new "truth in lending" law.

Most dangerously, this is also why many of the recently-passed safety laws still do not give you the degree of protection from unnecessary hazards that you have a right to expect.

Within the last eight years, some 43 major safety laws have been enacted, reports Howard Pyle, president of the National Safety Council.

Pyle contends that safety legislation often passes with a storm of applause only to be greeted by an awesome silence when it comes time for funding. Many a good bill has been critically weakened by an appropriations committee that refused to allocate the needed funds, he says.

One example cited by Pyle is the Highway Safety Act of 1966. When it was passed, Congress authorized $267 million to fund it through fiscal 1969. Many safety experts felt that this was hardly enough for a thorough job, but were encouraged because it marked a beginning for this needed legislation. But in the final appropriations bill, the total three-year budget for the Traffic Safety Bureau was $92 million, far short of the $267 million promised by Congress three years before.

The 1967 amendments to the Flammable Fabrics Act are another example of public-spirited intentions undercut by lack of funds.

Here is what really happened. The language of the law authorized the appropriation of $1.5 million for 1968. But, no funds at all were appropriated that year, Pyle points out. The law authorized $2.5 million for fiscal 1969 and again for fiscal 1970. One-tenth of the amount authorized, $250,000 was actually appropriated for 1969.

Just this past June, William V. White, executive director of the National Committee on Product Safety, testified at congressional hearings that while the Commerce Dept. is working on improved flammability standards there still has been no change. Meanwhile, "a lot of people are being injured or killed," he warned.

SAFETY LEGISLATION is not the only consumer-oriented legislation that suffers for lack of money, Pyle says. The "truth in packaging" law, passed in 1966 to help the housewife with comparison buying, is in financial trouble. Last year a staff of two people limped along on $50,000, trying to do the massive work outlined in the act. This year no money whatsoever has been alotted to the act.

The Consumer Federation of America also has expressed its fear that inadequate funds to put "truth in packaging" into effect will further reduce the already limited help this new law gives consumers.

The complexity of governmental operations makes it difficult to keep track of funding for laws supposed to protect consumers. This complexity also makes it difficult for people to express their concern to officials and legislators who have some influence on the funding of such laws. But it can be done.

One way is to get in touch with your congressman. Another is to write to Mrs. Virginia Knauer, special assistant to the President for Consumer Affairs.

Survey Reveals:

Nixon's Honeymoon With Consumers Off

UNFAVORABLE NEWS concerning inflation and rising interest rates contributed to a deterioration in consumer sentiment during the second quarter of 1969, the University of Michigan's Survey Research Center reports.

"The Nixon honeymoon is over," say the economists who analyzed the results of hour-long interviews with a cross-section of more than 1,500 American families in May and June.

"Consumers have little confidence that the rate of inflation will be reduced during the next 12 months. The majority of people believe that interest rates will continue to go up during the next year. There has been a small increase in the proportion expecting more unemployment. With respect to Viet Nam, people are still waiting to see what happens."

They found that people do not believe that high interest rates will help curtail inflation. Fully 45 percent of the respondents, in answer to a direct question, expressed the opinion that price increases during the next 12 months will be larger than in the past 12. An additional 32 percent expected about the same amount of increase.

THE OUTLOOK for consumer spending on durable goods and other discretionary items is heavily dependent upon how people react to the expectation of a high rate of inflation, the report says.

"On the one hand," it points out, "price increases have a pervasive adverse effect on attitudes toward the personal financial situation and expectations about the trend of the economy. High prices are frequently mentioned as a reason why now is a bad time to buy large household durables or a car.

"On the other hand, when rapid inflation is expected, some people recognize the incentive to buy before the price goes up. The May-June 1969 survey shows little increase in the frequency with which this argument is mentioned as a reason why it is a good time to buy. In fact, with respect to cars, this reasoning was mentioned less frequently than a year ago in May 1968. On balance, inflation still serves to restrict consumers' discretionary spending, especially among families with moderate income."

Fully 61 percent of families expect interest rates to go up during the next 12 months and another 25 percent expect them at least to remain the same. These expectations have an adverse effect on the market for durable goods, and especially housing, but some consumers feel that one should buy a home before interest rates go up further.

While there have been no large swings in consumer sentiment during the last two years, the SRC economists note, income gains have been very frequent. As a result, discretionary spending has continued at a fairly high rate during the two years.

"Since attitudes are at present far from favorable and real incomes probably will grow slowly," the report concludes, "the outlook is for only modest gains in expenditures for durables and discretionary items during the second half of 1969. In terms of unit sales, prospects are even less favorable."

Soup to Nonsense:

Propitious Day of Action Turns Into 'Should've Stayed in Bed'

By Jane Goodsell

AWOKE FEELING cheerful. Got up. Big mistake. Went downstairs to fix breakfast. Discovered oven left on all night at 350 degrees. Know better ways to waste money. Made coffee, fixed orange juice, scrambled eggs. Coffee weak. Eggs overcooked. Answered phone. Cleaners calling to say spot on blue dress can't be entirely removed. Made beds. Washed dishes. Got dressed. Wore wool suit. Weather cool and cloudy.

Drove downtown. Spotted empty parking space ahead in middle of block. Chortled with glee. On closer inspection, empty parking turned out to be filled with Volkswagen. Drove 'round and 'round, looking for place to park. Spotted one. Car just ahead of me took it. All parking lots full. Finally got into pigeonhole parking lot seven blocks from destination.

Shopped for tank top to go with striped denim pants. No such thing. Salesclerks said not in style this year. How come magazines full of them? Looked at swimsuits. Felt too fat to try them on. Decided to go on diet. Eat fruit and cottage cheese for lunch.

Weather turning hot. Eighty-five at least. Should have worn sleeveless cotton dress. Wool suit hot and itchy. Suddenly remembered dentist appointment. Today? Stood in line at telephone booth for ten minutes, waiting to call dentist's office. Got in booth. Looked up phone number. Opened coin purse. No change for phone.

Went across street to department store to get change. Used phone booth in department store to dial dentist. Line busy. Kept dialing. And dialing.

Raced to parking lot to get car. Attendant shook his head. Half-hour delay. Elevator out of order. No way to get car down to street level. Choked back tears. Asked to use phone to call dentist. No phone in parking lot. Went to lunch counter down the block to use phone.

SAT DOWN at lunch counter. Too upset to eat cottage cheese. Ordered hamburger. Ate it, feeling ashamed. Returned to parking lot. Elevator still not fixed. Watched men working to repair it. Slowly. Very slowly. Tapped heels. Bit lips. Wrung hands. Forty minutes later, car descended via elevator.

Drove to dentist's office. Sat in waiting room 50 minutes. Dentist found two cavities. Just to be mean? To get even for ruining his schedule? Went home. Collapsed on bed.

Got up to read horoscope for today. Stars said, "Day propitious for getting things done."

Now honestly.

Workers Facing Major Challenges in '70s

Economics, Politics Pose Crucial Tests

By Alexander Uhl

THERE PROBABLY will be a lot of debate over whether the year 1970 is the last year of the 1960s or the first year of the new decade of the '70s. But, whoever wins the semantic argument, the fact remains that the year ahead will confront American workers with economic and political challenges they dare not ignore.

How closely interwoven are these challenges is amply illustrated in the current dispute over tax reform and the surtax. The 1970s are certain to see more battles of this type as economics and politics become involved in such matters as high interest rates, the fight against inflation, the kind of tax reform that the American people want and desperately need.

The Nixon Administration has given the battle against inflation a high priority in its program. For workers, who have been hard hit by the soaring cost of living, the fight to hold down prices must, of course, come as a welcome one.

Yet, it holds the seeds of economic disaster that can mean higher unemployment, even a depression that could easily wipe out the relative affluence of the past few years.

"Tight money" was a key policy during the last Republican Administration, when Gen. Eisenhower sat in the White House. There is no reason to think that this new Republican Administration will not continue to listen to the bankers as Eisenhower did in the 1950s. That policy produced three recessions and left the United States with a jobless rate of 5.4 percent when the Democrats took over under the presidency of John F. Kennedy. The rate that Nixon inherited was 3.3 percent. The rate today is 3.6 percent.

A slowdown in economic activity that could affect jobs seriously is not out of the 1970 picture by any means.

There are other crucial areas that demand adequate solutions.

- The United States still has a grave housing problem that has been worsened by high interest rates that put mortgages out of reach for even well-paid workers.
- The unemployment compensation system is gravely defective. Instead of the 66 percent of average wages, benefit ceilings are cruelly low in many states, notably the South. The national average is 34.3 percent.
- Social security benefits are far outdated. The labor movement calls for a boost of 50 percent in benefits. The Nixon Administration proposes a bare 7 percent.
- What about the war on poverty? The Administration started out boldly to kill the Job Corps, marched down the hill in somewhat hasty retreat but still appears determined to starve it out. Will business—as the Administration would like to see—take over the war on poverty, job training and job getting? Or can it?
- Finally, there is Viet Nam. Pres. Nixon told the electorate that he had a card or two up his sleeve that would resolve that conflict, but the card has not been forthcoming. Token troop withdrawals are taking place, but they are far from a definitive change in Administration policy. Next year should be a crucial one for Nixon with respect to the war.

Many of these problems, of course, are not short range ones. They will be resolved only in terms of Congressional action and Administration policies that must grow and respond to changing conditions.

The 1970 elections thus are crucial.

Labor's friends and the friends of social and economic progress face one of the toughest campaigns in recent history. The Nixon Administration will be fighting for a Republican-controlled Congress more in its own image. Conservatives and the far-right extremists throughout the country will be fighting to defeat as many liberals as they can.

The House of Representatives today has 244 Democrats, 188 Republicans and three vacant seats. At least 30 representatives who have good labor and liberal records were elected in 1968 by less than 55 percent. How many of these are in real trouble when it comes to re-election is difficult to say, but it is clear that their return to Congress cannot be taken for granted.

The liberal position in the Senate is even more perilous. Here chance has placed the Democratic Party in a highly vulnerable position. Of the 33 Senate seats to be filled next year, 25 are Democratic and only eight are held by Republicans. This means an almost three to one risk in a Senate that now numbers 57 Democrats and 43 Republicans.

A loss of only eight Democratic seats out of the 25 could mean a Republican majority of one.

What are the chances for a change?

There are at least eight friends of labor in the Senate who won by less than 55 percent in 1964 when they were last up for election. At least two additional Democratic seats may go one way or the other. Only two of the eight Republican seats at stake are considered vulnerable. The odds are considerable that the Democrats will retain control of the Senate, but the odds are equally strong that their margin will be cut.

In that event the old Republican-Dixiecrat coalition that has long played a crucial role in Senate votes will be strengthened since there is little chance that any of the Southern conservatives up for re-election will be beaten.

One bright note in the Senate picture is a developing rebellion among liberal Republicans who feel that their party is slipping back into its old conservative stance. The dominant role of Senators Everett M. Dirksen and Strom Thurmond, especially in the field of civil rights has brought criticism from half a dozen Senate representatives of Republican liberalism. The Senate may well develop a strong non-partisan liberal bloc.

As AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told a recent Seafarers convention:

"I think it is well to remind every labor audience, every segment of the AFL-CIO, that while we have done a good job politically, this is no time to rest on our oars," he declared. "We still have got a job to do in 1970."

That just about sums it up.

Election Test Proved Potency Of Labor's Political Capability

By Harry Conn

ONE YEAR AGO—Labor Day 1968—organized labor was putting out its greatest effort on the political front.

Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey had solid labor support in his quest to succeed Lyndon B. Johnson as President of the United States.

The pollsters and the columnists were predicting, however, that not only would Richard M. Nixon win the presidency overwhelmingly but that the third candidate, former Alabama Gov. George C. Wallace, would get a heavy labor vote.

That might have been the picture Labor Day 1968. It was not the final result of the November election, however.

By the narrowest of margins, Nixon was elected President but trade unionists obviously gave the great bulk of their votes to Humphrey. And George Wallace finished a poor third, especially in working class areas outside the South.

With some exceptions, labor-endorsed candidates for Congress did very well. Despite the Nixon victory in the race for the White House, Democrats retained control of both the Senate and the House of Representatives.

From the time that the new 91st Congress convened in January and the new President was sworn into office the labor movement has been on the legislative tightrope.

It is that way today, Labor Day 1969, at the end of the brief Congressional vacation.

Labor is continuing to press for tax reform—closing the loopholes—and is battling against other factors in rising living costs such as excess profits, tight money and high interest rates, exported capital, rising medical costs.

Union legislative representatives have been in the front lines, too, fighting against air and water pollution, for expansion of the war on poverty and against hunger, effective consumer protection, more earned rights for the elderly, advances in federal aid to education, civil rights, housing, Job Corps, etc.

On strictly labor issues there has been little or no progress except for the new construction safety law.

There were dramatic developments within the labor movement over the year. Among the highlights:

Collective Bargaining—The grape strike and boycott by the AFL-CIO Farm Workers continued to capture the support of unionists, church leaders, students—not only in the United States but around the world.

One of the more sensational developments was the revelation by Press Associates that the Dept. of Defense had increased grape purchases for Viet Nam by 350 percent in the last year. DOD officials insisted to Senate investigators that they were "neutral" in the dispute.

The spotlight also focused on the hospital strikes in Charleston, S.C., by Local 1199B of the Retail Wholesale & Dept. Store Union. Strikers were reinstated and the union received a check-off through a credit union—a step necessitated by state law.

In Charleston, W. Va., the Laborers are still fighting Gov. Arch Moore's firing of more than 2,000 state highway department workers for striking.

Another continuing strike and lockout is that of the newspaper unions against the Herald-Examiner in Los Angeles. The unions are asking support by boycotting Hearst advertisers. The lockout of Machinists by National Airlines has led to the IAM asking a boycott of that carrier.

Longshoremen on East and Gulf Coasts engaged in their longest waterfront strike in history before settlement was reached in January.

Some 68,000 oil workers, members of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers won their strike.

Two other strikes and boycotts ended in victory for the Textile Workers Union of America at Kayser-Roth Hosiery and the Meat Cutters at Neuhoff Meats.

Union Mergers—The biggest merger since the AFL-CIO got together back in 1955 took place in January when four railroad operating unions became the United Transportation Union.

The merger brought together the Trainmen, the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen, the Conductors & Brakemen, and the Switchmen. Former BRT Pres. Charles Luna was elected president of the UTU.

Other mergers saw the Railway & Airline Clerks link with the Transportation-Communications Union and with the Railway Patrolmen.

New Leaders—The AFL-CIO received a new secretary-treasurer when Lane Kirkland succeeded William F. Schnitzler, who retired after 45 years of service to labor.

Other retirements included IAM Pres. Roy Siemiller, succeeded by Floyd Smith; Gordon Freeman, president of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, replaced by Charles H. Pillard; Pres. E. L. Wheatley of the Potters, succeeded by Lester Null; Pres. Joseph Moreschi of the Laborers, replaced by Peter Fosco; B. A. Gritta, president of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept., succeeded by Maywood Boggs.

Three new AFL-CIO vice presidents were elected as members of the federation's Executive Council—Presidents A. F. Grospiron of the OCAW, Matthew Guinan of the Transport Workers, and C. L. Dennis of the Railway & Airline Clerks. The vacancies had been created by the retirement of Ralph Helstein and the deaths of George M. Harrison, former president of the Railway Clerks, and John J. Grogan, who was succeeded as president of the Marine & Shipbuilding Workers by Andrew Pettis.

During the year death came also to Pres. Walter Mitchell of the Chemical Workers, who was succeeded by Thomas E. Boyle, and to Pres.-Emeritus John L. Lewis of the Mine Workers, one of the giants of American labor history.

Court actions—Numerous court decisions affecting organized labor were handed down over the past year. Among the most significant were Supreme Court rulings upholding union certification by card-check, coordinated bargaining, certain union disciplinary rights, and state full crew laws governing railroads. There were also major rulings by the Supreme Court and lower courts in favor of the TWUA in the J. P. Stevens and Darlington battles.

Meany on Labor Day:

Needed—A 'Total National Commitment'

By George Meany

EACH LABOR DAY, America takes time off to honor her working men and women.

On this Labor Day, we in the AFL-CIO have a special sense of profound pride. For we know that, behind the nation's latest pioneering achievement—the landing of man on the moon—is the work of thousands of dedicated and skilled technicians and craftsmen, many of them trade union members.

The astronauts themselves joined in expressing admiration for the unsung men and women who did the assembling, building, welding and wiring of Apollo 11, the manned space center, the Cape Kennedy launching site and the tracking stations around the world. Thousands of pieces of complex and sophisticated equipment were combined into components and units and functioned flawlessly.

Indeed, the entire space program bears the trade union hallmark of craftsmanship and quality. And, in a real sense, each of America's triumphs bears a union label—for the loyal American worker and his unions have contributed to every advance this nation has made. It is a record of which we are proud and it is a record we intend to continue.

The landing of man on the moon is significant for many reasons. It demonstrated the free American spirit of adventure and pioneering, inherent in the quest for solving the unknown.

But, most important, it demonstrated what America can do once a national commitment is made to solve a problem and achieve a goal—once the national purpose is made crystal clear.

It seems to me that it is in this light that the state of the nation must be assessed this Labor Day.

Hundreds of thousands of people living in poverty neighborhoods of the nation's cities still can't get jobs and many have even lost their hope of getting a job. Rural poverty, too, blights the American landscape.

The problem is compounded by a widening employment gap between white and black workers, many of whom live in big city ghettos. Proportionately, twice as many blacks as whites are unemployed. Among teenagers, the black unemployment rate is three times higher than the white rate. And the average annual income for non-whites is only three-fifths of that for whites.

Although this nation has had a Fair Labor Standards Act for over 30 years, thousands of workers—white and non-white—who should be receiving the federal minimum wage are being short-changed by their employers. Last year alone, for example, there were nearly 15,000 known violations of the Child Labor laws in this country.

And too many American corporations run away from American wage scales to build plants and manufacture products in other countries, taking advantage of poverty-stricken workers who will labor for as little as 30 cents an hour and fear to ask for any other condition of employment.

In a sense, it is almost embarrassing to list once again America's pressing domestic problems. Over the years, volumes of studies and legislative testimony have defined and diagrammed them.

In recent years, actions and passions have burst in revolt against them. Reasonable plans and pleas have been made by responsible people to solve them.

Yet the problems prevail.

HOUSING IN AMERICA, for example, is critical. The people of this nation need 26 million more units of standard housing by 1977. Housing construction, though, is at a virtual standstill—stalled by soaring money rates and speculative land costs. In the last ten years, the cost of mortgage money and the market value of land have more than doubled.

In this atmosphere, builders have catered to luxury living and high finance at the expense of slum clearance and ghetto rehabilitation. High-rise luxury apartments and towering new office buildings cast long shadows over old, dilapidated and squalid housing in the ghettos below.

Those who need and are seeking decent moderate-cost housing can't even afford to stand in the home loan line today, so excessive are interest, mortgage and land costs. And rents, too, tax the means of modest-income families.

Thousands of American youth, who want a quality education or advanced education, can't get either. Money—or the lack of it—is a formidable barrier to them. Despite the vast educational system, keyed on free public education, that has been created in the United States, the chances of a poor boy or girl getting a full secondary or college education are infinitely lower than those of a youth from a well-off family. The odds against quality education—elementary, secondary or higher—are overwhelming if a youth is not white.

The cost of a college education is rapidly rising beyond the means of middle-income families.

Teachers are tragically over-worked and pitifully underpaid. In many large school systems, professionalism in the over-crowded classroom is impossible without teacher assistants. However, such aides are the exception rather than the rule.

Presently, only about 8 percent of the nation's total education bill is supported by the federal government. If educational opportunity for all young Americans is to keep pace with the demands of the space age, then the federal commitment to education must be at least doubled in the 1970s.

In the final analysis, jobs, housing and education are primary needs of every human being. Yet, we find them relegated to low priority status by the nation's policy makers and leaders.

Outside the labor movement, only the victims of this relegation and a small but growing band of liberal politicians are actively concerned.

The question is "why?"

I believe some reasons are obvious. In the past, the Congress has been ready with words, but, in the name of fiscal restraint and conservatism, reticent with money. Even the best of programs fails if it is financed with a timid hand.

State governments too often have dodged their responsibilities in the name of states' rights.

And for far too long, local governments, have demanded home rule and ducked local responsibility.

This nation did commit itself to putting men on the moon and it did the job. It can commit itself to enriching and ennobling the lives of its people here on earth. and it must.

The time to do it is now.

Harsh as it may sound, I believe greed and profiteering are to a great degree responsible for America's unresolved domestic problems.

Today, the national interest demands prime emphasis on the values of brotherhood and humanity.

It demands an end to poverty. It demands continued integration and equal opportunity for all in very field of human endeavor. It demands an end to racial strife.

The national interest demands that the national wealth be used in a way which will insure prosperity, security and dignity of the individual.

This means priority must be given to achieving full employment. Priority must be given to achieving wage and income levels that will permit low and moderate income earners to move up in their level of living. Priority must be given to moving the working poor out of poverty.

Simultaneously, priority must be given to education, housing and the other social measures which, heretofore, have been promised but never fully delivered.

The truth is, the national interest cannot long endure the unbridled excesses of self-interest. For that which poses as the incentives of the market place, often turns out to be nothing more than greed and profiteering.

How else can one explain the price-fixing scandals in the drug, electrical and plumbing fixture industries during the past decade?

How else can one explain the callous profiteering schemes of some drugstore owners and some doctors in administering the Medicaid program?

Or some of the flagrant overcharges and cost overruns by defense contractors?

Or in another context, those who oppose open housing invariably argue that if a Negro moves next door, the value of their property will decline. This argument imputes undue value to property and scorns the value of people.

I believe the cases for school integration and equal voting rights are also obstructed by an incessant fear based on selfishness and greed.

Local school board cliques fear the challenge and cost of providing quality education for all children in their district.

Some local politicians and patronage job-holders fear the loss of their influence and jobs should the constituency they must serve be broadened to include previously disfranchised black citizens.

Profiteering and greed motivate minimum wage chiselers, child labor violators, runaway corporations and foreign labor exploiters.

All too often, some people turn their backs on their religious ethics and democratic principles, when their own small sphere of existence is confronted with an opportunity to advance brotherhood and humanity.

Profiteering feeds the present inflationary price spiral, too. Any objective observer of wages, profits and prices during the 1960s has to conclude that most of today's inflated cost of living stems from swollen corporate and conglomerate profits and exorbitant interest rates.

In the past nine years, after-tax corporate profits have increased by 94 percent. Corporate dividends have increased 78 percent.

Since 1950 bank interest rates have rocketed 325 percent. Since last December alone, the prime interest rate — which most Americans don't enjoy — has increased by 31 percent. Needless to say, bank profits are at record highs.

Compare these figures with the nine-year per capita disposable personal income increase of 56 percent. Or the average weekly wage increase of 33 percent over the past nine years—or, in terms of buying power, only 10 percent. In other words, profits have out-stripped wage gains nearly three times.

Clearly, inflation stems from swollen profits. And high interest rates add fuel to the fire because the price of money adds to the cost everything American workers buy.

The tragedy is that even though total pay may continue to rise, the real earnings of American workers will continue to decline unless this cycle is halted. In terms of purchasing power and level of living, the American worker is already entering a recession.

TIGHT MONEY and usurious interest rates are already forcing construction shut downs. Loss of purchasing power is beginning to force plant lay-offs.

Trapped in the middle is the American worker. Prices up or employment down—either way he loses.

The national interest demands an end to unconscionable profiteering and a roll back in interest rates.

Price stability with full employment can be maintained if banks and corporations are willing to settle for something less than their nine-year record of excessive profits.

We in the labor movement believe the national interest demands total commitment to solving American domestic problems of employment and income, housing, education, environment and health. Any new national policy that may be inspired by spectacular success in space, must include a commitment to basic and earthly human values. Behind the commitment, there must be a willingness to back it up with deeds, money and resources.

We believe America can provide for the nation's defense, conduct a reasonable space program and secure the general welfare for all the people.

We believe America can do all three. We believe America must do all three. And the national interest dictates that we begin now without delay.

MacDonald Reports:

Canadian Labor Presses Unity

Excerpts from Labor Day message of Donald MacDonald, president of the Canadian Labor Congress.

LABOR DAY 1969 could well mark the start of a period in which decisions of the utmost importance to organized labor and to industry as a whole will be reached.

There can be no doubt about the importance of collective bargaining in a modern democratic society. This view has been fully supported by the findings of the recent large-scale study of industrial relations made by a government task force. The fact is that here in Canada the free collective bargaining process works. Well over 95 percent of the negotiations between unions and employers are settled without any work stoppage, and constructive negotiations go practically unnoticed.

But, regardless of our relative success, there is need for a readiness to study, and if advisable to adopt, new methods to meet new conditions.

The issues being dealt with in bargaining between employers and employes are continually becoming more complex, and both parties must be prepared to keep pace if they are to properly represent their particular interests and reach a settlement which is for the general good.

Since the Canadian Labor Congress came into being in 1956, 13 of our unions have been party to some form of merger, and discussions are now going on between other organizations. At the same time, in eight instances, groups of unions active in the same industry, or with other forms of common interest, have formalized means for discussion and cooperation. The Canadian Labor Congress is actively encouraging this type of development and we look forward to further consolidation and more efficient cooperation among unions.

The strengthening of trade union organization is essential if any degree of balance is to be maintained between labor and the giant multiplex corporations which are developing throughout the world.

Kirkland on Labor Day:

Union Movement Is Involved in America

By Lane Kirkland

DURING THE LAST ELECTION campaign, the double-jointed slogan "participatory democracy" was played up by newcomers to the game as though they had invented the wheel. The wheel, of course, has been around for some time now, and so have all the elements of "participatory democracy." That concept has been brought to its fullest development, over the years, by the trade union movement.

The American labor movement has always believed that voting is the single most important civic act a citizen in a democracy can perform. Around the right to vote, and the act of voting and "getting out the vote," we have built programs that absorb great amounts of time and effort on a volunteer basis for thousands of union members.

Many Americans are not familiar with the involvement of unions and their members in political education and political action. In the minds of many citizens, unions are associated exclusively with the workplace—factory, store, construction site—where they bargain collectively for better wages and working conditions for their members.

This economic role is, of course, the main function of labor unions in representing their members, and through it unions have helped achieve greater security progress, and opportunity for members and their families. That function has served to build a stronger economy and a better country.

But to think of unions only in this role is a one-sided view of their place in the American framework, and on this Labor Day 1969, it is appropriate to consider the broader services of the American labor movement.

Far beyond their economic role, unions have taken their place in the communities and in the nation as a progressive force devoted to the welfare of all citizens, members and non-members alike. For example:

- No group in the nation does more than unions and their members in support of community charity drives like United Fund and Community Chest.
- When natural disasters strike—floods, hurricanes, tornadoes—unions in the affected communities help house, clothe and feed the victims and contribute time, work and funds to rebuilding damaged homes and community facilities.
- Trade unions helped conceive the war on poverty and play a vital part in its planning and in the conduct of its programs.
- They are active in housing, civil rights, medical care and many other problems, issues and programs of vital concern to the American people.

Trade unions range far past the workplace in their concerns and activities. Their involvement in the total life of the human community is broad and expanding.

This is particularly true in the field of politics.

The labor movement takes citizenship most seriously. We believe the rights and the responsibilities of citizenship are indivisible. The right to vote bears a responsibility to vote, and the right to participate a responsibility to participate.

Working people fought hard for this right to participate. More than 200 years ago, craftsmen in the northeastern cities were among the first to fight for "participatory democracy" when they organized to demand political equality with landed and merchant classes. From these activities, in part, emerged the Sons of Liberty movements in the late 1760s that sparked protests against repressive British measures in the colonies and led to the American revolution and nationhood.

Workers in the new nation fought for the right to vote that was at first denied them, and subsequently it was workers and their unions who demanded and won establishment of a system of free public education for all American children.

So grass-roots democracy is nothing new for American trade unions.

TO THE LABOR MOVEMENT of today, "participatory democracy" means working within the democratic framework to strengthen it and to make it function effectively to meet the needs of all citizens. Though not uncritical of today's institutions, we are confident that they are fundamentally sound and capable of increasing responsiveness to the demands of a nation undergoing wrenching change.

The labor movement believes the nation's institutions can meet the challenges of social, as well as technological, change if citizens participate in the decisions that help direct such change.

We encourage this participation. No single group dedicates more time or effort to engage citizens in the democratic process than the trade union movement. Look at the record:

- Each year, we help register millions of union members and other citizens in a non-partisan national registration campaign.
- Each election year, the labor movement conducts massive get-out-the-vote drives to make sure a maximum number of Americans participate in selecting the men and women who will assume the heavy responsibility of public office.
- All year every year, the trade union movement attempts to educate its members on major political issues and on the records of public officials on the theory that public servants ought to be judged on what they do, not what they promise.
- All year every year, thousands of union members and members of their families contribute time voluntarily to the programs of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education (COPE) in their communities.
- On Election Day 1968, nearly 100,000 union members worked in getting out the vote. Prior to the election, the AFL-CIO's non-partisan registration campaign resulted in adding 4.6 million citizens to the registration rolls.

The AFL-CIO is proud that its political programs strengthen democracy and its institutions. We believe any effort to increase the participation of citizens in the political process must benefit all of society. Particularly now, with the emergence of problems unprecedented in the nation's history, is it essential that all Americans engage in "participatory democracy," not to tear down but to firm up American institutions.

This Labor Day 1969, as all before it have been, is a symbol of mutual faith and confidence between a nation and its working people. The labor movement has this faith and confidence in America, faith in the basic soundness of this nation and its institutions, and confidence in its capacity to confront successfully its many challenges.

We feel we express this faith best by being a part of that process by which decisions are made to meet these challenges—the political process.

To us, this is what "participatory democracy" means —not just a slogan or a fad, but a way of living and working in a free country where all are equal.

Building Trades Say:

Freedom Linked To Faith in Law

Labor Day message of C. J. Haggerty, president of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

WE ARE ALL STILL BASKING in the glow of the incredible accomplishment of putting man on the moon.

One of the lessons of that spectacular voyage is that the American mind and the American political system seem to need great challenges and clear goals to work at their best.

It seems to me, now that we have demonstrated that almost nothing is beyond our ability once we have determined the goal, that there are other great adventures we should undertake.

Certainly it is harder to concentrate the mind on creating a just and decent society than it is to mobilize the intelligence and machinery to reach the moon. Human nature is more volatile and less predictable than the chemicals, fuels and measurable mathematics of rockets and electronics.

But we do have an opportunity to channel the energies and talents of the American people, particularly the people in the trade union movement, toward national purpose and ideal. Labor Day 1969 might make an appropriate launch date.

The young are at war with the Establishment and its conventional wisdom. Well and good. That is their privilege and certainly there is need for some changes. By all means, we should listen. But some individuals' concept of whether they are listened to is simply whether people will yield to any demands they make.

THE FAITH of the trade union movement grows out of community. Our mission is to be a convenant of the people. The unique emphasis of organized labor rests in its strong sense of social cohesion.

We are a faith of law. We have preached freedom under law, rather than freedom from law.

Our perspective tends to prefer reform to revolution. Righteousness exists within a social framework. To say, as some say, that "violence is as American as cherry pie" is utter nonsense. Lynching is American, too. Is that good?

Were it not for traffic lights, our streets would be impassable. Were it not for taxes we would have no schools or playgrounds. Were it not for an army, naked ambition and national greed would always have their way.

Dissent is dramatic and quite often necessary. But the consent of the governed and due process also are necessary. There is no justice under anarchy.

Industrial Union Dept. Says:

Vacuum in Political Leadership Puts Focus on Facts and Issues

Excerpts from a Labor Day statement by I. W. Abel, president of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

A SERIOUS ATTEMPT to be prophetic on this Labor Day would be foolhardy indeed, for in every direction the view is clouded.

Although the national economy as a whole remains healthy on the surface, sustaining high employment and rising incomes, inflation cuts deeper into buying power from week to week. Exorbitant interest rates dash the hopes of home-seekers and slash residential construction. Hard-core unemployment, wages below the subsistence level, pockets of poverty in both city and countryside persist despite general prosperity and remedial programs.

Although sweeping social reforms enacted by Congress and decreed by the courts in recent years seem assured of permanence in law, they remain remote in practice. Their implementation, slow at best, is becoming slower still, threatening to perpetuate injustices no longer endurable to their victims nor tolerable in a free society.

Although there are many promises and some portents of peace in Viet Nam, of a start toward slowing the arms race, of steps toward easing world tensions, the war goes on, new weapons proliferate and new conflicts loom.

Even this fragmentary review demonstrates that uncertainty is the order of the day. It is not only the uncertainty that attends any time of trouble and transition; it also includes almost total uncertainty as to the course that will be taken by the federal government, whose influence is so pervasive in all these matters.

The only thing that's clear is that this is not a favorable time for soothsaying. But this doesn't imply a moratorium on action; quite the contrary.

There is nothing uncertain about the goals of the labor movement. They embrace all the aspirations of free men—the dreams of social idealists since the beginning of time, the pragmatic determination of today's workers to get their share now.

Most of these objectives have been translated into specific legislative programs and specific collective bargaining programs. So even as we admit we can't prophesy what the future is going to be, we can offer very definite ideas on what it ought to be—and we can work hard to make it come out that way.

In a time of uncertainty like the present our obligation is even heavier than usual. For good or ill, there is no dominating political leadership in view. The labor movement cannot look to a President or a senator to personify the cause of progress.

YET THIS MAY TURN OUT to be a blessing, not just for us in the labor movement but for the democratic society we cherish. Many of this country's toughest problems were solved that way.

The Revolution itself wasn't the work of agitators or orators, though there was a good supply of both. The decision to fight for independence rather than for fair colonial status was made calmly by thoughtful and rather conservative men. The Constitution was adopted, some years after victory, as the result of a nationwide campaign based entirely on reasoned discussion. Abraham Lincoln was no rabble-rouser, but he preserved the union.

To leap right into modern times, the Civil Rights Act of 1964 came about because the nation had searched its soul—not because of charisma or confrontations.

So let us now press toward our ultimate aim of a perfect nation and a perfect world, advancing our specific proposals with firmness based upon fact and reason. This era of uncertainty can be one of opportunity if we make it so—and make it so we must and will.

Supreme Court Nominee:

Conflict of Interest Charges Raised Against Haynsworth

relations cases and allowing a foot-dragging approach to school desegregation and civil rights enforcement.

It was the White House which first publicized the issue of Haynsworth's involvement in the Deering Milliken case by releasing excerpts from correspondence that seemed to indicate that Haynsworth had been completely absolved of impropriety and that the Textile Workers had apologized for questioning his impartiality.

TWUA Pres. William Pollock then released the entire file of correspondence of late 1963 and 1964 to correct what he termed "misleading characterizations" of the case by White House Press Sec. Ronald Zeigler.

The correspondence revealed that in December 1963, after the Darlington decision, the TWUA had received a call informing them that Haynsworth was first vice president of the Carolina Vend-A-Matic Co., and that Deering Milliken had cancelled contracts with other vending machine firms and was throwing its business to Haynsworth's firm.

The union's attorney reported the allegation to the chief judge of the 4th Circuit Court of Appeals, asking an investigation and noting that the union had no way of obtaining the full facts in the case.

The investigation disclosed that Carolina Vend-A-Matic had obtained one additional Deering Milliken contract while the case was before the court—doubling its business with the textile chain to about $100,000 a year—through legitimate competitive bidding. It had also failed to obtain two other contracts at other Deering Milliken plants.

Therefore the union concluded that there was no deliberate attempt to reward Haynsworth's firm and the union attorney expressed regret for any trouble caused.

But, Pollock stressed, the episode did not go into the conflict of interest principle as to whether Haynsworth should have disqualified himself because of his close connection with a company doing business with a party to the case.

He said the TWUA did not pursue that aspect at the time because the more serious charge had been proven false. "It was evident that the judges were not pleased with the union; and the union would inevitably be a litigant before those judges for years to come."

Federal law leaves it up to a judge to decide whether to disqualify himself—and Pollock observed that Arthur J. Goldberg, then on the Supreme Court, had disqualified himself when the case came before the high court for review because he had represented the TWUA some years earlier when he was in private practice.

Pollock noted that a New York Times story on Aug. 19 reported that Haynsworth declined to answer when asked by a reporter whether he had owned shares in the Vend-A-Matic firm at the time of the Darlington decision.

"We believe that the country and the United States Senate are entitled to an answer," Pollock said.

A story by William J. Eaton of the Washington bureau of the Chicago Daily News, provided the answer based on a check of Securities & Exchange Commission records.

It showed that the Carolina company, started by Haynsworth and other businessmen in 1950 with an "authorized capital" of $30,000, had been acquired by the Automatic Retailers of America, Inc., in April of 1964, more than six months after the Deering Milliken decision. At that time, records disclosed, Haynsworth received 14,173 shares of ARA stock in exchange for his interest in the Carolina firm.

Haynsworth then sold the stock for about $450,000.

Syndicated columnists Frank Mankiewicz and Tom Braden, commenting on the failure of Haynsworth to disqualify himself in the case and his silence on his business ties during its consideration, termed the judge's action "a clear violation of the canons of ethics" of the American Bar Association.

They quoted Canon 26, which reads: "A judge should abstain from making personal investments in enterprises which are apt to be involved in litigation in the court, and after his accession to the bench, he should not retain such investments previously made longer than a period sufficient to enable him to dispose of them without serious loss."

Haynsworth, they noted, retained his directorship and heavy stock holdings in the vending firm for more than seven years after becoming a judge.

They noted that it was conflict of interest allegations which led to the resignation of Justice Abe Fortas—creating the Supreme Court vacancy for which Haynsworth was nominated.

In a television interview on a network news program, AFL-CIO Associate General Counsel Thomas E. Harris gave this summary of Haynsworth's labor decisions:

"He has sat on five labor cases that went to the Supreme Court. In all five, he voted against the union. All five cases were reversed by the Supreme Court and only one Supreme Court judge in one case voted the way that Judge Haynsworth did in these cases."

Earlier, NAACP Executive Dir. Roy Wilkins charged that Haynsworth "voted for racial segregation" in four cases involving schools.

A statement by I. W. Abel, president of the Steelworkers and of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., called for Senate rejection of the nomination.

"Nomination to the nation's highest court," Abel said, "should be the climax of a distinguished legal career during which the nominee has served justice by protecting and advancing the rights of those seeking justice."

Pres. Paul Jennings of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, termed Haynsworth "a poor choice" whose record is one of opposition to "civil rights progress and the rights of working people."

The Senate Judiciary Committee will hold hearings on the nomination. Mississippi Sen. James O Eastland, chairman of the committee, has already praised the appointment.

MANY UNIONS have responded to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany's call for disister relief aid, Chairman John Kenney of the District of Columbia chapter of the American Red Cross tells Meany, who presented the AFL-CIO's check for $25,000 to the Hurricane Camille Relief Fund. Damage is so severe that the Red Cross boosted its goal from $6 million to $15 million.

Union Volunteers Rally For Storm Relief Task

The greatest need is still for money. AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany turned over a check for $25,000 to the American Red Cross and urged every union and central body to contribute promptly.

The Steelworkers donated another $25,000 at Birmingham from the USWA emergency reserve fund, and state central bodies in all the disaster areas called on their members to give generously for the relief of 70,000 affected families.

"Contributing to local Red Cross chapters is the best way to do the most good in the fastest possible time," Meany said in a call for nationwide labor help.

The need is so great that the Red Cross raised its estimate of relief costs from $6 million to $15 million.

"The whole Gulf waterfront—50 or 60 miles of it—is completely destroyed," said Pres. Claude Ramsay of the Mississippi AFL-CIO. Ramsay toured the disaster area with Walter Holmes, AFL-CIO area liaison officer with the Red Cross, members of the AFL-CIO Community Services staff, and other union representatives.

The first phase of the rescue effort was to gather the survivors, shelter and feed them, get clothing and provide the information needed by families after their rescue. That phase will be followed by rehabilitation after the waters of flooded rivers subside.

The Red Cross is setting up 17 disaster relief centers throughout the hurricane and flood areas, where food and clothing and medical care can be supplied.

The Government Employes, with thousands of members in the hurricane area, set up a Camille disaster committee to channel aid to storm victims.

At the VA psychiatric hospital in Gulfport, 250 members of AFGE Local 2238 were on duty when the hurricane smashed a new $1 million recreation center and poured 12 feet of water through wards holding 750 patients. Workers stayed at their posts around the clock, not knowing whether their own homes were still standing. VA's duty director called their devotion to duty "fantastic."

Louisiana unionists helped load trucks and Bussie led a caravan of 40 trucks from Baton Rouge to Biloxi and Gulfport. Volunteers from many community organizations helped round up and distribute medicine, milk and distilled water to relief shelters in those battered towns. Truck motors were kept running many hours to keep the supplies refrigerated, the Red Cross reported.

The Machinists District in Daleville, Ala., collected more than $4,000 worth of clothing, food and supplies for Biloxi storm refugees.

Fund drives in Mississippi and Alabama were launched by the two state central bodies with donations of $500 each.

The Marine & Shipbuilding Workers in Mobile, Ala., took several truckloads of supplies to the disaster area.

Consumer Prices Jump Sharply, Workers' Real Wages Continue Lag

of production and non-supervisory workers increased to $115.44 in July, up 68 cents from June. This rise was attributed mainly to slight increases in the workweek and hourly earnings.

Weekly take-home pay after deduction of taxes for the worker with three dependents was up 51 cents to $100.62. For the worker with no dependents, the increase was 50 cents to $91.57.

When expressed in 1957-59 dollars to reflect price changes, the take-home pay of the worker with three dependents in July was $78.49. It was $71.43 for the worker with no dependents. Both figures were virtualy unchanged over the month.

However, these real spendable earnings were down over the year by 58 cents for the worker with three dependents and 32 cents for the worker with no dependents. The figures averaged about 1.4 percent below their highs of last September.

On the price front, increases for meat and poultry prices led to a 1 percent rise in food costs in July. Prices of fruits and vetgetables also were higher.

Housing costs rose by seven-tenths of 1 percent, led by an increase in the cost of home mortgages of nine-tenths of 1 percent.

Charges for consumer services averaged five-tenths of 1 percent higher in July. The medical care index jumped a full 1 percent as a result of higher fees by doctors and dentists and daily service charges at hospitals.

Higher retail prices for cigarettes followed earlier increases in wholesale tobacco prices. Furniture and house furnishings rose moderately. The only significant price declines were in the apparel and transportation categories.

BLS reported that commodities were up 4.8 percent over the year and services rose by 6.7 percent since July 1968.

The Wholesale Price Index, an indicator of future consumer price action, stood in July at 113.3 of its 1957-59 average, an increase of only one-tenth of 1 percent from June.

But Chase pointed out that the slight change was due to a drop in the wholesale prices of farm products. More than half of the products in the industrial commodities sector of the index rose over the month, he noted.

Chase foresaw another rise in consumer prices in August but declined to predict how much it might be or to forecast the trend of prices beyond that month.

More than 1 million workers employed in auto manufacturing, auto parts and farm machinery industries will receive an 8-cent an hour pay boost as a result of increases in the CPI over the past three months.

About 60,000 additional workers will receive pay increases ranging from 1 to 18 cents through other reviews of index action. Nearly 20,000 employes will get increases based on indexes for Chicago, Pittsburgh and Boston.

Approximately 17,000 workers covered by escalator provisions subject to the July index will not receive increases because they already have reached maximums allowed in their contracts.

NMU Members Vote Approval Of Dues Boost

New York—Members of the National Maritime Union voted, 8,681 to 3,056 in a secret ballot referendum to raise their union dues. The lowest raise is $1 a month, the highest $3.33.

Effective Oct. 1, dues for seamen on privately-owned ocean-going vessels will rise from $120 a year to $160, for those on privately-owned Great Lakes and rivers ships from $120 to $140 a year, for seamen on Military Sea Transportation Service ships from $100 to $120, for other government vessels services from $80 to $100, for domestic shoreside members from $5 a month to $6, for members employed in the Panama Canal Zone from $3 a month to $4.

Voting was conducted in 32 union locations in this country and overseas between July 21 and Aug. 4. The voting and counting were supervised by the Honest Ballot Association.

Haynsworth Held 'Not Fit' For Supreme Court Post

ON EVE OF LABOR DAY, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany met with a group of veteran labor reporters for a candid interview on the state of the labor movement and the nation. From the bottom, clockwise, are Damon Stetson, New York Times; Stanley Levey, Scripps-Howard newspapers; Archie Robinson, U.S. News & World Report; Meany; Neil Gilbride, Associated Press, and Dick Levine, Wall Street Journal. (Excerpts of interview on Page 6.)

Meany Cites Violation of Ethics Code

Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., "is not fit to sit on the United States Supreme Court," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany charged.

Meany said in a network television interview that the South Carolina judge should be rejected by the Senate because he failed to live up to the code of ethics expected of jurists when he kept silent about a conflict of interest and took part in a decision in a major labor case.

Haynsworth in 1963 cast the deciding vote in a 4th Circuit Court of Appeals decision upholding the right of the Deering Milliken textile chain to close its Darlington, S.C., mill to punish workers for voting for union representation.

At the time, Haynsworth was deeply involved in a vending machine company that had a contract with Deering Milliken mills and was seeking additional business. He had been a founder of the firm, its vice president, and was a major stockholder, Meany noted.

"When the case came before him," Meany said, Haynsworth "didn't take himself out of the case. He didn't inform the litigants of his interest . . . despite the canon of ethics of the American Bar Association . . . and I say he was unethical to sit on a case where his own financial interests were involved in one of the litigants."

A unanimous Supreme Court later overruled the appellate court and said a company could not close down one of its plants if the intent were to discourage unionization of its other plants.

The AFL-CIO president was questioned about labor's opposition

Labor Asks Action On Nation's Ills

Leaders of the American labor movement expressed confidence on Labor Day in the nation's ability to overcome its problems, but called for a greater sense of urgency by Congress and the White House to do so.

A series of network radio broadcasts by AFL-CIO officers on the holiday stressed organized labor's goal of making the nation's economy work for the benefit of all, not just a few.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany spoke over the National Broadcasting Co. network. Other networks carried addresses by Federation Vice Presidents I. W. Abel, Joseph A. Beirne and John H. Lyons.

"The hard fact," Meany said, "is that not all Americans share in the wealth and goodness of America."

There was recognition of that in the early 1960s, Meany noted. "Racial discrimination, poverty and barriers to education were put under the focus of the national spotlight. Price-fixing and profiteering, consumer deception . . . were exposed."

But the momentum slackened, he observed. "Congress failed to measure up to the need" and the result was "half-hearted, underfinanced" programs.

Meany warned of "danger signs in the economy," threatening a recession. He cited swollen profits unmatched by increases in worker purchasing power, soaring interest rates, "creeping unemployment" and "housing construction at a virtual standstill."

He stressed also the "dangers which threaten all people"—rich and poor, city and country dweller, worker and employer.

These dangers, "perhaps the least excusable of all," were identified by Meany as the increasing pollution of air and water, along with an ever-mounting toll of "agony, pain, death and grief" from highway accidents.

The common point of all of the problems that face the nation, Meany said, is that "they are man-made and they must be solved by man. They can no longer be ignored or given only half-hearted attention."

Abel, who heads the Industrial Union Dept. and is president of the Steelworkers, spoke on the Columbia Broadcasting System on the issues of inflation and taxes.

Declaring that inflation is the result of "bloated profits and un-

Pilots Support Global Strike On Hijacking

The Air Line Pilots are prepared to join with commercial pilots from throughout the free world in a 24-hour protest strike if Syria continues to hold as prisoners two Israeli passengers on a Trans World Airline plane hijacked by Arab commandos.

The governing board of the international pilots organization, with which the ALPA is affiliated, met in emergency session to demand international action to halt hijacking and secure the prompt release of all passengers.

ALPA Pres. Charles H. Ruby said the pilots' group has asked for a meeting with U Thant, secretary general of the United Nations, to discuss the "growing menace" of air hijacking.

"Piracy on the high seas . . . took many years and numerous lives before nations got together to

Boon To Corporations:

Administration Hit On Tax Proposal

The AFL-CIO charged that the Nixon Administration "has rejected the concept of tax justice" by urging the Senate to give a bigger tax break to business corporations and less tax relief to wage-earners.

Federation Pres. George Meany termed testimony by Treasury Sec. David M. Kennedy "a shocking display of concern for America's wealthy and powerful at the expense of all the rest."

Kennedy went before the Senate Finance Committee to complain that the House passed tax reform bill was "inflationary" because it would put too much money in the hands of consumers.

He asked the Senate to cut $2.5 billion from the amount of tax relief the House bill would provide for individuals and families—mostly in the low and middle income brackets.

At the same time, the Treasury chief complained that the House bill was too harsh on corporations and would discourage business investment. He asked that corporation taxes be trimmed nearly $1.6 billion below the amount provided in the House bill.

The Administration also asked the Senate to knock out some of the House bill's efforts to close capital gains loopholes and impose taxes on interest from state and local bonds.

Kennedy called for a continuation of present tax situations which he conceded would still permit some million-dollar-a-year incomes to escape all taxation.

"The AFL-CIO is completely opposed to the Administration proposal," Meany declared.

"America wants and needs tax justice," he said. But "the Administration proposal bears no resemblance to tax justice."

In contrast to the House bill, Meany noted, the Administration proposal "reduces tax relief for those just above the threshold of poverty, cuts needed tax relief for middle-income Americans, and weakens loophole-closing sections."

The Treasury Dept.'s own comparisons pointed up the contrast.

Clothing Union Contract Boosts Wages 45 Cents

New York—The Clothing Workers have negotiated a 45-cent hourly wage increase for 100,000 members in the men's shirt and cotton garment industry in a new three-year contract.

An additional 2.5 cents a hour will be earmarked to alleviate inequities in certain categories of employment.

Substantial increases in health, welfare and pension benefits are also included in the contract, said ACWA Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky and Robert M. Dale, vice president of Cluett Peabody Co. Potofsky and Dale headed the negotiating teams.

The union's executive board had authorized a strike for Sept. 1, expiration date of the old con-

Governors Ask Federal Programs For Health Insurance, Welfare Cost

Colorado Springs—The National Governors Conference has called on the federal government to establish a national system of compulsory health insurance and to take over completely all the costs of the federal-state public welfare system.

The governors, at their annual meeting here, voted with only minor opposition to approve the health insurance and welfare proposals submitted by New York Gov. Nelson Rockefeller (R), who heads the conference's Human Resources Committee.

The proposals were set forth in broad terms with few details. Under the health insurance plan, the insurance would be bought from private companies and financed by payroll deductions from both workers and employers. The federal government would buy the insurance for families below the poverty level, and the Medicaid program would be retained to cover only catastrophic illnesses.

Rockefeller has proposed a similar program for New York state, but only to cover hospitalization costs.

The AFL-CIO, at its 1967 convention, reaffirmed its "long-standing support for national compulsory health insurance" based on the principles of "universal coverage, comprehensive benefits, adequate financing, assurance of high quality health services with adequate cost controls."

The plan envisioned by labor, however, would involve a government system instead of relying on the private insurance industry, and a greater federal role in financing.

Two Republican governors—Stanley K. Hathaway of Wyoming and Ronald Reagan of California—argued vigorously against the health insurance proposal and fought unsuccessfully for an amendment calling for a voluntary system.

"WE ARE BETTER PREPARED to overcome the obstacles which impede progress in our nation." Adolfo Anez of Bolivia said in Washington at graduation ceremonies for the 27th class of the American Institute for Free Labor Development's training program. Anez spoke for the trade unionist graduates from 16 Latin American countries.

AIFLD's Role Stressed:

Latin Unions Hailed On Economic Gains

The Organization of American States is committed to aiding free unions so that they can "play a constructive and positive role" in the development of their countries, OAS Sec.-Gen. Galo Plaza declared.

Plaza, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Pres. Joseph A. Beirne of the Communications Workers were the main speakers at graduation exercises for the 27th training program of the American Institute for Free Labor Development.

The graduates — coincidentally numbering 27—came from Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Ecuador, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama, Peru, Uruguay and Venezuela.

In eight years, the AIFLD program has now trained more than 700 labor leaders from Latin America at its school in Front Royal, Va. They, in turn, become instructors in their own countries.

"Unions which perform their basic function of seeking a fair share of the benefits of economic progress for their members . . . serve not only their members' interest but the national interest as well," Plaza told the graduates.

This is so, he pointed out, because greater parity of income in a nation spurs a "need for greater productivity," more adequate markets and more efficient business operations.

Unions also can assist in a nation's development, Plaza said, by aiding the expansion of health and social security programs; organizing cooperatives, workers' banks and housing projects; and helping rural migrants adjust to city life.

Meany, who presented diplomas to the graduates, termed it "significant" that the graduating class was engaged in a program of study of cooperative and community development.

Such a curriculum, he noted, "brings out the fact" that while unions have a specific purpose of improving wages and working conditions "they must also contribute to the building of a viable free society . . . for the benefit of all citizens."

Meany expressed the hope that "detractors" of AIFLD in the United States and other countries would have the opportunity to read the speech delivered by Plaza.

Plaza's remarks, Meany said, ought to convince some, at least, that unions have a responsibility to help strengthen their nations in the realization that "the interest of their own members is bound up with the interest of all the people in the society in which they are a part."

"You have gained some experience here," Meany said. "It is up to you to use your knowledge. It is up to you to build unions that can stand on their own feet, unions that can make the necessary contributions."

He called upon the graduates to help in the development of "mass purchasing power" among workers. "That can be developed in your country but it cannot be developed from outside your country," he cautioned.

Beirne spoke at a post-graduation luncheon, presided over by AIFLD Exec. Dir. William C. Doherty, Jr.

The CWA president voiced confidence that the graduates would return to their countries as "sensitive, informed trade union leaders . . . who will reach out their hands to lead their people to a better life."

Dignitaries attending the graduation exercises included Guillermo Sevilla-Sacasa, ambassador to the United States from Nicaragua; Joseph J. Jova, U.S. ambassador to the OAS; Rutherford B. Poats, deputy administrator of the Agency for International Development; and Pres. Paul Jennings of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers.

Illinois Labor Scores Racial Bias, Poverty

Chicago—A strong attack on racial discrimination in employment and a 10-point program for combatting poverty were highlights of the 12th annual convention of the Illinois AFL-CIO here.

The 2,400 delegates approved a special executive board statement and a resolution urging member unions to act immediately to find new ways of increasing job opportunities for members of racial minorities.

The action of the convention followed weeks of demonstrations at Chicago construction sites, the invasion of the Chicago Building & Construction Trades Council's office, and meetings of black groups, unions and management in the construction industry seeking to resolve the dispute.

The statement approved by the convention said: "We urge all of our affiliates to give stronger heed to the times and to the protests of blacks and of youth, and to give their best efforts in support of training programs which will open up job opportunities to all persons regardless of race, color, creed or sex. We will not yield to threats or violence."

The statement drew the endorsement of the Rev. Jesse Jackson, head of Operation Breadbasket, the economic arm of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, and David R. Reed, a leader of the Coalition for Community Action, which had been demonstrating at building sites here.

But it failed to satisfy some blacks at the convention who attempted to take over the podium and disrupt the convention, which adjourned 15 minutes before its scheduled closing.

Leadership of the coalition later publicly deplored the disruption.

The anti-poverty resolution adopted by the delegates called for:

- Support of the drive to end hunger and poverty.
- Increased state funds to improve welfare allowances and for free school lunches.
- Proper administration of food programs for the poor.
- A new state program to recruit, train and upgrade dis-advantaged persons.
- Efforts to seek out and remedy the causes of unwholesome lives in American society.
- Creation of more jobs.
- Elimination of all traces of discrimination within unions.

In other actions, the convention called for school textbooks that reflect the multi-racial character of the nation, the teaching of labor history in the public schools, protection of privileges of newsmen, and support of the AFL-CIO legislative program.

Other resolutions urged elimination of the state sales tax, a ban on imports that cost the jobs of American workers, and fulfillment of the Chicago Board of Education's contract with the Teachers' union, which has threatened to strike if the board fails to follow through with scheduled pay increases.

Speakers at the convention included Gov. Richard B. Ogilvie (R), Sec. Joseph D. Keenan of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Rep. Roman C. Pucinski (D-Ill.) and the Rev. Ralph D. Abernathy, head of the SCLC.

Lew Rhodes Ends 40-Year Union Career

Lew Rhodes, director of organizing for the Carpenters for the past 12 years, has retired after more than four decades of union service.

In 1929, while a member of Carpenters Local 50, Knoxville, Tenn., he was called upon to assist an AFL textile organizing drive in the Carolinas. In 1938, he was named a fulltime AFL organizer and he served in this capacity for 18 years, with time out for war service. All the while, he was editing and publishing a union paper at Jacksonville, Fla., and flying his own airplane in travels about the South.

Rhodes became the AFL's southern organizing director in 1948, after having served as assistant director.

In 1956 he joined the Carpenters' staff and shortly afterward was tapped as national director of organization by Carpenters' Pres. M. A. Hutcheson.

Anthony O'Chocki has been named to succeed Rhodes as the union's organizing director.

tract. But the new pact went into effect that day with 20 cents of the 45-cent package being added to workers' paychecks.

Additional increments of 12.5 cents each will be added next Aug. 31 and Aug. 30, 1971. The increases will total about $18 a week, plus other gains in pensions, welfare and hospitalization.

"This is the largest wage package the union has ever obtained," Potofsky and Dale noted. "The increase is in recognition of inflation on working men and women in these days of rising prices," they added.

A ratification vote is under way among the 100,000 ACWA members affected by the contract.

Negotiations for the settlement had been advanced through the aid of two special mediators—William E. Simkin, formerly director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, and John A. Bello, a commissioner of the service—who were appointed by J. Curtis Counts, the current director.

The Clothing Workers had rejected an earlier management offer of 37.5 cents an hour over a three-year period.

George Ives Named To Mediation Board

Pres. Nixon has nominated George S. Ives, a Washington, D.C. attorney, to be a member of the National Mediation Board, succeeding Howard G. Gamser who has resigned.

The three-member board administers the Railway Labor Act, which regulates the labor relations of railroad and airline unions.

Ohio AFL-CIO Raps Legislature For 'Socking' Consumers on Taxes

Columbus—The Ohio AFL-CIO has denounced the state legislature for "socking the people with additional unfair consumer taxes" while sidestepping the vital need for tax reform.

The recently adjourned session of the legislature was further criticized for failing to act on added protection for workers against wage garnishment, increased jobless benefits, consumer bills and air and water pollution controls.

On the plus side, labor noted that legislation was passed to make miners who suffer the dreaded "black lung" disease compensable under workmen's compensation.

The State AFL-CIO also observed that lawmakers heeded its call for appropriations for day care centers to enable welfare mothers to go to work and ordered a probe of doctors' abuses of Medicaid.

In other action, the legislature granted state employes a 25-cent an hour wage increase, but failed to act on a measure to give public employe unions recognition and bargaining rights.

Most of the 30-week session centered on the need for additional revenue to meet increased costs of government programs and services, particularly educational needs.

There was some talk of tax reform to require more taxes from corporations and individuals with high incomes. Several bills to do this were introduced but died in committee.

Instead, the legislature passed new consumer taxes—on cigarettes, liquor, and utility use—along with a 1 mill hike in the corporate franchise tax. These came on top of increases in consumer taxes enacted in 1967.

The AFL-CIO said the new taxes "are not quite as steep as the 1967 tax bite, but nevertheless are just as painful." It calculated that "the average Ohio union family will be forced to pay an extra $38 per year in new taxes."

The federation charged the legislature "did not have the courage or initiative to act on a major tax reform bill" that would bring in needed revenue while correcting a "repressive" tax structure.

Labor wasn't alone in assailing the final tax legislation. The Toledo Blade called it a "masterpiece of oversimplification." The Akron Beacon Journal termed it a "monstrous outrage." The Dayton Daily News said "school kids are being cheated" by it.

The legislature's failure to increase unemployment benefits to half the average weekly wage of covered workers in the state "was both cruel and shameful," the state AFL-CIO said.

It pointed out that the average weekly jobless benefit paid to a family of four in Ohio is $55.63, "barely above the welfare benefits paid the same size families under the state's Poor Relief and Aid to Dependent Children's Programs."

Employer Contributions Drop

The statement declared that employers in the state "can well afford" to pay more money into the unemployment benefits fund. In 1939, they paid a tax of 2.7 percent of total payrolls; now the contribution rate is less than one-half of 1 percent.

Leaders of the 2-to-1 Republican-controlled legislature "shunned our appeal for the bill's passage even though we emphasized that it was the standard called for by Pres. Nixon," the state labor body said.

"What happened in Ohio," it added, "clearly proves that Congress must set federal standards for unemployment benefits because state legislatures cannot be relied upon to do so."

In South Carolina Strike:

IBEW Pickets Defy Union-Busting Bid

Myrtle Beach, S.C.—Mass arrests of workers at the strike-bound Aerovox Corp. plant here have failed to blunt the determination of the strikers to win a first contract from a law-defying management.

For more than two years, the corporation has refused to bargain in the face of the wishes of the employes, decisions of the National Labor Relations Board and the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

At the first hint of organizing activity by the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers in November 1966, management of the electronic parts plant launched a campaign based on threats, promises, intimidation and coercion, according to two examiner's findings and NLRB rulings upheld by the courts.

IBEW Local 382 got signed membership cards and won its first election at Aerovox, 40-26, in a company maintenance unit in 1967. Management refused to bargain, claiming the unit was "inappropriate," but was overruled by a trial examiner, the labor board and the Court of Appeals. Aerovox still refused to bargain.

The same local filed an election petition for production employes at the same plant, and won in 1967 by a vote of 307 to 294, with 66 votes challenged. Management refused to bargain, saying union leaflets had an adverse effect on the voters. An examiner, the NLRB and the 4th Circuit threw out the charge last April.

Aerovox sat down at the bargaining table for the first time but has continued since May to resist all employe attempts to win acceptable contracts.

When production and maintenance workers realized that the company had no intention of bargaining in good faith, they walked out of the plant at 11:30 p.m. Aug. 24.

The following day a local court issued a limited-picketing injunction drawn up by company lawyers a month before the strike began.

State highway patrolmen started arresting the pickets almost at once. They were withdrawn after an over-eager patrolman arrested the IBEW union business manager riding past the plant.

Gov. Robert E. McNair (D) ordered the sheriff to take over, and when he did not, county police arrived. Since then they have harassed the strikers, cursed pickets, thrown cigarettes at them and othrwise demonstrated their partiality, the union said.

About 150 of the 1,000 workers are Negroes and the union reports that white and black cooperation has been excellent.

A few days after the walkout began, plant management hired some Negroes as strikebreakers. They stayed one day, then walked out to join the union picket line.

The organizing drive started three years ago when maintenance workers tried to get their low wages increased. Management refused and the workers then asked the IBEW to provide them with membership application cards.

After the first election, the union filed refusal to bargain charges June 6, 1967, and an NLRB complaint was issued by the general counsel more than eight months later when negotiations bogged down. Those charges have been upheld all the way to the appeals court.

Further charges were filed by the union in March, April, May, June and August of 1967, and trial examiner's hearings were held in May, August and October of that year.

The examiner's findings of illegal company practices were upheld by the NLRB in July 1968, when the board ordered management to reinstate eight production employes discharged for union activities. The decision was appealed to the 4th Circuit Court in Richmond, Va., where it still is pending.

Meanwhile the strikers are still picketing while they await final court rulings on their right to engage in union activity free of company harassment. Local 382 has told their story in local TV broadcasts recounting the hostility of management and county police.

Washington AFL-CIO Presses Jobless Pay Bill

Tumwater, Wash.—A program designed to break a deadlock in the Washington legislature over the problem of modernizing unemployment compensation benefits was adopted by the 12th annual Washington State AFL-CIO convention.

The program, submitted by the federation's executive board and unanimously approved by the delegates, calls for a separation by the legislature of the economic measures involved in UC from the substantive philosophical differences between labor and management.

The more than 500 delegates called upon the legislature to adopt the week's work concept of eligibility, realistic provisions governing benefits to pregnant women and retirees, a weekly benefit designed to replace at least 50 percent of the unemployed worker's lost wage and other changes.

In effect, labor's unemployment compensation program asks the legislature to pass any or all of these provisions in one or separate legislative bills and to set aside the arguments over length of disqualification, seasonality clauses and funding the program through a charge-back or benefit-ratio concept favored by industry.

The legislature met for 120 days earlier this year but failed to make any changes in the unemployment compensation law. A second special session is due to convene in January 1970.

In another action, the convention called upon labor organizations to campaign in the January special session for more reforms in a tax package slated to go before state voters in next year's elections.

The package, while proposing to reduce the sales tax, carries with it a flat rate income tax.

A resolution endorsing U.S. Sen. Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.) for re-election in 1970 was passed enthusiastically by the labor delegates.

Joe Davis, president of the Washington AFL-CIO, presided over the four-day convention. Delegates approved a $175 per month pay increase for both Davis and Sec.-Treas. Marvin L. Williams, as recommended by the federation's executive board. Richland was selected as the site for the 1970 convention.

Labor Asks New Stress On Solving Nation's Ills

justified price increases," not workers wages, Abel cited increases of 94 percent in corporate net profits and 78 percent in stock dividends over nine years compared to a 10 percent rise in the buying power of the worker's wage.

On the tax issue, Abel called on his listeners to urge their senators to improve the tax reform features of the recently-passed House tax bill an to "stand fast against efforts to weaken it."

"We must increase the pressures for tax reform that have been building this year, because we can win a great victory on tax reform if we maintain the pressures," he concluded.

Beirne, who is president of the Communications Workers, told his Mutual Broadcasting System audience that on this Labor Day "hard cold facts keep troubling us, like pebbles in a hiker's shoe."

He stressed that millions of the nation's workers are still denied the lawful right of collective bargaining, thousands of families have no work and millions of black people, Mexican-Americans and Indians "do not share our well being."

Labor believes that America's accomplishments outrun its deficiencies, Beirne said, but "we must get on with the job of making this country a better place for every citizen."

There is only one organization "whose vast resources, manpower and money are used in the interests of all the American people —and that organization is the labor movement," Beirne said.

Lyons, president of the Iron Workers, denounced the price-fixing schemes of big banks that are pushing up ever-higher interest rates and threatening to send the nation "into a financial tailspin."

The soaring costs of money are passed on from the manufacturer to the consumer, delay business expansion, stifle badly needing housing and result in workers losing jobs, he declared.

At a time when the nation needs 26 million more housing units, Lyons noted, construction is stagnated because of money lenders maintaining exorbitant profits.

Lyons predicted that demands for Congress "to probe and probe deeply into the nation's monetary mechanism and policies" will grow because "the American people are as tired of this situation as they are tired of tax injustice."

"Certainly, America cannot afford a situation where bankers profit excessively, while millions go without homes and unemployment increases."

Trailways Bus Strike Settled By Two Unions

Ticket agents and other terminal employes of Continental Safeway Trails, Inc., voted by a 2-1 margin to accept new contract terms and return to work after a two-month strike.

The vote, by members of Transit Union Local 1112, means a complete resumption of service on New York-Philadelphia-Washington, D.C. runs of Trailways. A few days earlier, drivers represented by United Transportation Union Local 1023 voted 213-58 to accept a company offer after a previous tie vote.

The drivers, who had been on strike for five months, won an improved mileage rate and other benefits. Ticket agents, baggage handlers, porters and garage employes voted to accept other improvements, their union said.

Final settlement of the long dispute was achieved with the aid of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

Still awaiting action by the Interstate Commerce Commission is a charge by the Federal Highway Administration of "flagrant" and repeated safety violations by Continental Safeway Trails.

The FHA asked the ICC to suspend Trailways' certificate to operate buses on New York-Washington runs on the ground that it has since 1965 committed at least 1,700 safety violations by allowing drivers to remain on duty for long periods in such a way as to involve "great danger" to the public.

Montana Convention Hails Election Gains

Helena, Mont.—The state AFL-CIO credited members of Montana's 11 central labor bodies with helping keep the state in the pro-labor, pro-consumer column and pointed to the 1970 elections to finish the job in the state House of Representatives, still dominated by corporate interests.

Pres. Joe Crosswhite, stepping down after 15 years in office, and Executive Sec. James W. Murry reported that, for the first time in 30 years, COPE-endorsed candidates hold both U.S. Senate seats, both U.S. House seats, the governorship, and a five-seat majority in the Montana Senate.

Some 142 delegates from 250 local unions with more than 30,000 members attended the 13th convention here in the state capital. They raised the monthly per capita rate from 17 cents per member to 20 cents, effective at once, and elected two new officers and three new board members.

Chosen for two-year terms were Pres. Vincent Bosh, of Great Falls, a member of the Operating Engineers; Vice Pres. Robert Kokoruda of Helena, from the Carpenters, and Murry of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers for his first elected term as executive secretary.

New board members are George Hammond of Missoula and Mitchell Mihailovich, Butte. Four members were re-elected. All will be installed at a meeting late this month.

Murry said state labor cooperated last year in "one of the most effective political efforts" in the nation to help elect six of 10 candidates for state and congressional office and to pick up seven seats in the state House, including one COPE-endorsed Republican.

In spite of roadblocks erected by the Republican House majority the 1969 legislature session saw improvements in the industrial accident and unemployment compensation programs, Murry reported. A new basic industrial safety code was enacted and the prevailing wage structure on public works projects was improved.

Murry and outgoing Vice Pres. John Miller, Jr., spent almost full time in the successful campaign to elect Democrat John Melcher in the special congressional election in eastern Montana, they reported.

Crosswhite urged the convention to restore funds needed for legislative research. He had been president for six years.

The convention urged all delegates to subscribe to the AFL-CIO News; to affiliate for all their members, and to stage concentrated organizing drives in target areas.

It voted support for strikes by the AFL-CIO Farm Workers in California, the Hotel & Restaurant Employes in Miles City, and the Pulp, Sulphite & Paper Mill Workers at Missoula. The Missoula strike was settled a few days later.

As School Bells Ring

ONE WEEK AFTER LABOR DAY, millions of young Americans, hearing the rings of the school bells, are back in their classes. Perhaps it is time to designate a national School Day holiday to mark the service and importance of those who study, the same as we mark the contributions, with our established holiday, of those who work.

The sad fact is that for large numbers of young Americans, study—the effort to learn—has fallen into disrepute. We live in a time when respect for book and teacher has been undermined. The world is no longer to be conquered by intelligence, skill, experience and mutual respect. It is rather to be overcome or endured through denial by pot-induced illusions and the hypnotic effect of rock.

But youth is only a chronological fact. It does not cancel out economic and social distinctions among young people. The vast majority of this nation's young people are still concerned with meaningful learning. In thousands of communities throughout this land, the cry is for better education—not for rejecting education and study through either dilution of course subject matter or total dropout from studying.

This is especially true of teenagers in the minority groups of our metropolitan cities who cannot afford the cost of cars, jaunts to the country or high-powered sound systems.

THE CHANGING NATURE of work in our time has also thrown some kinds of work—just as with study—into disrepute. High school curricula, too often, are chiefly concerned with the college-bound student. Blue-collar jobs are denigrated as if they were of a lower order.

It is estimated at least 25 million people could benefit from vocational education. Yet, in the fall of 1967, only 8 million were enrolled in vocational schools. And of these, only 4 million were in the high schools. This means that 17 million who should have been trained and could have been trained were passed up.

The U.S. Office of Education reports that for every 10 pupils in the fifth grade during the 1959-60 school year, 7.2 graduated from high school in 1967. Four of those graduates entered college in the fall and of these, two are likely to graduate in 1971. Out of this total national picture—without adjustment for an even higher rate among minority groups—3.2 high school graduates went directly to work or were unemployed.

Out of the total 10—on a national scale—only 1.2 entered an occupation for which they had been vocationally trained. The rest went to work without any vocational training.

Study can accomplish what neither violence, nor withdrawal, nor division nor mystic experiences can accomplish. The means for study must not be denied either through segregation, false economy or phony subject matter.

Studying is working—for the improvement of oneself and one's community. Those who can afford it can avoid both work and study. But millions of young Americans picking up their books again share the conviction that life is enriched by both.

A Word Edgewise:

Fulbright's Liberal Facade Slips to Bare McCarthyism

By John P. Roche

A LOT OF WEIRD THINGS go on in American politics, but surely one of the strangest has been the liberal canonization of Sen. J. William Fulbright. It is a classic example of what happens to liberal judgment when one issue (here the war in Viet Nam) is allowed to overpower all others. It is not a new phenomenon. Some of us recall a similar episode back in the days before Pearl Harbor when the late Socialist leader Norman Thomas was appearing on America First platforms to oppose American intervention in World War II. Then and now, the gospel has seemed to be "to him who opposes war, all else shall be forgiven."

A cold appraisal of Fulbright's record in the Senate indicates that he is giving the people of Arkansas what they want. Indeed, with the exception of foreign policy, his voting behavior is remarkably similar to that of John McClellan, who is generally considered a reactionary baron.

A look at the 1968 election figures in Arkansas suggests that Fulbright's re-election was guaranteed by the Wallace voters, two-thirds of whom voted for him against his GOP opponent, Charles Bernard. Some have even argued that Fulbright's contempt for our efforts in Southeast Asia is a simple extrapolation of his attitude towards American Negroes: we have no obligations to inferior races.

Let me make it clear that I do not consider support for the war in Viet Nam a litmus-test of liberalism. When Fulbright supported the Tonkin Gulf Resolution, I still considered him a reactionary Southern Democrat. And in the last election I strongly supported a number of liberals—among them, three senators, George McGovern, Alan Cranston, Harold Hughes, for examples—who disagree with my interpretation of events in Asia.

The war in Viet Nam is a tragic, complex affair about which I hold strong, principled views. It is possible that I am wrong, but whatever history may determine about the war, liberals today must not permit it to become a touchstone of orthodoxy.

There can be no excuse, for instance, for the absence of liberal protest over Fulbright's recent assault on George Meany of the AFL-CIO. If any other issue but the war had been involved, the protest against Fulbright's statements and insinuations would have been earsplitting.

The chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee had charged flatly that Meany had been "paid off" by Pres. Johnson, and furthermore that a $28 million grant by the Agency for International Development to an AFL-CIO-sponsored organization in Latin America had bought labor support for the war in Viet Nam.

Let us suppose for a minute that Fulbright had charged that a federal grant to a labor-sponsored organization in the field of equal opportunity was a device for obtaining AFL-CIO endorsement of the civil rights act. Or that his Arkansas colleague, Sen. McClellan, had accused the Ford Foundation of subsidizing subversion by providing money for Negro advocates of community power in Brooklyn. I could write the Americans for Democratic Action press releases in my sleep. The key word would be "McCarthyism." But one suspects that if Joe McCarthy were alive and anti-war, even he might be granted liberal absolution.

IN ANY EVENT, George Meany asked to set the record straight and was granted a hearing by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. It was a wild session, utterly dominated by Fulbright on the committee side.

No one has to feel sorry for Meany; he can take care of himself in rougher company than he met that day. But the appalling aspect was that not only did Fulbright reiterate his original attack; he also suggested the AFL-CIO was racist, was tied in with the CIA, but was probably not responsible for the recent murder of Tom Mboya in Kenya.

Some 15 years ago, when I was running for local office against a Joe McCarthyite, my opponent issued a statement stating that I was probably not a Soviet agent. I couldn't very well hit him so I announced he was probably not an adulterer. Meany was more polite, but Fulbright's behavior deserves the condemnation of all those who value fair play—whatever their convictions may be on the issue at stake.

Frustrations Aid Separatists:

Banks' Obligation to Negroes Termed Jobs, Not Reparations

The following is excerpted from remarks by Andrew F. Brimmer, first Negro member of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, to the annual convention of Phi Epsilon Pi fraternity.

SIGNIFICANT STRIDES have been made in recent years in the formal educational achievements of Negroes. This is especially true at the college level, and the outlook is for an acceleration in college enrollment.

However, because of the substantial educational and cultural deficit which most of the black students bring to the campus (a deficit reflecting the legacy of segregation and discrimination which their families have had to bear), the task of preparing them for professional roles in a competitive, post-college world is also enormous.

Unfortunately, this task is being complicated and made more difficult by an increasing emphasis on "black studies" and similar programs. In my opinion, such programs (perhaps unconsciously) serve mainly to cultivate a cult of incompetence—rather than to build rigorous intellects or to develop expertise in a discipline. Hopefully, the vast majority of Negro students—as well as their college faculties—will recognize the limitations of such digressions and get on with the real challenge of making education a meaningful vehicle for the economic advancement of our Negro citizens.

In the case of the business community, several points are also clear.

Increasingly, the business leadership of this country is placing its weight and employing its energies to help ease the plight of our urban areas and to improve the economic conditions of minority groups.

Sadly, however, some of this same business leadership (also perhaps unconsciously) is helping to strengthen the forces of racial division and separatism which can only frustrate and delay the Negro's full participation in an open and integrated economy.

I am particularly distressed by the acceptance on the part of some of our most prominent business leaders of the essential arguments advanced by the advocates of separatism. I personally find it difficult to believe that men at the forefront of industry and finance can doubt that an open and integrated economy offers the only sure path to genuine progress by minority groups in the United States.

Yet, the approaches which some of our leading corporations and financial institutions are adopting in an effort to cope with the urban crisis as it confronts them go a long way toward accommodating the racial separatists and thus further deepen the racial divisions which plague us.

Personally, I think we have reached a point where the business community must be asked to pause and ponder the long-run implications of some of the responses being made under the immediate stimulation of pressures exerted by small—but vocal—bands of black segregationists. Personally, I am glad to see that, in the field of banking—which is of special interest to me—the key leadership in the industry has recently erased what appeared to have been the acceptance of a patently unreasonable demand advanced by one group committed to a policy of separatism.

The banking industry finally rejected the demand that $6 billion of assets be transferred to the 20-odd black-owned banks as "recoupment" of outstanding claims against the white community to compensate in part for the damages which racial discrimination has inflicted on Negroes over the years.

This episode, which grew out of a conference on urban affairs sponsored by the banking industry in the late spring of this year, illustrates all too well the dangers to orderly progress inherent in attempts to compromise with the advocates of racial division and separatism.

RATHER THAN SEEK WAYS to accommodate the separatists, leaders in the business community should make it unmistakably clear that they are committed to the broadening of opportunities for minority groups within the framework of an open and integrated society. These leaders should also accept the fact that most members of these minority groups will require a considerable amount of special preparation (including on-the-job training) in order to take advantage of these opportunities.

At the same time (while it might be painful to admit it), Negroes and other minority groups should recognize that the acceptance of the validity of this proposition is not a capitulation to racism. Having seen this truth, they should get on with the urgent task of remedying the deficit in technical qualifications from which most of them suffer.

To obtain a better appreciation of the progress of minority groups in the banking industry I asked the presidents of the 12 Federal Reserve Banks to share with me their assessment of the extent to which members of such groups are making headway at the executive level in the leading banks in their districts. The picture which emerges from these observations is far from encouraging.

There are virtually no members of these minority groups serving on the boards of directors or as senior officers of the leading banks in any of our large cities.

A substantial number of banks have members of minority groups serving as junior officers, and an even larger number of banks have them enrolled in management training programs.

However, most of the banks have a difficult time holding minority group members who are junior officers and trainees or attracting others.

In my personal judgment, the banks (and other large corporations as well) can take—and should take—steps to strengthen their relations with minority groups, without trying to negotiate treaties with racial separatists, and thus enhance the contribution which the business community can make toward improving conditions in urban areas.

Culture in Union Halls:

Demonstration Arts Projects Enriching Lives of Workers

A YEAR'S EXPERIENCE in pilot programs shows that union-sponsored arts and cultural projects can be valuable tools in helping to "enrich the quality of workers' lives," AFL-CIO Community Services Activities Dir. Leo Perlis declared.

Perlis said that historically, both control of and access to the artistic and cultural institutions has been "largely in the hands of the well-placed, the well-to-do and the well-educated." Now, he said, it is time that the base be broadened to make museums, theaters and concerts more readily available to the less-affluent where they live and work.

"There is really no reason," he said, why fine paintings and sculpture, ballets, symphonies and plays can't be brought into union halls and other neighborhood facilities.

"It is about time that the whole base of artistic and cultural life be extended, so that more and more people participate . . . so that more and more people can and do enjoy them," he asserted. That, he said, is the aim of the AFL-CIO Demonstration Arts Projects, backed by the central labor bodies, in Buffalo, Louisville, Minneapolis and New York City.

Appearing on Labor News Conference, Perlis said that in addition to the need to improve wages, working hours and working conditions, there is the "need to enrich our lives by participating in the cultural and artistic activities in our communities."

Perlis said that the unions of actors, musicians, entertainers and others in the art and culture industry are also co-sponsors in the projects. He pointed out that while these unions do have an "economic interest" in providing more job opportunities for their members, "they, like all the other AFL-CIO unions and their members, are concerned largely with the enrichment of the quality of human life for all."

By Press Associates, Inc.

WHEN THE WAGE & HOUR Division of the Labor Dept. recently reported that its investigations had found that 475,000 workers had been bilked of more than $89 million in minimum wages and overtime during 1968, the conclusion might easily have been reached that the defrauded workers were going to get the $89 million.

Unfortunately, nothing could be further from the truth. Agreements to make restitution were reached by the Wage & Hour Division for only $31.7 million—a fact which the Labor Dept. news release did not mention.

The remaining $57.3 million, inquiring reporters learned, were accounted for in cases where employers flatly refused to make restitution, where they merely promised to pay proper legal wages in the future, or were cases before the courts in one way or another.

Whatever the reason for neglecting to mention that only one-third of the missing $89 million actually had been recovered, the Wage & Hour report has served to call attention to shocking inadequacies in enforcement of a law that is designed to help millions of workers at the bottom of the economic ladder.

The $31.7 million recovered represents only a tiny fraction of the losses suffered by the poor. Worse, the $89 million known wage frauds actually discovered in 1968 represent only a small fraction of the probable losses, too. Wage & Hour enforcement officers can reach only about 3 percent of the 2 million plants that come under the Fair Labor Standards Act. Experts in the field believe that the wages actually lost go into the hundreds of millions.

Why does this shocking situation exist?

One of the major reasons is the weakness of the enforcement provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act. The Wage & Hour Division has no direct power to compel recovery of lost wages. It can negotiate agreements to cover past violations and that is about all. An aggrieved worker can bring suit on his own or can ask the Secretary of Labor to bring suit on his behalf.

The law provides virtually no penalties. The delinquent employer is under no compulsion to pay more than he owes even if the law finally catches up with him and only in rare cases can he be punished for contempt of court if he disobeys a court order.

On top of the weaknesses in the enforcement power of the law itself, has come a disturbing attitude toward enforcement by Robert D. Moran, newly appointed Wage & Hour administrator.

MORAN HAS MADE a number of pronouncements indicating that he sees his role in enforcing the law as more of a teacher than a policeman.

In announcing the 1968 figures, Moran said, "finding violations is not our goal." Rather, he said, "We are more concerned with improving the level of compliance through informing employes and employers of their rights and obligations. Therefore, we have started new and expanded information and education programs through which we hope to reduce the violations reported in future years."

However important his educational function may be, the fact is that the law has been on the books for 31 years now, attention to which was called by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany who has insisted that finding violations is essential to enforcement of the law.

Moran's philosophical, educational approach to enforcement of the law has a certain air of detachment that may be impressive to many people, but surely it can have little appeal to the worker who has been defrauded of the modest income that minimum wage brings or the worker who has been equally defrauded of his time-and-a-half for overtime.

The present Wage & Hour Law is weak for a number of reasons. It fails to set a realistic, living wage as the minimum and it fails to cover many millions who ought to be covered. But its weakness is compounded over and over by a weak policy of enforcement and the obvious need for much tougher enforcement provisions and penalties in the immediate future.

UNION-SPONSORED arts and cultural projects are valuable tools to help "enrich the quality of workers' lives," AFL-CIO Community Services Activities Dir. Leo Perlis, center, declared on Labor News Conference. Questioning him on the AFL-CIO public affairs interview were Walterene Swanston, left, of the Washington Evening Star and Harry Conn of Press Associates, Inc. The program is heard Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m. EDT, on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Meany Views State of Labor, Nation

Following are excerpts from an interview with AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany on Aug. 28. Reporters questioning Meany were Damon Stetson of the New York Times, Neil Gilbride of the Associated Press, Dick Levine of the Wall Street Journal, Stanley Levey of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers, and Archie Robinson of U.S. News & World Report.

Q. Would you say that the labor movement is in better or worse condition this Labor Day than all the others that you can recall?

MEANY: I think the movement is in better condition than it ever was. I think that each year things are better. When I look back, it is hard really to realize the progress that is being made when you are so close to it. But if you take a look back a few years and try to think of what was going on then—for instance, this business of welfare funds and pensions and holidays with pay—this was a dream at one time. Now this is accepted as commonplace.

People say: "Well, we have so many paid holidays, vacations with pay and we have pensions and hospitalization and welfare." You say: "So what, everybody has got it." But I remember a time when this was unthought about.

Q. The laboring man has become middle class, has advantages that he didn't have before, is more conservative than he was. Some people think that labor people now—leaders—are out of tune with the generation.

MEANY: Actually, I think the labor leaders are out of tune with the people who feel that they know better than labor does what is best for labor. We have always had that type of people.

We have people who are constantly worrying about the lack of militancy—militancy on the part of labor. We no longer march in the streets; we no longer have the sit-down strikes. Labor, to some extent, has become middle class.

When you have no property, you don't have anything, you have nothing to lose by these radical actions. But when you become a person who has a home and has property, to some extent you become conservative. And, I would say, to that extent labor has become conservative. I don't think there is any question of that.

But, at the same time, the program of the trade union movement—the things we fight for—there is nothing conservative about that. We still want to break through with new ideas.

Q. How do you assure that the rank and file—the man and woman in the home in the suburb—is behind the leadership as you look for new areas of . . .

MEANY: I don't. I go by what happens in the organization. For instance, when you say the rank and filer who owns a home—he might not have attended a union meeting for 10 years. So he is pretty hard to reach. But still you will find that from his union, from the local union level, these problems come into the movement. I am not looking over my shoulder to see if the rank and file is following. I am quite sure that if we are doing things the rank and file doesn't want, we will learn it in the very same way as we find out about the things that they do want.

Q. In other words, you are doing what you think is right and good for the labor movement.

MEANY: Yes, and doing it on the basis of what we know about the labor movement. All of these things come up through the labor movement. The heads of the trade union movement and the so-called liberals who were on the fringe of the movement—they didn't go off into a smoke-filled room and come up with the idea that workmen's compensation is a good thing. That isn't the way it happened. Workmen's compensation came right out of the shop.

I don't worry about what the rank and file wants because I know I will hear what they want. I don't go searching and hold a referendum here and a referendum there, because these things have a way of coming through the trade union structure.

Q. What is the answer to bringing in today's militant groups—the poor and the black and others—so that they own a house and they have a piece of the action and perhaps are less militant and stop creating the same kind of disturbances that labor perhaps once had created? How do we face this particular problem?

MEANY: We face it by doing what we have always done. We continue our constructive work.

As far as the black militants are concerned, I don't think some of them want improvement. I think they want the issue. I think they want to be militant. I think they want to demonstrate. I don't know what I can do for them.

As far as the black, non-white minority is concerned, there is no question that they still have a long way to go. But there is no question that they have come a long way. The statistics will show that. Of course, the militants say: We don't want to know what happened last year; we don't want to know how much improvement; we don't want to know how many black families are now in certain levels—and this is going up all the time.

Any corporation in America that sells to the general public will tell you, they are paying attention to the black market because the black market is getting more and more ability to buy all the time. They are going up. But the black militants don't want to hear about that. They don't want to know what happened yesterday or the day before. They want sort of instant solutions for all these problems. And, of course, they are not going to get it.

Q. Some labor statisticians of late have been proving that workers are on a treadmill—that they are not really getting any place. What do you think about the state of collective bargaining? Is it really working?

MEANY: This doesn't represent a failure of collective bargaining at all. In fact, this shows that by the collective bargaining process, at least he is keeping pace with the treadmill. He is not gaining anything, maybe he is losing a little bit, but if he didn't have collective bargaining, where would he be?

Q. What is the answer to inflation? How are we going to stop it? Controls on everything?

MEANY: The only way you are going to stop it—and I am not advocating this, but you are asking me and I can only go by my experience and I don't pretend to be an expert but I do have some experience—the only way you are going to stop it is by controls.

Q. Legal controls?

MEANY: Legal controls. And we will not accept legal controls unless they control all forms of income, prices, dividends, profits and everything else.

Q. Do you think it is coming to that?

MEANY: I don't know. I hope not, but you ask how do I see the end. I don't see the end to this.

Q. Is there any voluntary way you can work it out between labor and industry to resume some restraint on wage settlement?

MEANY: The fellows who have this responsibility directly—I don't have it directly—wouldn't buy wage controls unless it was a national emergency, unless the President said that our commitments overseas were such that we had to have this. Then they would buy wage controls and we repeatedly have said this, that we would take wage controls if the President thinks this is necessary, providing there are controls of all the other elements that go into the economy. This would include profits, income of all sorts.

Now, whether this thing will cool down—there is no indication of this so-called cooling down. You find the big corporations who want to invest for expansion, nothing stops them. In fact, the high interest rate was supposed to stop that. Well, it has not stopped it. Even repeal of the 7 percent tax credit was supposed to have that effect, but there is no indication of that.

Q. After all these years in the labor movement, Mr. Meany, are you able to look back and reflect and say if things had been different you would have preferred to do something else other than what you have done?

MEANY: No, if I look back, I don't know of anything else that I would prefer doing. I don't know of anything that could ever possibly have given me the excitement, if you want to put it that way, the interest or the satisfaction.

Q. Which President do you think has done the most for the working man while you have been watching things?

MEANY: Johnson.

Q. Are you including Roosevelt in this?

MEANY: Yes. You are talking about quantity and quality of the two. Now, of course, Roosevelt couldn't possibly have done what Johnson did because there were different times. Johnson couldn't have done what he did if there hadn't been a Roosevelt before him. It was a difference of 30 years. The things that Johnson did, for instance, in the field of federal aid to education.

Q. What about Nixon? Can you size that up yet?

MEANY: Well, I have been trying and trying, and waiting and waiting and, up to the present time, I just can't size it up. He seems to come out with statements, he has a little bit for everybody. Even if you are on opposite sides. He has got some for people on each side. He has certainly done things to warm the cockles of Strom Thurmond's heart and, at the same time, he has been doing things that the civil rights people think are all right, too, in certain areas.

I think that some of the things on his tax position were favorable. I think as far as the common people, the ordinary people at the low economic level, I think merely by opening up this welfare thing with the statement from the highest level, the White House, I think this was a great plus.

That doesn't mean I agree with the remedies he proposes, but the mere fact that he said this business has got to be overhauled, it is out of date, it is bad and so forth, I think this will be helpful.

Q. Are you with him on Viet Nam now?

MEANY: I haven't changed my mind on Viet Nam. I think that we made a commitment there. I think it is unfortunate the way we got into it. I don't see how we can get out of it unless we can, in some way, insure that this area is not going to fall over, one country after another, to the Communists. I can't see anything that changes my theory that if they take Viet Nam they will keep going.

And I think it is significant that the countries who are nearest to Viet Nam are closer to our position than the countries who are a long way off.

I wasn't a critic of Johnson on this war and I certainly am not going to be a critic of what Nixon inherited. But I think Johnson inherited it.

Frankly, I think Nixon would like to get out of this war. I know Johnson would have done almost anything within his power to get out of this war except surrender and withdraw unilaterally. And I don't think Nixon will do that.

Q. What do you think labor's program, looking ahead, has got to be in the next few years? What are some of the major challenges that are confronting the AFL-CIO, labor generally?

MEANY: I think the challenges that are facing labor are the challenges that are facing the American people. Any number of things. I think inflation is a real problem—the runaway cost of living.

I think we have got a long way to go before we can say that the job is done in the field of civil rights.

And I think something that we talk about more and more is becoming more and more important and that is the question of how do we live in this country. What happens to our air and our water. This is a tremendous threat. I think more and more people are concerned about that.

I think we will go right down the road doing the things that we can do for the consumer, for the little fellow generally, for the people who don't have their full rights as citizens. Frankly, I don't see any change in the direction. I think there will perhaps be more action and more action required.

Q. On a broader basis, what kind of a situation does the formation of the ALA present? Does it indicate perhaps some more splitting of the labor movement?

MEANY: I don't know. That's the purpose of it. Whether it succeeds or not, I don't know. I don't see signs of any great success. This is history repeating itself. We had this back in 1934 and 1935.

Q. Looking back, do you think the CIO helped the labor movement?

MEANY: Yes. The formation of the CIO—and I don't think Lewis had this in mind, I don't think Lewis even thought about it; I wasn't in the national picture then but I was very much in the labor movement—the formation of the CIO was a shot in the arm to the labor movement.

Q. The next question, of course, will the ALA. . .?

MEANY: We don't need a shot in the arm. No, you see this is not a decadent organization. This is an organization that is moving. Moving all the time into everything. We are in more activities now than I ever thought would be part of the routine work of the trade union movement. We don't have the same situation.

Q. How damaging is it to have a split at this time?

MEANY: I don't know. It certainly isn't strengthening the labor movement. Just how much damage it would do, I don't know. After all, if the ALA believes in the things it says it believes in, they believe in a lot of the things we believe in and there shouldn't be any difference of opinion. There shouldn't be any difference of opinion, for instance, on legislation.

Q. Next week, Fred Hoehler comes aboard and the Labor Studies Center starts. How important do you think that is to the future of the trade union movement?

MEANY: I think it is tremendously important for the future. I hope it will be. I hope it will develop along those lines. Now, of course, it is just getting started and I just wouldn't want to predict what would happen. But I personally feel it is of tremendous importance that we have a better educated trade union movement, at least at the leadership level. I don't think it can be underestimated. I think there are great possibilities there.

Ask Welfare Subsidy:

Governors Propose Health Care Plan

The only voice raised against the proposed federal take-over of the welfare system was that of Gov. Lester Maddox of Georgia, who declared it was "all part of a move to have the states abidicate their responsibilities to the federal government."

The welfare proposal, which called on the government to take over the entire program within five years, was clear evidence that the governors feel Pres. Nixon's proposals for welfare reform fall short of relieving the burden for most of the states.

The Administration's program calls for a national minimum standard of $1,600 a year in welfare payments for a poor family of four with the states paying the bill beyond that. In effect, the federal government would pick up virtually the whole welfare tab for 20 states currently paying the lowest benefits —one of which is Maddox's Georgia. The governors want this concept extended to all the states.

Backed By Harris

The chairman of the Democratic National Committee, Sen. Fred R. Harris of Oklahoma, here to meet with governors from his party, promptly endorsed the welfare proposal and said he plans to introduce legislation to put it into effect.

Vice Pres. Spiro T. Agnew also said he favors federal takeover of the welfare system as a "final objective," but declared "there isn't the money to do it now."

As for the health insurance plan, the Vice President said the proposal "doesn't excite me to the point that I would go out and beat the drums for it."

Agnew addressed a closed session of the conference, but some of the governors revealed he had brought bad news in the form of a report that the Nixon Administration plans a heavy cutback in federal construction projects throughout the nation.

The President later spelled out the details—a 75 percent cutback in all federally-financed construction. Nixon also suggested that states and cities similarly cut back on construction.

Agnew was giving the governors advance notice of the cutbacks, scheduled to be announced formally by the White House later in the week. Involved are tens of millions of dollars in highway, building and other projects.

In other actions, the governors:

- Called for establishment of a trust fund to finance development and expansion of mass transit systems, similar to the fund used for interstate highway construction. The Administration's mass transit program, recently submitted to Congress, would continue the current system of federal contracting with local agencies.
- Asked the federal government to assume "far greater responsibility for the financing of education" without specifying any amount.
- Generally endorsed the Administration's plan for federal sharing of revenues with the states without strings, but asked for a bigger share than proposed. Nixon has set $12 billion a year as a target sum to be allotted among the states by 1976.

Rockefeller challenged a statement the President made in an address to the conference that "dreams of unlimited billions of dollars being released once the war in Viet Nam ends are just that—dreams."

The New York governor argued that economic growth alone, even if the war were to continue, would produce $125 billion in new federal revenues by 1976.

Pilots Urge Crackdown On Airliner Hijacking

outlaw the practice," Ruby said. "Today we are seeing a rebirth of piracy in an ocean that encompasses the planet—an airspace that covers the world."

Ruby urged Pres. Nixon to add the prestige and name of the United States to the Tokyo Convention of 1963, an international protocol based on international law, as the first step in eliminating piracy against airships.

Nixon signed the convention articles in June but the State Dept. has not transmitted the document to the 12 other signatory nations. Nixon's signature will, when transmitted, encourage other nations to sign, the union president said.

U.S. Pilots Represented

The U.S. pilots' union was represented by Capt. Ray Gruber of Pan American Air Lines at a Sept. 1 meeting of executive board meetings of the International Federation of Airline Pilots' Associations in Paris.

Board members voted to call a 24-hour worldwide flight stoppage unless Syria acts within 15 days after Sept. 8. Also they asked the UN Security Council to take action, and instructed two officers to present the IFALPA viewpoint to U Thant.

If such action is unsuccessful, the organization said, that will "bring the urgency of the situation to the attention of the traveling public by one of the few avenues" open to the pilots of free world air lines.

The board said it expects member associations representing 44,000 pilots of virtually all major airlines in non-Communist countries to ratify the strike call.

Two weeks' notice will be given the airlines and the public in the event such action is decided on, it announced.

Arab commandos were reported responsible for hijacking the TWA jet plane over southern Italy in what they said was a counterblow against the sale of Phantom jet fighter planes to Israel by the United States.

In Washington, Sec. of State William P. Rogers condemned the plane's seizure as an act of international piracy and called on Syria to release the plane and all its passengers.

The TWA jet hijacking was said to be the first recorded seizure of a U.S. plane outside the Western Hemisphere.

Some 25 American planes, including one diverted to Cuba on the same day as the hijacking in Italy, have been forced to fly to Havana.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council, at its February meeting, called for international agreement to extradite hijackers to the country where the flight originated and urged that governments ban all flights to countries which provide sanctuary for hijackers.

SALUTE TO A. PHILIP RANDOLPH for his civil rights achievements brought together, from left: Dir. Donald Slaiman of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights; Pres. David Sullivan of the Service Employes; Randolph; Washington Mayor Walter Washington; Joseph A. Beavers of the Hotel & Restaurant Employes; Executive Dir. Bayard Rustin of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, and Pres. J. C. Turner of the Greater Washington AFL-CIO.

Randolph Holds Violence No Tool For Improving Lot of Minorities

By Eugene A. Kelly

America's minority groups "cannot achieve social change effectively" by using the weapons of violence, AFL-CIO Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph told a Washington dinner audience gathered to commemorate his achievements.

The people of labor, government and the community came to salute the veteran civil rights battler in his 80th year and were themselves saluted by the guest of honor, still active in the cause of social justice for the poor and friendless after 59 years of advocacy.

Pres. David Sullivan of the Service Employes and Pres. J. C. Turner of the Greater Washington AFL-CIO saluted Randolph for the labor community; Mayor Walter E. Washington for the district government; Bayard Rustin for the Institute bearing Randolph's name; Patrick Cardinal O'Boyle for the Catholic archdiocese; and representatives of other church and civic groups.

To advance the institute's registration-and-vote drive in the Washington community, Mrs. Arline Neal of the D.C. Labor & Community Action Committee gave Randolph a check for $1,000 and a pledge for an additional $1,500 as a thank-offering for the veteran unionist's leadership through the years.

"I salute all you leaders of the civil rights cause," said Randolph, an AFL-CIO vice president who became president emeritus of the Sleeping Car Porters after 40 years of service in the president's post.

"I salute my good friend and brother, Pres. George Meany of the AFL-CIO, dedicated to the cause of the common man and one who believes in social justice."

"I remember Cardinal O'Boyle in the march on Washington—he was there" in 1963, when 200,000 black and white civil rights adherents staged a peaceful march to the Lincoln Memorial—a march that helped move Congress to pass the Civil Rights Act of 1964, Randolph reminded his audience.

Addressing a testimonial dinner commemorating that march, Randolph said "we are concerned about eliminating poverty, discrimination, anti-Semitism and the deprival of the rights of Catholics" in northern Ireland.

Where people are fighting to preserve human personality, Randolph said, "we may not agree with their tactics and strategy but we cannot forget they are fighting to restore dignity."

Randolph said he hopes that, "in the fight for the realization of our objectives, we remember that we cannot achieve social change affectively with the weapons of violence." Those who throw a Molotov cocktail "believe they have achieved something . . . but violence begets violence, and is more destructive of those who beget it" than the evils they seek to eliminate, the civil rights champion declared.

He said "I am grateful to my brothers from the labor movement" whose efforts demonstrate that "all black people are not against whites, and all whites are not against blacks."

Recalling sessions of the AFL-CIO Executive Council in 1964 and 1965, Randolph noted that "George Meany at every session gave special attention" to implementing the federation's equal rights policies.

He gave special thanks to Andrew J. Biemiller, Clarence M. Mitchell and Joseph L. Rauh, Jr., as the principal tacticians behind the drive to pass the Civil Rights Act, and he added "the whole power of the AFL-CIO was put behind the struggle." Biemiller is AFL-CIO legislative director. Mitchell is Washington director of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. Rauh is an attorney who formerly was chairman of the District of Columbia Democratic Committee.

Organized labor had fewer than 100,000 Negro members in 1929 but now has more than 2 million, he said.

Mitchell and Sec. Joseph D. Keenan of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers were co-chairmen of the Randolph dinner. Mitchell called Randolph "a man of principle" who follows fair rules. Sullivan, who spoke for Keenan, called Randolph "a great American, a great human being who always fought for workers."

Rustin urged his audience to "save the Supreme Court from racism" by joining the fight of labor and civil rights groups to defeat Pres. Nixon's nomination of Appeals Court Judge Clement F. Haynsworth to the high court.

Hospital Union Wins Elections In Baltimore

Baltimore — Workers at Johns Hopkins and Lutheran hospitals voted by emphatic margins for Hospital & Nursing Employes Local 1199E in elections consented to by management and supervised by the State Labor Dept.

The local, affiliated with the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, won its campaign for bargaining rights with the aid of a labor and civil rights coalition like one forged earlier against bitter opposition of state and county government officials in Charleston, S.C.

The vote at Johns Hopkins, a nationally known hospital and medical school, was 807 for, 460 against the union, after an earlier 2-1 margin of victory at Lutheran.

Mrs. Coretta King, widow of Dr. Martin Luther King of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, is honorary chairman of the union's national organizing committee. She told the nonprofessional workers at rallies here that unionization will be "good for the employes," the community and the hospitals.

Direct Presidential Vote Backed by State Leaders

Leaders of state legislatures favor direct, popular election of the President of the United States, according to a poll taken by Nation's Business magazine.

The Chamber of Commerce publication surveyed delegates to the National Conference of State Legislative Leaders and found that:

- By a 6-1 margin, they favored changes in the present Electoral College method of electing the President.
- Two-thirds of those favoring a change support direct election of the President—far more than the number supporting any other plan.
- Of those favoring a direct vote, 75 percent were of the opinion that the houses of the legislature in which they serve would ratify a constitutional amendment to that effect.

To End Hunger, Malnutrition:

Improvement Urged In Food Stamp Plan

A strong, comprehensive food stamp program is essential if America is to eliminate hunger and malnutrition among its poorest families, the AFL-CIO told Congress.

Such a program can be formulated by "combining the best provisions" of several bills to amend the Food Stamp Act of 1964, Julius Rothman of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Urban Affairs testified.

The legislation to be approved by the House Agriculture Committee and sent to the floor, Rothman said, should include the following criteria:

- Federal eligibility standards that are lower than those contained in the present food stamp program so as to permit more people to receive food stamps.
- Free food stamps for the lowest income groups.
- Powers to permit the Secretary of Agriculture to administer the food stamp program in localities unwilling to cooperate, and pay states up to the full amount of administrative costs for food stamp plans in localities unable to meet the costs.
- A prompt, simple method for certifying eligibility for food stamps along with an improved method of issuing them.
- A system of installment or partial-payment for stamps to accommodate families whose paydays do not coincide with stamp issuance periods.
- A broad list of items that may be obtained with food stamps, including such necessities as soap and household items.
- Simultaneous operation of the commodity distribution and food stamp programs during a county's transition from one to the other, or when the food stamp program is failing to meet the need.

Rothman also recommended "the most careful study and consideration" of a bill which would expand the borrowing authority of the Commodity Credit Corp. to finance food stamps.

The measure would assure that the food stamp program "would have sufficient financing each and every year to carry out its most important task" in eliminating hunger, Rothman said.

He called the Administration's request for $610 million in fiscal 1970 for the food stamp program "a step in the right direction" but not as "realistic" as the $750 million called for in the Senate version of the 1970 agriculture appropriations bill.

"A billion dollars could easily be invested in expansion of the food stamp program," Rothman stated, "and still there would be a very substantial number of our fellow citizens without enough to eat."

This cost is not great, he added, "when measured against the illness, the wasted and dependent lives which result from hunger and malnutrition."

Rothman cited studies which show that between 10 and 12 million Americans are "hungry or grossly undernourished" and malnutrition runs as high as 15 percent of the population in certain areas.

America has the capacity to wipe out hunger, "it is simply that we have not committed sufficient resources—financial or intellectual—to the effort to eliminate it."

The AFL-CIO also gave attention to another problem that is allied with getting food to the poor—that of educating them to consume foods which are the most nutritious.

Since professional nutritionists and home economists "have been notably unsuccessful in reaching the poor," Rothman suggested that the Dept. of Agriculture turn to the poor themselves to find persons who can communicate ideas about nutrition.

"An 'outreach' program of this kind could have a significant impact on poor families and especially on the health of their children," he pointed out.

Distress Signal

Administration Asks Tax Aid to Business

Under its proposals, a married couple with two children and a $5,000 income—taking the standard deduction—would pay $53 more than under the House bill.

A similar family with a $10,000 income would pay $54 more. But at the $25,000 level, there would be no change.

Kennedy argued that the House bill would leave consumers with too much spending power and thus spur inflation.

He said the House had been overly liberal in raising the standard deduction from the present 10 percent to 15 percent and lifting the dollar ceiling from $1,000 to $2,000 over three years.

The deduction should go up only to 12 percent, the Treasury chief said, and the ceiling only to $1,400.

For corporations, Kennedy proposed a cut in the maximum tax rate—now 52.8 percent when the surtax is included—to 46 percent by 1972. This would be $1.6 billion a year below the pre-surtax rate.

The House got back into action by passing a bill to extend the Motor Vehicle Safety Act of 1966 for three more years and include tires in the program for manufacturer recall of autos with safety defects.

Manufacturers and retailers of tires would be required to keep names and addresses of purchasers and notify them of any safety defect found in tires.

A similar requirement for auto and truck manufacturers in the 1966 law has led them to recall some 11.2 million vehicles for repair of safety defects.

The measure, as it passed the House, 321 to 0, also would establish standards for motorcycle helmets and retreaded tires and authorize government research and testing facilities for highway and vehicle safety.

The Senate resumed debate on a military authorization bill which it has had under consideration since June and which is expected to occupy most of its time for the next two weeks.

Backed up behind the measure for floor action are a number of major bills, including a coal mine safety bill, housing legislation and a measure to permit more trade with Communist nations.

The Senate Finance Committee said more than 600 persons and organizations have asked to testify on the tax bill. The committee previously set an Oct. 31 deadline for reporting the measure.

House leaders scheduled floor action during the coming week on a proposed constitutional amendment to replace the electoral college system with direct, popular vote election of the President and Vice President.

The labor-backed proposal has been approved by the House Judiciary Committee. It will require a two-thirds vote for House passage, and a similar margin in the Senate. If it clears Congress, it then must be ratified by three-fourths of the states.

Also, still ahead for Congress are potential showdowns on legislation involving housing, water pollution, food stamps, anti-poverty programs, foreign aid, bank holding companies and a whole series of money bills.

Republicans will apparently have to complete the session without the guiding hand of their party leader. Sen. Everett M. Dirksen of Illinois, longtime GOP leader, is recuperating from a serious lung operation.

The titular role now falls to Sen. Hugh Scott of Pennsylvania, the GOP assistant leader.

Speirs Named To Board on Rail Pensions

Neil P. Speirs, assistant president of the United Transportation Union, has been nominated by Pres. Nixon as labor member of the Railroad Retirement Board.

Speirs, subject to Senate confirmation, will succeed A. E. Lyon, who is retiring as labor member. Lyon was appointed to the post by Pres. Kennedy in 1962 and reappointed by Pres. Johnson in 1964. His five-year term expired earlier this year.

The tripartite board, composed of labor, management and government members, administers benefits paid out under the Railroad Retirement and Unemployment Insurance Acts.

Speirs, 56 was president of the Switchmen for ten years prior to the merger of that union, along with the Firemen & Enginemen, Conductors & Brakemen and the Trainmen, into the UTU last January.

He began his railroad career as a Southern Pacific employe at San Francisco in 1937, became the Switchmen's general chairman on SP in 1952 and was elected a union vice president in 1955. He was elected Switchmen's president in 1959.

A native of Alberta, Canada, Speirs came to the United States with his parents in 1919. He holds a bachelor's degree from the University of Idaho.

Lyon was executive secretary of the Railway Labor Executives' Association for 17 years before being named to the board. Prior to that he was president of the Railroad Signalmen. He will make his retirement home in Arlington Heights, Ill.

Stanley Ballard of the Musicians, Sec.-Treas. Sol Stetin of the Textile Workers Union of America, Exec. Sec. Thomas R. Donahue, Jr., of the Service Employes; Dir. Meany Brands Haynsworth 'Not Fit' For Advancement to Supreme Court to Haynsworth's nomination during the Issues and Answers program over ABC's television and radio network.

Meany said the odds against convincing the Senate to reject a presidential nomination to the Supreme Court didn't enter into the AFL-CIO's decision to fight the nomination.

Labor's opposition is a matter of principle, Meany stressed. Referring to the outcry which led to the resignation of Supreme Court Justice Abe Fortas last May, Meany said: "There was nothing in that case that even approaches the conflict of interest that I feel is proven on the record and admitted by Judge Haynsworth."

Haynsworth will have to defend his actions in the Deering Milliken case when he appears before the Senate Judiciary Committee, but he apparently won't have to convince Committee Chairman James O. Eastland.

The Mississippi Democrat, who said "two or three days" of hearings would begin Sept. 9, told newsmen that he doesn't think there was any conflict of interest in Haynsworth's actions.

Bayard Rustin, executive director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, suggested that Haynsworth's civil rights record "explains the enthusiasm" with which Eastland and Sen. Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.) reacted to the nomination.

He charged that advancement of Haynsworth to the nation's highest court would be a step towards restoration of the "separate but equal" doctrine which guided the Supreme Court until 1954.

Nixon, he suggested, is trying to recreate the Supreme Court of an earlier era "whose conservatism on civil rights was equaled only by its hostility to labor unions."

Rustin charged that Haynsworth "has supported management in labor disputes as consistently as he has sided with segregationist school boards against Negro parents."

Both the civil rights and the labor movements, Rustin said, are "fully united" in opposing the advancement of Haynsworth to the Supreme Court.

Simkin Designated As Harvard Fellow

Cambridge, Mass. — Harvard University announced that William E. Simkin, former director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, has been chosen as the first recipient of the Meyer Kestnbaum fellowship at Harvard.

The fellowship is supported by a memorial fund established jointly by the Clothing Workers through the Sidney Hillman Foundation; the Hart, Schaffner & Marx Co. and the Kestnbaum family and friends.

Weston Dies At Washington State Parley

Seattle—Funeral services were held here for Evan M. Weston, retired president of the Washington AFL-CIO, who died of a heart attack, Aug. 26, while attending the federation's convention in Tumwater.

Weston headed the former Washington AFL from 1946 until the AFL-CIO merger, at which time he was elected head of the new merged state organization. He retired in 1961 but maintained an active interest in union affairs.

As a chief spokesman for labor in the state, Weston twice led successful battles against employers' efforts to enact a "right-to-work" law in the state.

He was a member of Boilermakers Local 104, and had served a president and business agent of the local. He also had served as president of the Pacific Coast Metal Trades Council.

Lag in Job Growth Points To Economic Slowdown

New Conflict Charge Hits Haynsworth

Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., will face a new conflict of interest allegation when he testifies before the Senate Judiciary Committee as Pres. Nixon's nominee to fill a Supreme Court vacancy.

Like the earlier charge, it deals with the South Carolina judge's lucrative involvement in a vending machine company that did a $100,000-a-year business with the Deering Milliken textile chain.

And it also concerns the tie-breaking vote that Haynsworth cast when the U.S. 4th Circuit Court of Appeals ruled that workers had no claim to jobs or back pay after Deering Milliken closed its Darlington, S. C., textile mill when employes voted for union representation.

Congressional Quarterly, an authoritative non-partisan publication, dug deeper into the corporate records of the Carolina Vend-A-Matic Co. and found that:

Just a month before the case came before Haynsworth and four other appellate court judges, the law firm which represented the Darlington mill handled the incorporation of a subsidiary of Carolina Vend-A-Matic.

Three members of Darlington's law firm signed the incorporation papers and were listed as initial directors of the subsidiary, although they resigned shortly afterwards to be replaced by the officers of the parent corporation.

It was earlier revealed that Haynsworth served as a director of Carolina Vend-A-Matic for many years—until he resigned in compliance with a resolution of the Judicial Conference of the United States barring federal judges from serving as officers or directors of profit-making corporations. His resignation came after the Darlington case was argued before his court, but before the decision was handed down.

Corporate documents filed some months before the case reached the court also list Dorothy M. Haynsworth—the name of the judge's wife — as secretary of Carolina Vend-A-Matic.

Haynsworth's final connection with the company came some four months after the Darlington decision when he signed a purchase agreement by which Automatic Retailers of America acquired the Carolina Vend-A-Matic Co. This led to a profit of nearly $450,000 on Haynsworth's original investment of a few thousand dollars.

Labor and civil rights opposition to the Haynsworth nomination continued to mount as the Judiciary Committee prepared to open its hearings. The hearings had been postponed a week after the death of Sen. Everett M. Dirksen.

PLANS FOR RECONSTRUCTION of hurricane-battered Gulf Coast area are made at Boilermakers' hall in Pascagoula, Miss., which was damaged but not destroyed. From the left, Mississippi State AFL-CIO Pres. Claude Ramsay; Walter H. Holmes, labor liaison with the American Red Cross, Gulfport, Miss.; H. H. Robbins, Office & Professional Employes Local 204, and Walter Thornton, Boilermakers Local 693.

Union Contributions:

Hurricane Relief Exceeds $110,000

Union contributions to the Hurricane Camille disaster aid fund have passed the $110,000 mark, the American Red Cross reported as relief workers continued pumping out flood waters and feeding, clothing and housing storm victims in Mississippi, Louisiana, southern Alabama and Virginia.

With some $5 million of the Red Cross emergency relief fund of $15 million pledged, the need for funds is still urgent disaster workers reported.

The AFL-CIO started a drive for labor contributions to the Red Cross with a $25,000 donation. The Steelworkers donated another $25,000, the Carpenters gave a similar amount and the Painters voted an immediate contribution of $10,000, plus $2,000 collected from delegates at the union's convention.

Checks for $5,000 were forwarded by the Operating Engineers and the Transit Union as well as $2,500 by the Machinists and $1,000 each by the Ladies' Garment Workers, Transport Workers and Asbestos Workers. Nearly $5,000 additional has been raised by the Service Employes, the Cement Workers, Roofers, Telegraph Workers, Rubber Workers and the state central bodies in Alabama, Louisiana and Mississippi, Red Cross disaster relief headquarters in Washington, D.C., reported.

The Louisiana AFL-CIO and the state Building & Construction Trades Council are rounding up 1,100 volunteers for work on weekends starting Oct. 4. Some will be flown in and others will arrive by auto and boat to rebuild the homes of 150 storm victims who lost everything but their lives.

The "building bee" has a schedule of 25 homes per week in Plaquemines and St. Bernard parishes and other stricken areas of southern Louisiana, state federation Pres. Victor Bussie said. No work can begin in some areas until water has been pumped out and building sites dried, he said.

Construction Work Continues to Decline

By Duane Emme

The nation's jobless rate was virtually unchanged in August but employment figures indicated a continued slowdown in the economy, the Labor Dept. reported.

The seasonally adjusted unemployment rate of 3.5 percent was termed an "insignificant" change from the 3.6 percent rate in July. That rate was the highest to date in 1969.

There was a sharp increase in the number of persons working part time because they can't find full time jobs—to the highest level in more than two years.

Although non-farm payroll employment increased by about 165,000 in August to 70.4 million seasonally adjusted, about 100,000 of the increase was attributed to the return to work of auto workers following earlier-than-usual model changeovers.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics noted that in the past six months non-farm payroll employment "has slowed down substantially."

Monthly increases averaged 145,000 in the March-August period, in contrast with a 250,000 average pickup in the previous six months. The slowdown has run through most major industries.

Construction employment continued a steep decline.

Harold Goldstein, BLS deputy commissioner, reiterated an earlier prediction that a continued lag in jobs will most likely lead to a further climb in unemployment.

The number of unemployed persons was 2.9 million in August, 325,000 fewer than in July as students began their exodus from the summertime labor force.

However, after seasonal adjustment, unemployment remained the same over the month for most major work groups and was up by about 275,000 from a 12-year low

Trades Hit Cutback on U.S. Projects

Pres. Nixon's order cutting back new federal construction projects by 75 percent is "a wrong weapon . . . being used at the wrong time against the wrong people," declared Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

Haggerty made the remark in a brief reaction to the President's announcement, noting that the BCTD was still uncertain as to exactly what Nixon was proposing and would withhold further comment until it had analyzed the cutbacks.

Nixon said he was ordering the sharp reduction in federal construction as an anti-inflation measure that would "release resources for home building where the need is great and where severe strains are already being felt."

But Haggerty pointed out that a number of elements have contributed to the rise in construction costs.

"The extremely high cost of money which is almost indefensible, the soaring cost of land which the federal government could greatly alleviate by releasing some of its

Unions Back Textile Strike In Alabama

Columbiana, Ala.—Alabama unions were rallying to the defense of union members here who have been fined and jailed, run down by company autos on a picket line and ordered to post a $75,000 "peace" bond to get their part-time organizer out of Shelby County jail.

The Alabama AFL-CIO called for statewide labor support for 125 employes of the Elastic Corp. of America who joined the United Textile Workers earlier this year. They staged a protest strike Aug. 4 when management fired the union organizing committee, and returned to work Sept. 5 under an

Direct Vote for President Urged To Replace Dated Electoral College

The AFL-CIO strongly urged the House to approve a constitutional amendment to abolish the Electoral College and provide for the direct, popular election of the President and Vice President.

The appeal was made in a letter from AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller to all House members as floor debate on the proposed amendment got under way.

Biemiller also called upon the lawmakers to reject alternative proposals "that would weaken this long overdue reform of our present antiquated electoral college system."

Any constitutional amendment requires two-thirds approval by both the House and Senate, followed by ratification by three-fourths of the states.

The popular vote amendment, which won an impressive 28-6 endorsement from the House Judiciary Committee in May, would:

- Assure the election of the candidates for President and Vice President with the most votes if the winning ticket received at least 40 percent of the popular vote.
- Provide for the runoff election between the two top slates if no candidate received at least 40 percent of the popular vote.

Such an amendment was urged by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany when he testified before the committee earlier this year.

The amendment also has drawn support from a wide range of groups and organizations, including the American Bar Association and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

Pres. Nixon, who at first preferred a modified electoral college, later said that a direct election amendment "will have my enthusiastic support" if Congress enacts it, although he voiced "some doubts" as to whether it could be ratified.

Meany had told the House committee that "if the proposal for direct popular election cannot be adopted, there is little reason to believe that any other plan can."

Before the House committee ap-

Meany Cites Dirksen's Aid On Rights Act

The late Sen. Everett McKinley Dirksen and labor often differed on major issues "but we always knew him as an opponent of great legislative skill," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared.

Meany extended the AFL-CIO's "sincere sympathies" to the family of Dirksen after the Republican leader died from a cardiac arrest Sept. 7, five days after a malignant tumor was removed from his lung.

Meany said labor would remember Dirksen best "as a colleague in the desperate and successful efforts to pass the landmark civil rights bill" of 1964.

"It was his personal support," Meany recalled, "that made this legislation possible, with his tactical ability on this occasion used on behalf of a great liberal cause."

Dirksen, 73, who served in Congress for 25 years and was the GOP Senate leader for the past 10 years, was eulogized by Pres. Nixon as a leader who "put his nation before himself and his party."

After the body lay in state in the Capitol for two days and funeral services were held in Washington, Dirksen was flown to Pekin, Ill., his bithplace, for burial.

As Senate Republicans prepared to caucus to choose a new leader there were signs of a sharp battle between moderates and conservatives over the post. Until the choice is made, party affairs will be run by Sen. Hugh Scott of Pennsylvania, the assistant minority leader.

Yost, Marnell Head Railway Employes Dept.

Chicago—James E. Yost, a leader in the Boilermakers since the 1940s, has been named the new president of the AFL-CIO Railway Employes Dept., succeeding Michael Fox, who is retiring.

The department's executive council also chose Paul J. Marnell, a former Machinists leader on the Milwaukee Railroad, as secretary-treasurer. He succeeds Howard Pickett, who also is retiring.

Both appointments are effective Oct. 1, when Fox and Pickett retire. The offices are subject to election when the department holds its next convention in 1972.

Yost, 43, a native of Bluefield, Va., served a blacksmith's apprenticeship on the Norfolk & Western Railway. Following service in World War II, he returned to N&W and helped organize the Boilermakers there in 1947.

His first full-time union job was as assistant general chairman on the N&W in 1950. He was named an assistant to the president of the department in March 1956 and has served in that capacity since.

Born in Walnut, Kans., and later educated in Texas, Marnell served his Machinists apprenticeship in the West Milwaukee, Wis. railroad shops.

Marnell, 48, was elected secretary-treasurer of IAM District 73 in 1950 and general chairman of the district in 1953. In 1958, he, too, was named an assistant to Fox and has since filled that post.

Fox, a member of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, has headed the department since 1950.

Pickett, a member of the Railway Carmen, has been secretary-treasurer since 1958.

The department is composed of five rail unions, commonly known as the shopcrafts. They represent 135,000 workers. The affiliates are Boilermakers, IAM, IBEW, Carmen, Sheet Metal Workers.

HIGHEST HONOR given by the U.S. Navy to a civilian, its Distinguished Public Service Award, was presented to retired AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler by Admiral I. J. Galatin, Chief of Naval Material, in Washington ceremonies attended by Mrs. Schnitzler, center, and top trade union leaders.

Czechoslovakia Called Test of Soviet Intent

Portsmouth, England—If Soviet rulers sincerely want better relations with the West let them withdraw their troops from Czechoslovakia, Pres. C. L. Dennis of the Railway & Airline Clerks told the British Trades Union Congress.

Dennis and Pres. Kenneth G. Brown of the Lithographers & Photoengravers were AFL-CIO fraternal delegates to the 101st annual TUC convention.

"What has happened, and is happening in Czechoslovakia saddens the hearts of all of us and free men everywhere," Dennis said.

When the Soviets invaded Czechoslovakia in August 1968, Dennis noted, the international labor movement "unanimously denounced" the invasion and free trade unions which had engaged in exchange programs with Communist organizations "broke off all contacts."

Any resumption of exchanges at this time, Dennis added, "would be an unpardonable blow against the brave workers of Czechoslovakia now desperately resisting Communist tyranny."

The Soviet aggression against the Czechoslovak people "demonstrates how illusory are the notions about international detente and liberalization behind the Iron Curtain," Dennis pointed out.

He also reiterated the AFL-CIO's call upon the U.S. government to place the Czechoslovakian problem on the agenda of any talks it holds with Moscow and "make every effort" to get the United Nations to call for Soviet troop withdrawal.

In another area, Dennis described the role played by his union and other U.S. transport unions through their affiliation with the International Transport Workers' Federation (ITF).

"We have devoted much of our time and resources," he said, "to assisting the ITF and other trade union organizations in their task of building free transport unions in every corner of the world.

"To that task we are committed, at home and abroad, and we shall pursue it with diligence and determination."

In extending greetings to the TUC on behalf of AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, Dennis described the organization as one "which shares with American workers a common heritage of freedom and democracy in the work place and in the government."

Brown told the TUC that U.S. unions are hard pressed in bargaining to negotiate wage increases that will allow workers "just to keep even" with rising living costs.

He cited statistics that illustrate the sharp increases that have occurred in the United States in the prices of food, clothing, medical services and housing.

"The cry that abounds," Brown said, "is that union bargaining is driving up the cost of living when, of course, the facts don't support that claim."

He emphasized that profits have risen at a much faster rate than wages and the "sharpest rises in living costs are occurring in the least unionized segments of industry where labor costs are not even a major factor."

Marble Union Delegates Vote Higher Dues

New Orleans—Delegates to the 16th convention of the Marble, Slate & Stone Polishers approved an increase in the union's monthly per capita dues.

Two other major constitutional changes were also adopted.

The per capita was raised from $1.50 to $1.75 a month, with the increase to be divided between the cost of an accelerated organizing drive and meeting higher operational costs.

The other two constitutional amendments adopted would change the term of local officers from two to three years and set local monthly dues at the equivalent of a member's rate of pay for two hours work.

There were no elections at the convention since Pres. William Peitler and 10 vice presidents are in the middle of four-year terms to which they were elected by the union's 1967 convention.

Peitler, who also holds the office of secretary-treasurer, reported to the convention on progress made by the union in organizing and negotiations since the last convention.

Convention speakers included Sec.-Treas. Frank Bonadio of the Building & Construction Trades Dept; John T. Joyce, treasurer of the Bricklayers; Donald H. Williams, Dept. of Labor representative in New Orleans, and Maurice Adams, the union's general counsel.

TUC Rejects Wilson Policy:

British Unions Hit Bargaining Controls

Portsmouth, England—British trade unionists rejected any kind of government interference in collective bargaining at the 101st British Trades Union Congress here.

Delegates by big majorities voted their opposition to the Labor Government's policy of studying selected wage increases, and its power to delay payment on some of these boosts.

The TUC had been expected to condemn the government's powers to hold up increases but not demand an end to the Prices & Incomes Board which probes bargaining situations.

By its actions, TUC rejected the counsel of Prime Minister Harold Wilson, who told it earlier in the week that the government intends to continue its policy of wage restraint.

"I must make it clear," Wilson said, "that whatever the pressures we are not going to put our achievements at risk. This is not politics. This is Britain's livelihood."

Wilson also told the delegates that if the government introduces legislation to compel employers to give women "equal pay for equal work" then male workers should hold back on wage demands.

But TUC shunned him on this issue, too, by passing a motion calling for immediate introduction of the equal-pay legislation. "Equal pay is a matter of principle and of right," one speaker said.

All told, week-long debates made it clear that the strains which had been created during this summer's battle between the political and industrial wings of the British labor movement have not disappeared.

During the summer, Wilson tried to get the British Parliament to pass laws curbing the right to strike, but TUC opposition thwarted his effort. Delegates here were, in effect, celebrating their victory.

In explaining an agreement reached between the government and TUC following his unsuccessful efforts to get the strike bans, Wilson described the pact as a means of getting unions to discipline members who strike in defiance of TUC proposals for return to work.

But the new TUC general-secretary, Victor Feather, who was formally appointed successor to retiring Gen.-Sec. George Woodcock, didn't see it that way:

"The TUC has never been and never will be something separate and apart from the unions, sitting in judgment on them," he said.

He described the unions as "independent, voluntary organizations" and the TUC as their "federal body" which seeks to influence them only by discussion, persuasion and agreement.

Following the government's decision to withdraw its proposals for trade union reform, TUC agreed to its own system of reform by accepting rules that would permit it to intervene in an attempt to resolve unauthorized strikes.

The TUC general council promised to conduct and investigate its organization and services in answer to complaints by white collar unionists that they are not adequately represented on the council.

TUC condemned the continued presence of Russian troops in Czechoslovakia but by the closest vote in its history rescinded its previous policy of banning contacts with organizations in the Warsaw Pact nations.

The vote was 3,971,000 in favor of rescinding the policy, and 3,969,000 against—a margin of only 2,000 votes out of the nearly 8 million cast by the delegates.

TUC's international committee had recommended upholding the policy but the margin against it was supplied by two big unions, the Transport & General Workers and the Amalgamated Engineers & Foundryworkers.

Spokesmen for the general council said after the voting that it was still unlikely that any major unions would actually re-establish contacts with groups behind the Iron Curtain.

No decision was taken by TUC on the proposal that Britain enter the European Common Market. It was announced that a special TUC session will be held at a later date to decide policy on this issue.

New Facts Turned Up On Haynsworth's Role

United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, urged the Senate to reject the nomination of Haynsworth both because of his anti-union and anti-civil rights decisions.

"Most of us farm workers are of the brown and black minority," Chavez wired the Senate.

"Today we are engaged in a bitter struggle to help ourselves and our families through the American self-help machinery of unionism.

"It is difficult, under the best of circumstances, to break the tradition of humiliation and frustration which results from social discrimination and to rise above the poverty that is inflicted through economic discrimination.

"Prejudice and animosity toward us is bad enough in its present form. It should not be represented on any judicial bench," Chavez urged.

The Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, a coalition of national civil rights, labor, religious and civic organizations, said in a letter to every senator that "the constitutional rights of millions of Americans will be less secure" if Haynsworth moves to the high court.

"In several landmark civil rights cases, Judge Haynsworth has been a spokesman for segregation," the conference charged.

In its letter, signed by Chairman Roy Wilkins, the conference noted that Haynsworth ruled on the side of Prince Edward County, Va., when it tried to abandon its public school system rather than integrate.

It said he upheld a school transfer program designed to thwart desegregation and defended discrimination against Negroes in federally-assisted hospitals.

"It is scarcely surprising that the Supreme Court has repudiated Judge Haynsworth's views over and over again," Wilkins wrote.

His confirmation, the leadership group warned, "will build into the Supreme Court for years to come further hindrances, further delays, further denials of constitutional rights and further racial alienation."

It would also "shake the confidence of millions of Americans in one primary source of law and order—the belief that the judicial process will produce justice."

Convention Pledges Support:

Transport Union Girds for Talks

By John R. Oravec

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The Transport Workers served notice on their employers that it will take major gains—not token improvements—to negotiate new contracts.

The nearly 400 delegates to the TWU's 13th constitutional convention pledged the union's full resources to back negotiators in forthcoming talks with the Penn Central railroad and the New York Transit Authority.

Pres. Matthew Guinan also stressed the need for public employes to have the right to strike as a bargaining weapon. This is vitally important if they are to gain economic justice, he said.

Guinan told the delegates that the TWU, in the four years since its last convention, won significant gains in contracts covering city passenger transportation, airlines, railroads, utilities, campus maintenance and the space industry.

The convention opened with a note of sadness as the delegates paid tribute to the union's founder —Michael J. Quill—who died in 1966.

Guinan promised the delegates that the union will continue to dedicate itself to the goals and principles of Quill.

Before passing a strong civil rights resolution, delegates heard Bayard Rustin charge the Nixon Administration with attempting to destroy unity in labor.

Rustin, executive director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, said the labor movement and the black movement are "on the doorstep of very serious problems."

He warned that the Administration is trying to put the blame on labor for the employment problems of black people. The job problems are not the blame of the building trades unions or the black militants as much as Pres. Nixon's decision to cut back the public works projects, he stated.

Rustin also charged that the Administration's fiscal policies would boost unemployment in an attempt to check inflation. When there is not adequate work, housing and medical aid, black rage grows and white fears increase, Rustin said. He called on the labor movement and black movement to work even more closely together.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland expressed concern for the Administration's drive to reopen tax loopholes for business which were cut down in the House-passed tax reform bill.

Kirkland suggested that the Administration's appointment of Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., as Associate Justice of the Supreme Court further reflects its anti-worker attitude.

Kirkland cited Haynsworth's long record of standing against progress in civil rights and against rights for trade unions.

Delegates reacted to Kirkland's message with the adoption of a resolution that calls for Pres. Nixon to recall the nomination of Haynsworth and for TWU members to strongly voice their opposition to confirmation by the Senate.

At the urging of the TWU's Air Transport Division, the convention called for a federal investigation of the mutual aid pact that air carriers have enforced during recent strikes.

It noted that during the American Air Lines strike earlier this year, the company received more than $5 million in economic aid from other carriers in the pact. The TWU charged that the pact's operations over the years "encouraged carriers to force strikes and has delayed good-faith bargaining."

The union also urged legislation requiring federally supervised training and licensing of flight attendants to insure greater safety for air line passengers and flight crews.

In other resolutions, the convention urged:

- Improvements in the Fair Labor Standards Act to increase the federal minimum wage from $1.60 to $2 an hour.
- Improvements in social security to increase benefits 50 percent and wider coverage under Medicare.
- Passage by Congress of stiff occupational health and safety legislation to encompass strong federal inspection, enforcement and penalty provisions.
- Extension of full labor relations rights to farm workers and federal minimum wage protection.

Chicago Building Trades Promote Job Opportunities for 4,000 Blacks

Chicago—The Chicago Building & Construction Trades Council is moving ahead with a four-point program to provide job and training opportunities for 4,000 more black workers in the city's construction industry.

The council announced it would open an office in Chicago's largely Negro South Side to proceed with the recruiting program despite rejection of the plan by the Coalition for United Community Action, made up of a number of black organizations in the city.

The plan was spelled out by construction unions and management in a series of negotiations with the coalition following demonstrations that closed projects here involving nearly $100 million.

The proposal, issued jointly by the Building & Construction Trades Council and the Building Construction Employers Association, offered to:

- "Endeavor to obtain employment at once" for 1,000 qualified black journeymen and asked the coalition to help recruit them.
- Find probationary employment for another 1,000 blacks with at least two years experience in a particular craft and assign them after 30 days to the equivalent of the apprenticeship rate applicable to their experience.
- Recruit 1,000 blacks with no previous training or experience for a one-month preparatory training period along the lines of the Outreach program to help them enter the existing apprenticeship programs of all crafts.
- Launch an on-the-job training program for 1,000 more Negroes who choose not to enter pre-apprenticeship training or who fail to pass the tests involved.

In full-page advertisements in Chicago newspapers, the employers and unions outlined their program and recited continuing efforts to attract black workers into the construction industry.

This is achieved through the Apprenticeship Information Center set up by the federal government and in cooperation with the Urban League under the Apprenticeship Outreach program, which has placed 459 apprentices over a 30-month period.

"We have organized bus trips for high school students to job sites," the union-industry statement said. "Want ads for skilled tradesmen are run daily. We have worked through social agencies in the black community and through the Illinois State Employment Service. We have done our best to alleviate the labor shortage in every way we know. Yet all these efforts have resulted in pitifully few black applicants—far fewer than the number we have been ready to accept into our ranks."

The Coalition for United Community Action, whose original demands were for employment of blacks eventually in 30 percent of all construction jobs, rejected the union-industry proposals as "unrealistic" and "totally unacceptable."

A spokesman for the coalition, the Rev. C. T. Vivian, indicated a central issue in the dispute was the control of hiring and training.

"We would not be in control of our own program, and we must reject it," Vivian was quoted by the Associated Press.

The union and industry negotiators advised the coalition that they would welcome its participation in dealing with recruiting, counseling and motivational problems but would not accede to demands that would put responsibility for hiring, training and construction "in inexperienced hands."

Thomas Murray, president of the Building Trades council, and Arthur O'Neil, president of the employers' association, both expressed disappointment that the coalition leaders had "summarily dismissed" the proposals. O'Neil called the plan a "breakthrough" that could add 25,000 skilled black craftsmen to the construction program in the city over the next five years.

The council said it has no hard and fast figures on the number of blacks currently in construction jobs, but estimated they account for 20 percent of the 50,000 to 60,000 peak workforce in the immediate Chicago area.

In developments elsewhere:

- The Black Construction Coalition in Pittsburgh withheld further job-site demonstrations as negotiations continued with construction employers and unions over a job and training program. The Pittsburgh plan differs in detail from the Chicago proposals, but contains similar provisions for recruiting and admitting black journeymen, for pre-apprenticeship programs and for on-the-job training. The AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights, through Dir. Donald Slaiman and Staff Rep. Robert McGlotten, provided advisory services both in Pittsburgh and Chicago.
- In Buffalo, the local building trades council, the contractors' association and the Minority Coalition signed an "affirmative action" agreement that provides for the training of 350 to 500 construction workers from the minority community in the first year. The agreement was negotiated under the auspices of the State University Construction Fund but will also apply to other area construction.

The plan also calls for the training of one worker from the minorities for each $1 million of estimated construction expenditures after the first year.

State funds will be provided for the recruitment and training programs, which envision four classifications—trainee, pre-apprenticeship, apprenticeship and journeyman trainee. Another training program for minority workers in the area, Project Justice, already has graduated 50 students who now hold journeymen's cards.

- In Philadelphia, Business Manager James L. Loughlin of the local Building & Construction Trades Council took sharp exception to frequently-quoted estimates showing a disproportionately low rate of minority employment in the various trades. Loughlin appeared before a Labor Dept. panel on the Philadelphia pilot plan announced by the department which would in effect set quotas for employment of minorities under government construction contract. He put total membership of unions in the council at about 36,000 and said a review of the individual crafts revealed that more than 11,000—over 30 percent—are blacks. Without considering the Laborers' union, which has a substantial proportion of Negro members, the remaining craft jurisdiction in the city includes about 12 percent black workers, he said.

AFTRA Leader Bud Collyer Dies

Greenwich, Conn.—Performers filled First Presbyterian Church here Sept. 11 in farewell tribute to Bud Collyer, radio and television star for 35 years and a union leader. He died at 61 of a circulatory ailment.

Collyer was president of the Television & Radio Artists in 1948-49 and 1957-58 and was a trustee of its pension and welfare fund from 1956 to 1969. Collyer also received the union's "gold card" award for his services to performers.

From 1938 to 1952, Collyer portrayed Superman over a radio network and worked on six other programs, including Truth or Consequences. His television shows included Break the Bank, Beat the Clock and To Tell the Truth.

Labor Presses for Probe Of Wages in Kentucky

Frankfort, Ky.—The Kentucky AFL-CIO has asked a court here to order John Young, the state's labor commissioner, to investigate low wages in Kentucky as the law requires him to do.

The suit, filed in Franklin Circuit Court, is in line with a statute calling for an investigation to determine if "any substantial number" of workers are receiving "oppressive and unreasonable wages" upon the petition of 50 or more residents.

In June 1968, the state federation called for just such a probe in a petition signed by 1,500 resident citizens. But Young still has not moved to set up new industry wage boards.

Commenting on the suit, the Kentucky Labor News noted that the state ranks 45th in per capita income and that it has a "pitiful" 65-cent an hour minimum wage.

Meany Aids Appeal For Cystic Fibrosis

A message of support for the work of the National Cystic Fibrosis Research Foundation on behalf of children suffering from serious lung diseases has been issued by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany.

"I am pleased to endorse the work" of the foundation, Meany said. "It is heartening to know that thousands of children with lung afflictions are being diagnosed and treated" in 110 regional centers.

End Poverty Wages

IN 1959 if a family of four earned less than $2,974 a year it was classified as poor. By that definition 22 percent of the nation lived in poverty.

In 1968 if the same family of four earned less than $3,553 a year it was classified as poor. By that definition 13 percent of the nation lived in poverty.

Obviously, removing 9 percent of a growing population from the poverty level over a nine-year period is a marked accomplishment. But in terms of America's wealth and potential, as well as its dedication to eradication of poverty and need, there's a great deal more to be done.

In formal terms the "war on poverty" was launched five years ago when Pres. Johnson signed the Economic Opportunity Act. In fact the war on poverty had been going on as long as trade unions and other social institutions fought to bring a decent standard of life to all Americans.

The basic tool in the union battle against poverty is a decent wage, nailed down initially in a contract with employers. From this grew the idea of legislation to establish a national minimum wage, a long grueling struggle that was finally won 30 years ago, with the payment in 1938 of a 25-cent-an-hour minimum wage.

Over the decades unions have succeeded in gaining for workers a fairer share of the wealth they help produce as well as increasing the national minimum wage floor to the present $1.60 an hour and spreading its coverage to millions of workers previously unprotected. But today the $1.60 an hour, if earned over a full year, produces less than the government-defined level of poverty.

IF PROGRESS in the fight to wipe out poverty is to continue, as a basic first step the minimum wage must be increased. The AFL-CIO is currently campaigning for a $2 an hour minimum with universal coverage.

Recognition of the failure of the current wage structure to deal with the problem of poverty has been coming, but slowly. It received a boost from nationally syndicated columnist Sylvia Porter who writes in a recent column:

"What is desperately needed is a profound change in attitude toward the compensation of workers in this country—so that the individual willing and able to produce a thing or perform a service which society considers necessary and valuable can count on earning a wage on which he can support himself and his family above the poverty line.

"Decades ago the United States made a national commitment to support by direct subsidies those too sick, too old, too handicapped to work to provide for themselves. Now new solutions must be found for the working poor."

The AFL-CIO has put together a program to aid the working poor and eliminate poverty in America. It is based on the simple principles that there must be work at decent wages for everyone who can work and decent incomes through updated social insurance and a modernized, humanized and federalized public welfare system for those who cannot work.

We cannot wait another nine years for the percentage of Americans living in poverty to drop 40 percent. There must be quickly adopted Miss Porter's recommendation that anyone willing and able to work deserves a wage "on which he can support himself and his family above the poverty line."

Muddy Boots

A Word Edgewise:

Nixon Rides Democratic Split To Bolster GOP for 1970 Vote

By John P. Roche

AS CONGRESSMEN, politicians, lobbyists, and journalists reassemble for the fall season, the Democrats seem—if possible—more atomized than they were after Hubert Humphrey's defeat. Initially, of course, they were cheered by the seeming closeness of the 1968 results; only gradually did they recognize that the narrowly elected Nixon represented a strong mandate, that in fact 57 percent of the electorate voted against the liberal Democrat.

Pres. Nixon has been consolidating that 57 percent in extremely effective fashion. If George Wallace can be disposed of, Democratic nominees for President can rack up 43, or even 49, percent of the votes for the rest of the 20th century and never set foot in the White House. Wallace's only excuse for living, in political terms, was to stimulate resistance to federal liberalism. Mr. Nixon's "southern strategy" is cannily designed to bring the Wallace states (which were Goldwater states) back into the big GOP tent.

As the President quietly consolidates his mandate, the Democrats are busy trying to whistle up a wind. I have gone to six or seven meetings and everywhere found the same atmosphere of simulated jubilation. There is a kind of group therapy aspect to it.

Party member A says "Nixon really killed himself with that Haynsworth nomination." B agrees and adds that the Negroes are furious about the Administration's neglect of urban problems. C, bubbling with good cheer, notes that the President has alienated the young and that Viet Nam will bring him down. This can go on for hours, with all hands finally reaching a crescendo of consensus: "Everyone is against Nixon!"

In politics (as elsewhere) the critical sign of intellectual bankruptcy is when one begins to believe his own press releases.

As I go from one of these victory parties to another, I keep asking the same questions. When I am told, for example, that Nixon has infuriated the blacks, I simply inquire how many votes has he lost? Moreover, I have yet to find anybody at one of these sessions who voted for Nixon in 1968 and will vote Democratic in 1972—nobody voted for him in 1968.

To say this is not to suggest that Kevin Phillips is correct when he asserts that structural factors in American politics are creating a permanent Republican majority. (His interesting book, "The Emerging Republican Majority," is reserved for separate treatment.) But it is clear to me that in September 1969, the GOP is riding high. And if the liberal Democrats remain in their optimistic trance, we are in great danger of being clobbered in the congressional elections next year.

TAKE VIET NAM as a case in point. The conventional wisdom seems to be that "time is running out on Nixon," that if he hasn't liquidated our commitment by 1972 (at the latest), he is a dead political duck. Excluding the merits of Viet Nam from consideration (that is, whether you agree or disagree with our policy there), the question is how can Viet Nam hurt Nixon? How can any Democrat, particularly a liberal, object? All the President has to do is start quoting Presidents Kennedy and Johnson and ask the American people what right any Democrat has even to talk about Viet Nam.

The place where the Republicans can really be hurt is the economy. A major recession would dispose of Phillips' "emerging Republican majority" faster than the Black Death. However, whatever Democratic advantage might result, we all have a vital interest in forestalling economic disaster.

There are some Republican zealots who think that the way to stop inflation is to add a million or two to the unemployed, but sober minds (recalling 1958) will probably keep that scenario in a maximum security safe.

In short, the Democrats are in deep, deep trouble, which is compounded by a leadership vacuum. Whatever the issues may be, and however they may break, you still can't beat somebody with nobody. I shall explore this leadership crisis at a later date.

IBEW Analysis Shows:

Land Costs and Interest Rates Chief Factors in Housing Costs

The following material appears in the September 1969 issue of The Electrical Workers World, monthly publication of the IBEW. The article, entitled "Balderdash," appears in the magazine's Dept. of Research & Education section.

CRITICS of construction unions, with their ease of access to mass communication media, have been extremely successful in conditioning the general public to believe that construction unions, through restrictive work practices, monopoly control of the work force, and high wages, are the primary cause of soaring housing costs.

Time and time again, these accusations have been refuted by knowledgeable and responsible persons from all areas of the society, but because of limited exposure, the truth has had little impact on the general public.

A recent study, prepared by McGraw-Hill for the President's Committee on Urban Housing, is the basis for an enlightening analysis of the relationships between the various components of monthly occupancy costs of a development-built, single-family house. The following presentation differs from the original McGraw-Hill presentation in that it is a more detailed analysis of the debt retirement and the assumed rate of interest is 8 percent instead of 6 percent, which was in effect at the time the study was originally prepared.

The unit analyzed in the McGraw-Hill study was chosen according to specifications of the President's Committee on Urban Housing. The costs shown in this study are the actual costs for a single location. Thus, such cost factors as land and taxes, in particular, may be significantly different in other locations.

The analysis was based on the construction of a one-story, wood-frame, ranch-style house built on a slab with a partial basement. Three bedrooms, a living room and dining room, plus a kitchen and bath account for 1,000 square feet of living area. This house is built on one-third of an acre and has city water, gas heat, and a septic system.

The McGraw-Hill analysts first studied the initial cost of construction and development and then prepared a second study, which included it with other costs essential to the occupancy of a house.

Initial construction costs are related to monthly occupancy costs in other ways, besides being a portion of debt retirement. For example, high-quality thermal insulation will increase initial costs but result in reduced heating and air-conditioning costs in the long run. Time and time again, this type of decision occurs in the design of a house. In each case, there is a trade-off of higher initial costs versus lower occupancy costs. The analysts, aware of this relationship, emphasized the broader and much more important monthly occupancy cost, which includes such absolutely essential factors as debt retirement, taxes, utilities, maintenance, and repairs.

Unfortunately, the McGraw-Hill study obscured the actual cost attributable to on-site labor by including it with the other four elements of development and construction costs, plus the cost of financing in a broad, general category of debt retirement. The principal objection to this method is that the addition of the financing costs imputes to labor a responsibility for the terms of financing, which is completely beyond its control.

The actual fact is that a 20 percent increase in labor costs is responsible, at the most, for about 4 percent in the increase of construction and development costs and less than 1 percent in the increase of monthly occupancy costs.

Conversely, a 20 percent reduction in wages or a 20 percent increase in productivity will decrease the cost of housing by only those same relatively-small amounts. Therefore, the critics are concentrating their efforts on an area which, at best, will produce only minimum efficiencies.

In fact if labor costs were entirely free, the monthly occupancy costs would still be $186.40, or only $7.60 less than the original $194.00.

The outstanding fact of this analysis is that the borrower will repay $40,320 on a $15,276 mortgage at 8 percent interest for 30 years. This is almost three times the cost of the house. The interest alone comes out to $25,044, or over one and one-half times the original cost of the house.

NEXT TO INTEREST RATES, local realty taxes are the largest single cost item. This area involves the complex political relationships and responsibilities of the local, state and federal government. Any effort to disturb the present balance, or more accurately imbalance, triggers a wide variety of hostile responses. The fact remains that realty taxes place an inequitable burden for the operation of local government on the home owner. The surest way to extend the opportunity of home ownership to a greater number of families is to decrease realty taxes.

Land represents the fastest-rising element of all major housing costs. In 1950, the average price for the site of a new, FHA-insured, one-family home was $1,035, or 12 percent of the total house price. By 1967, the average site value had increased to $3,766 and represented 20 percent of the total house price.

Ever-increasing upward pressure on land prices in the future is predictable, because land is a diminishing commodity; each year, the availability of the supply of usable land decreases. However, creative and imaginative public policy can conserve and effectively utilize this diminishing supply. These facts are not reflected in the McGraw-Hill analysis since, in order to comply with the specifications of the President's Committee on Urban Housing, the land costs were limited to $3,000 an acre.

This is a non-realistic restriction, because the only land available at this cost is located a considerable distance from the urban centers. Consequently, the land cost component in this study is not representative of the real market.

In summary, the unreasonable persistence of the intensive attack on construction labor costs defies explanation, when compared to the impact of the other cost components on monthly occupancy costs, unless ulterior motives are involved.

Accordingly, if ignorance is excluded, it can be safely assumed that these attacks are a direct attempt to influence public opinion and, thus, create conditions which weaken all of organized labor's bargaining position by limiting the effectiveness of construction unions.

Mishaps Peak in '68:

Stiff Federal Rail Safety Laws Held Key to Curbing Accidents

A RAIL UNION safety expert called for broader, tighter federal safety laws to roll back the mounting toll of train accidents that last year reached an all-time high.

"Ninety-five percent of all rail accidents are caused by factors not subject to federal control," said Al H. Chesser, national legislative director for the United Transportation Union.

Chesser, chairman of the committee on safety of the Railway Labor Executives' Association, is a member of the Task Force on Railroad Safety named by Transportation Sec. John A. Volpe.

Derailments, Chesser said, figured in most of the more than 8,000 reported train accidents last year that killed and injured nearly 27,000 employes and passengers.

Questioned by reporters on Labor News Conference, Chesser blamed the sagging railroad safety record on "too much deferred maintenance of track and roadbed . . . far too little inspection of equipment" and the use of "a great deal of old" and improperly maintained equipment that "just will not stand 70 mile-per-hour speeds."

CHESSER WARNED that under present conditions, the shipment of phosgene gas that is currently stirring hot public debate, "is absolutely unsafe."

"We think that if this gas must be shipped, it is much safer to ship it on the railroads than it is by air, or by truck on the highway, if the right precautions are taken," he added.

THE CONTINUING high level of violence in our national life has been one of the most—if not the most—distressing problems today for most Americans.

Several months ago the National Commission on the Causes and Prevention of Violence, which was established to study this precise problem, issued a new report on firearms.

The report received a good splash in the news media for a day or two and then faded away.

The commission, under the chairmanship of Dr. Milton Eisenhower, declared:

"After extensive study we find that the availability of guns contributes substantially to violence in American society. Firearms, particularly hand guns, facilitate the commission and increase the danger of the most violent crimes—assassination, murder, robbery and assaults."

Here are a few of the disturbing facts which the commission reported:

- There are an estimated 90 million firearms owned by private citizens.
- During the first half of the century, about 10 million firearms, on the average, were added to the civilian supply each 10 years but in the decade since 1958, 30 million guns have been added to the civilian stockpile.
- The sharp increase has been in hand guns which are not sporting or hunting guns.
- Extremist groups, both white and black, have been in the forefront of those exhorting their followers to buy guns and oppose any actions which restrict the use of them.
- Firearm accidents and violent crimes have risen sharply. Example: in Detroit between 1965 and 1968 homicides by guns increased 400 percent while homicides with other weapons were up 30 percent. In the United States, two out of every three homicides are committed with guns.
- Guns play an increasingly deadly role in aggravated assault and robbery. In 1968, 23 percent of all aggravated assaults were committed with guns compared with 13 percent in 1963.

A PRIME ARGUMENT advanced by the National Rifle Association and many individuals against any firm gun control problem is that it would deny the citizen the right to a gun for self protection at a time that the criminal is free to obtain a gun.

The commission examined this argument carefully and it concludes that:

"Since many owners keep their guns in the home for protection against intruders, it is important to assess, to the extent possible, the nature of the threat from intruders and the chances of gun owners to defend themselves successfully with their weapons.

"What is the nature of the threat in the home? The number of killings in the home by burglars and robbers is not large relative to the total number of homicides. Burglars usually try to avoid contact with the homeowners; they rely on stealth. . . . Studies in several cities indicate that killings in the home by robbers and burglars account for no more than 2 percent or 3 percent of all criminal homicides."

At the same time, a substantial number of the 23,000 annual firearms accidents take place in the home. The commission also found that of the 8,000 annual firearms deaths, a large percentage occur among family members or acquaintances and many of these occur in the home.

Just how Congress should seek to control firearms is a difficult and open issue. It is generally agreed that the Gun Control Act of 1968, while it does place some control on interstate shipments and imports of guns and restricts ownership by dangerous people, has not met the problem.

But the commission report should not be disregarded. It faces the issue squarely. The next step is up to both the President and the Congress.

BROADER, TIGHTER federal safety laws are the key to curbing the mounting toll of train accidents that reached an all-time high last year, Al H. Chesser, center, national legislative director of the United Transportation Union, said on Labor News Conference. The program is broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EDT, on Mutual radio. Chesser was questioned by Neil Gilbride, left, of the Associated Press and Stanley Levey of Scripps-Howard.

CREDIT MAY LOOK EASY, but soaring interest rates and abuses in lending add to the squeeze on the American consumer.

Abuses of Consumers Slip by Protective Laws

The highest interest rates since the Civil War and other problems still confront the U.S. consumer despite a "decade of accelerated activity" in his behalf, Sidney Margolius writes in the September issue of the American Federationist.

Margolius, author of several books and a widely-read weekly newspaper column on consumer affairs, cites consumer credit, food prices, auto insurance and utility rates as prime targets for improvement.

Consumer credit, Margolius says, is the area in which the greatest recent improvements have been made. "But credit practices are still so wasteful and deceptive," he says, "that it also is the area of most urgent need for further reform."

Truth-in-lending, requiring disclosure of true annual interest rates, is the major achievement, Margolius says, but unfortunately it does not reduce interest rates. And at present high interest rates are biting into such vital U.S. programs as loans for college students, Margolius notes.

Specific abuses which Margolius says should be removed include the "holder-in-due-course" doctrine which enables finance companies to escape responsibility for lack of performance by the seller; the seller's right to repossess and also get a deficiency judgment; subsequent garnishment to collect the deficiency judgment and high-priced life and health insurance required for the duration of the loan.

These accompanying insurance policies are providing 35 percent of the total profit for the nation's 37 top finance companies and banks, Margolius points out.

Food prices have soared 5.5 percent in the past year, the author says. Most of the cost has been added by processing and distribution which are now getting 60 cents of each consumer dollar while the farmer is getting 38 to 40 cents.

One result of the "hard-sell" on food products is the irrational method of packaging, in which Margolius cites such sizes as 5.25 ounces and the "classic" 71 different sizes of potato chips.

Truth-in-packaging did cut those potato chip sizes from 71 to 48, but White House consumer adviser Virginia Knauer noted recently that there are still no regulations to control slack fill, cents-off labeling, size standards and labeling of ingredients.

The author calls for a solution through "unit pricing," which requires the seller to spell out the price per pound, ounce, pint or other standard measure. In this area, Margolius says the most progress has been made in New York City where "a surprisingly knowledgeable Consumer Commissioner, former Miss America Bess Myerson Grant, is moving toward a pioneering requirement of unit pricing of some packaged goods."

Auto insurance has received intense attention, the article points out, with concentration on arbitrary cancellations of policies and premium increases which often sail through state regulatory agencies without being questioned. In several states, labor and credit unions are exploiting group buying as a way to reduce auto insurance costs.

Sen. Lee Metcalf (D-Mont.) is trying to get Congress to establish a utility consumers' counsel, Margolius says. At present, utility companies "are represented by phalanxes of experts, completely outmanning state commission staffs" on rate increases.

Margolius sees some hopeful signs in consumer affairs, including the appointment of Mrs. Knauer and her stand on fat content in frankfurters and other issues.

Some innovative state legislation is also encouraging, Margolius says. These include the licensing of home improvement salesmen in Michigan, the 12 percent retail credit ceiling in Washington and court injunctions barring deceptive practices on auto repair and furnace installations in Rhode Island.

Bakers Name DeConcini to Succeed Sims

John DeConcini has been named secretary-treasurer of the American Bakery & Confectionery Workers, succeeding Curtis R. Sims who has resigned. The change was effective Sept. 1.

DeConcini, executive vice president of the ABC since it was founded in 1958, was chosen by the union's executive board to complete Sims's term, which is subject to election at the union's convention next year. The board approved a retirement pension for Sims.

The board named Vice Pres. Joseph G. Kane of Elmonth, N.Y., to complete DeConcini's unexpired term as executive vice president, Kenneth F. McLellan of Stoneham, Mass., was chosen to fill out Kane's term.

The union also announced that "in the light of Sims more than 36 years of service to workers in the bakery and confectionery industries," the board has conferred upon him the title of secretary-treasurer emeritus.

A Growing Program:

Union Scholarships Enable Hundreds to Attend College

Hundreds of students are starting college this year with financial help from ever-broadening scholarship programs of AFL-CIO affiliates.

International and local unions and central bodies have established programs ranging from relatively modest grants to approximately full tuition costs. Some scholarships are granted without regard to union membership; others are reserved for members and their sons and daughters.

The Service Employes announced winners of 10 scholarships worth $500 a year for four years. The awards are made annually to children of SEIU members on the basis of high school records and college entrance board tests.

Pioneer Program

SEIU Local 32B awarded $4,800 scholarships to four children of members in the New York City area. It is one of the oldest union scholarship programs in the nation, going back to 1940. Winners in 1969 are: Nancy Astudillo, Jean Kelly, Irene Sawchyn and Allen Tannenbaum.

Ladies Garment Workers Local 190 has granted $2,400 scholarships to five children of workers in the knitgoods industry in the Philadelphia area. They went to Darlene Szablewski, Leonard Pfeffer, Larissa Kitenko, Kathleen Ledva and Joan Evansho.

Top winner of a $2,000 scholarship is Betty Jean Justen of Astoria. Martha Lamb, Medford, and Lynnda Marie Nunn, Scappoose, received $600 each. Prizes of $300 went to Kenna Diane Narkaus, Astoria, and Christina Kuettner, Lake Oswego.

The Washington State AFL-CIO awarded two $500 scholarships to winners of the annual Evan M. Weston Scholarship Contest, honoring the late president of the federation. Winners are Bonnie G. Cardwell, Spokane, and David L. Warren, Seattle.

Newspaper Guild Elects Perlik as New President

Charles A. Perlik, Jr., has been elected president of the Newspaper Guild by a vote of 7,455 to 5,367 over Brian Flores, administrative officer of the Washington-Baltimore Guild, in a membership referendum.

Perlik, 45, ANG secretary-treasurer since 1955, becomes the union's first paid president in its 35-year history. Delegates to the 1969 convention made the presidency a full-time paid post and abolished the title of executive vice president—a post currently held by William J. Farson, who is retiring.

James B. Woods of St. Louis, incumbent president, will become international chairman when title changes take effect Oct. 15.

Elected with Perlik were Robert Crocker, Maine State House correspondent for the Associated Press, as secretary-treasurer, and their slate of six vice presidents at large —incumbents James G. McMahon, Detroit; Barney Peterson, San Francisco; Harry E. Ryan, New York City, and these new officers: James Young of Vancouver, B.C.; Joseph B. Downey, Boston, and John C. Edgington, Columbus, O.

Crocker won, 7,026 to 5,481, over John Ned Sweet, secretary of the San Antonio, Tex., Guild.

A proposal to raise ANG defense fund assessments from 3 percent of weekly earnings per month to 4 percent was defeated, 7,881 to 5,091.

In contests for regional vice presidencies, winners were Joe Holt Anderson, Jr., Washington, D.C. and Glen Ogilvie, Toronto, Ont., both incumbents; Edward J. Schrode, Wilkes-Barre, Pa., and George McCormick, Minneapolis. McCormick defeated Vice Pres. Noel Wical, Cleveland, by a vote of 1,312 to 1,270.

At ATU's 40th Convention:

Mass Transit Called Cities' Prime Need

New York—Government, labor and industry leaders addressing the Amalgamated Transit Union's 40th convention here were in complete agreement on one point—development of urban mass transit is essential to curing the ills of America's cities.

Traffic and transportation problems, and what to do about them, were the subjects of addresses delivered by Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller, Mayor John V. Lindsay, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland, and a number of transit experts.

Pres. John M. Elliott reported on the union's progress since its 1967 convention in New Orleans, collective bargaining and organizing efforts and the union's exact-fare program.

The Transit Union was successful in getting an exact-fare requirement in Washington in June 1968 to protect drivers from thefts and other crimes. Management at first fought the proposal. It now is hailed by employers and has spread to 40 cities, Elliott noted.

The convention approved an increase in the union's per capita dues from $2.40 to $2.65 a month. The hike was called for by Elliott as essential to meeting the union's ever-mounting cost of doing business.

The 400 delegates re-elected Elliott, Executive Vice Pres. Edward W. Oliver, and other incumbent officers, including James J. Hill, who was appointed secretary-treasurer when O. J. Mischo, retired last December.

Newly elected vice presidents are John F. Healy, Springfield, Mass.; James Lasala, New Brunswick, N.J.; and Ivey G. Smith, Raleigh, N.C.

"Our city streets are jammed; our freeways are clogged; parking is expensive; our interstate highway system is only 70 percent complete," Kirkland told the convention.

"Safe, high-speed mass transit systems are imperative," Kirkland said.

He pointed out that the AFL-CIO through its Dept. of Urban Affairs is trying to help in "focusing" on transit and other city needs. But, he emphasized, the main need is for mass transit to get a higher priority on the agenda of city, state and federal governments.

Rockefeller said that transit between the city and its suburbs is directly tied in with the "jobs problem." The jobs have moved to the suburbs in many cases, he explained, while large concentrations of the unemployed still live in the city.

Lindsay, who addressed the opening session of the convention, said the funds called for by Pres. Nixon in his mass transit bill now before Congress are "totally inadequate."

New York City taxpayers, he said, are putting almost $1 billion a year into a budget for mass transportation; the state "is putting in a little more than half of that; and the federal government is putting in almost nothing."

Asst. Sec. of Labor William Usery praised the Transit Union's ability in preserving collective bargaining rights for its members where switches from private to government ownership of transit systems are being made.

North Carolina Elects New State Officers

Raleigh, N. C.—The North Carolina AFL-CIO elected a new president at its 12th annual convention and amended the constitution to reinstitute the office of secretary-treasurer, eliminated seven years ago.

At the final convention session in Wrightsville Beach, Wilbur Hobby was installed as president and James Hart of the Communications Workers, Burlington, as secretary-treasureer and state COPE chairman.

Hobby had resigned his post as COPE area director late in August to run against W. M. Barbee, state federation president and secretary-treasurer. Hart was elected to the state COPE chairmanship to succeed Bob Brown.

Hobby is a former president of the Durham AFL-CIO and former editor of the Durham Labor News. He is a member of the Newspaper Guild and the Tobacco Workers.

52 Teacher Strikes Usher In School Year

The 1969-70 school year got under way with teachers on strike for better wages and conditions in 52 school districts—13 of them represented by the AFL-CIO Teachers.

By week's end, settlements had reduced the number of struck districts to 10 for the AFT but strike votes have been scheduled in some other areas where contract talks were deadlocked.

The emphasis on economic action shifted this year from big-city districts to suburban and small-town districts. Union settlements were reached without strike action in Chicago, Pittsburgh, Wilmington, Del., Butte, Mont., and Duluth.

AFT strikes kept classrooms teacherless in Superior, Wis., Waukegan, Ill., New Britain, Conn., East Detroit and Hamtramck, Mich., and smaller districts in Michigan and Illinois.

The National Education Association, which once scorned strikes as "unprofessional," reported that on opening day, 10,650 teacher members and 319,750 pupils were affected by NEA work stoppages in 13 states. Early settlements reduced those figures to 18 strikes affecting 4,315 teachers and 130,000 pupils in six states.

Tennessee Strike in 3rd Week

The first strike of the school year, called Aug. 18 in Lawrence County, Tenn., was still unsettled in its third week. The school year starts early in that school district.

In Michigan, NEA teachers are still affected by eight strikes and one lockout, with teachers in 103 school districts back at work without a contract—10 of them by court order.

Other NEA strikes persist in New London and Norwalk, Conn., Aliquippa and three other Pennsylvania districts, New Bedford, Mass., and Whiting, Ind.

Among major settlements for the AFT was an 18-month agreement between the Pittsburgh Federation of Teachers and the school board. It provides for salary increases ranging from $1,100 a year at the beginning bachelor's-degree step to $2,200 at the master's degree maximum in 11 steps.

Salary hikes come in three installments, with a range of $7,600 to $12,600 a year by next September. With improved fringe benefits, the city's 3,400 teachers will divide a $7.75 million package of benefits under the contract.

In Duluth, union and board negotiators reached agreement at 5 a.m. on the day of a strike deadline. The one-year contract raises the starting salary from $6,100 a year to $6,700 and the master's degree to $12,900 in 11 steps. Also agreed to is a guaranteed duty-free lunch period and class preparation periods.

In Chicago, City Council averted a strike by agreeing to give the schools the increased allocations called for by a contract agreement reached last spring.

Machinists Win Major Gains At Beech Shops

Wichita, Kan.—Machinists in four Beech Aircraft plants voted to end a four-week strike and return to work with major contract gains for 6,200 employes.

The strikers voted by an 88 percent margin to accept improved terms after having rejected three previous company offers. They are members of IAM locals in Wichita, Liberal, and Salina, Kan., and in Boulder, Colo.

IAM District 70 officers said the new three-year pact raises Beech employes from an average base rate of $3.26 an hour to at least $3.78, with those in higher classifications getting more.

A wage inequity fund of 2 cents per payroll hour worked will be used to bring employes with substandard rates up to the industry standard. In addition. the contract provides an improved progression system to bring workers to the top of their classification faster than the old contract.

Monthly pension benefits will be raised to $5 per year of service now, rising to $5.50 in 1971.

The contract provides 30 days of accumulated sick leave; severance pay equivalent to half of unused sick leave; hospital care insurance at $44 a day, rising annually with any rise in hospital rates; improved surgical and life coverage; and a 10th paid holiday, to be added to any weekend after 30 days' notice.

For the first time, safety matters are covered by the grievance procedure ending in arbitration and pay checks will be distributed on company time, another first for Beech, the union said.

Election Role Stressed By Connecticut Unions

New Haven—The Connecticut State AFL-CIO, with membership at an all-time high, plans to play an even bigger role in future local, state and national election campaigns, officers reported to state convention delegates.

Pres. John J. Driscoll told 680 delegates that the state labor council is preparing to assemble membership lists of all affiliated unions by data processing for use in registration and get-out-the-vote drives.

The convention gave National COPE Dir. Al Barkan a standing ovation for his speech reviewing the lessons learned in the 1968 elections and urging an even more comprehensive COPE campaign for 1970.

Delegates urged the Senate to reject the nomination of Appeals Court Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., of Greenville, S. C., to the Supreme Court because of his involvement in an apparent conflict of interest.

They called for federal action to roll back the banks' prime interest rate on loans to 6 percent.

In other resolutions, they asked that postal employes be granted "real collective bargaining" rights and called for modernization of the postal system without setting up a public-type corporation to run it.

The delegates also voted to press for a minimum wage of at least $2 an hour and for 1 million federal service jobs as one means of fighting poverty and reducing unemployment.

Driscoll and other top officers were re-elected without opposition for new two-year terms. They include Sec.-Treas. Joseph C. Bober, Executive Vice Pres. Leonard B. Kershner and Executive Sec. George Froehlich.

The only election contests resulted in the return of Everett Shaw and Spencer Johnson of the State, County & Municipal Employes to the executive board. These new board members also were elected: Dante J. Bertolini, New Haven AFL-CIO; George Chandler, New London AFL-CIO; Frederick Macari, Waterbury AFL-CIO; Curtis Godell, Danbury AFL-CIO; Frank Gencarella, Textile Workers Union of America; Justin Ostro, Machinists; Emerico Perlini and John Gregori, Steelworkers; James Whitewood, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; Louis Santoianni, Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers; Robert Petronella. Meat Cutters, and Charles Greenberg, Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union.

arrangement whose terms management promptly violated by firing more union sympathizers.

"This company and the community have used tactics reminiscent of another century in their efforts to intimidate the workers, harass and frustrate the union and break the organizing drive," the state body said.

"Injunctions have been issued against the union and its members, strikers have been fined and jailed, pickets run over by the autos of supervisors and hospitalized."

State Circuit Judge Kenneth Ingram, an appointee of former Gov. George Wallace, set a $75,000 bond for the release of Albert DeLoach, president of UTW Local 201 at Childersburg, Ala., and assigned by the international union to help Elastic employes organize.

DeLoach was charged with violating an injunction issued by the court. A union attorney appealed to the Alabama Supreme Court, which lowered the bail to $20,000 pending a later hearing on the union's appeal of the bond. DeLoach was then freed.

The issue is important enough, the union believes, to justify further appeal to higher courts if that should be necessary. The issue involves the right of a court to make a defendant's release conditional on "good" behavior by every company employe, the attorney said.

Two union pickets were hospitalized Aug. 15 and three others were injured less seriously when two supervisors drove rapidly through a union picket line at the plant.

The incident was the second in recent months in Alabama strikes, state AFL-CIO Pres. Barney Weeks said. Six months ago a member of the Iron Workers was hospitalized and was under treatment until recently, Weeks said.

The Elastic plant in Columbiana makes webbing and supports for clothing manufacturers. Employes tried to organize a year or more ago but the attempt was smashed when management "ruthlessly fired" organizing leaders, Weeks reported.

Clement J. Lemon Dies in Delaware

Wilmington, Del. — Clement J. Lemon, first and only president of the Delaware AFL-CIO, died here at 64 of a heart attack. He was buried after services Sept. 10 at St. Matthew's Catholic Church in Woodcrest, Del.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland said in a message of sympathy to Mrs. Helen Lemon and their five children that Lemon "served all his fellow workers with diligence and devotion" and was an outstanding leader.

Lemon served as head of the state AFL before the merger of AFL and CIO state bodies in 1957, and also as president of the Wilmington Building & Construction Trades Council. A member of Bricklayers Local 1 for 37 years, he was its business agent for 14 years.

Construction Drop Continues:

Lag in Job Growth Points to Slowdown

reached early last winter.

Jobless rates for adult men (2.1 percent), married men (1.5 percent), women (3.8 percent), and teenagers (12.5 percent) were virtually unchanged in August.

The rate for full-time workers was 3.1 percent for the fourth straight month. The rate for part-time workers remained unchanged from July at 6.8 percent.

Jobless rates for both white and Negro workers were unchanged in August, and the two-to-one ratio between black and white rates continued as it has for the past several years.

In fact, the gap has widened slightly this year. The white unemployment rate in August was 3.2 percent, up from 2.9 percent in February; while the rate for blacks was 6.5 percent, compared with 5.7 percent in February.

On the jobs side, most manufacturing industries showed little or no change in August. The only sizable increases were in primary metals and electrical equipment. Employment dropped in the apparel industry.

Employment in contract construction was down by about 45,000 from July and 95,000 over the past two months. Since June, the unemployment rate has risen from 5 to 7.4 percent.

"Both of these developments primarily reflect significant declines in housing starts," BLS said.

Payroll employment in services increased by 55,000 in August, following a four-month period in which the increase averaged only 5,000 a month, compared with a 65,000 average monthly increase over the prior five months.

Sales Force Employment Rises

Employment in wholesale and retail trade increased by 30,000 and state and local government rose by 20,000 in August. Federal government jobs were down by 25,000, marking the fifth drop in the past six months.

BLS announced that the number of persons who want full-time non-farm jobs but are employed only part time "for economic reasons" rose by 200,000 in August to 2.3 million, "the highest level since early 1967."

The civilian labor force in August stood at 81.1 million seasonally adjusted, about 300,000 above July. It was up about 600,000 over the year.

In another area, the Labor Dept. reported that average hourly earnings for rank-and-file workers were unchanged in August at $3.04. Due to a longer workweek, average weekly earnings rose by 61 cents to $116.43.

The seasonally adjusted average workweek edged up one-tenth of an hour to 37.9 hours after five consecutive months without change. For manufacturing, the workweek was down one-tenth of an hour to 40.6 hours. Factory overtime averaged 3.6 hours a week, unchanged for the third consecutive month.

AFL-CIO Backs Bill to Allow Consumer Suits

Passage of a bill to allow consumers to join together in federal court suits would bring "more effective protection of consumer rights," the AFL-CIO told Congress.

Support for the proposal, known as the Class Action Jurisdiction Act, was expressed in a letter from AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller to Sen. Joseph D. Tydings (D-Md.). He is chairman of a Senate subcommittee handling the bill.

The legislation spells out the power of federal courts to handle class actions when violations of federal consumer law are involved, as well as establishing federal court jurisdiction involving violations of state consumer statutes.

"Class actions," Biemiller pointed out, "are potentially a highly effective method of redressing grievances of groups of consumers who have been victimized by the same seller or lender."

Further, he noted, "the costs for a single consumer to seek redress of a grievance through an individual suit are almost always prohibitive."

Biemiller also stressed that procedures in many state courts "are so restrictive that consumer class action suits are virtually impossible" whereas federal court procedures could be better adapted to this type of suit.

'You Got a Slice, Too!'

Organizers' Guess Hits Mark on Voting

A team of AFL-CIO and Rubber Workers organizers hit it on the nose when they predicted between 195 and 212 votes for the union in a representation election at the Loma Plastics Co., Fort Worth, Tex.

The actual vote was 206-81 for the union.

The close prediction was cited as an example of the thoroughness of the organizing effort by URW Organization Dir. Robert L. Hill in a letter thanking AFL-CIO Regional Dir. Nicholas Kurko for the assistance of the federation's staff.

Labor Asks Direct Election Of President

proved the amendment for direct election of the President, it rejected two alternative proposals:

One was a system which would divide each state into districts and the candidate carrying a district would receive one electoral vote.

The other would divide each state's electoral votes in proportion to the popular vote in that state.

In his testimony, Meany noted that under the "district" system, John F. Kennedy would have lost the Presidency to Nixon in 1960 by 33 electoral votes although Kennedy polled the most popular votes.

The House Committee also scored the "proportional" system in its report spelling out its reasons for supporting the direct, popular election amendment.

The committee said that all of the alternatives it considered and rejected left open the possibility of "election of a President who is not the first choice of the voters."

Even so, conservatives planned a push on the House floor for alternatives about the same as those rejected by the committee.

In his letter, Biemiller stressed that the need for electoral reform "has long been apparent" and the committee-approved amendment "will make sure that the candidates who receive the most popular votes will be elected."

The amendment, he added, will "operate effectively to prevent the multiplicity of candidates that some people fear will be encouraged to enter the race under a direct popular vote system."

As for the alternatives, he concluded: "Such proposals, in our judgment, would only make the present unsatisfactory system much worse."

Building Trades Score 75% Construction Cut

own vast unused land, and the zooming cost of materials are far more important factors in the inflation situation," he said, "than the wages of building tradesmen, which in most cases scarcely cover the increase in their cost of living."

The building trades leader also warned that the cutback could stifle efforts to recruit and train more Negroes for construction jobs.

"If we don't have the work for them, we can't very well put them on and train them," he said.

Haggerty dismissed an attack on the construction unions by Carl M. Halvorson, president of the Associated General Contractors, who termed the Nixon order "an expression of frustration in the face of 'union-created inflation' in the building industry" and called on Congress to restrict union wage settlements and practices.

Halvorson has been "signally unsuccessful," Haggerty said, "in his innumerable attempts to turn the construction industry anti-union" and now wants Congress "to undertake the job for him."

He blamed Halvorson for the AGC's withdrawal from the Construction Industry Joint Conference, the vehicle set up to discuss and resolve labor-management problems in the industry. Halvorson, Haggerty said, also was largely responsible for the AGC's refusal to take part in development of procedures to expand minority employment in construction jobs under the model cities program.

Nixon, in announcing the cutback, warned states and cities that unless they followed the federal example with voluntary reductions of their own construction plans, he would order further restrictions on federal grants to aid such projects.

The President also:

- Urged private industry to postpone construction projects "that are not immediately essential."
- Directed the Secretaries of Labor and of Health, Education & Welfare to develop manpower training and vocational education programs "to achieve a major increase in needed skilled labor for the construction industry."
- Set up a Cabinet Committee on Construction to appraise the nation's construction needs, the industry's problems, and the impact of federal activities.

Dr. Arthur F. Burns, counselor to the President, estimated that the cutback would reduce federal construction contracts by about $1.6 billion in this fiscal year, but that actual spending would drop only $300 million because of the lag between the signing of contracts and expenditures.

If states and cities reduce their construction plans in the same proportion, he said, this could mean a reduction of about $4.5 billion in federal grants for jointly financed projects and an actual budget saving of $700 million this fiscal year.

But Burns conceded that states and cities are unlikely to go that far in their own cutbacks.

College Study With Pay Won In SEIU Pact

Providence—Rhode Island social workers will be paid while taking graduate studies under a new contract negotiated by Service Employes Local 580 with Gov. Frank Licht.

The agreement also provides substantial pay increases, a modified union shop and third-party arbitration procedures.

It permits social workers of the Division of Public Assistance up to 20 days of educational leave a year when they take graduate training toward a master's degree in social work at an accredited school.

Workers granted such leave will receive full pay and benefits plus one-half of the actual tuition at the graduate school.

The union security section specifies that all new Rhode Island social workers shall become and remain Service Employe members as a condition of employment and present members shall retain their membership.

Meany Scores Haynsworth On Ethics, Hostile Rulings

House Backs Direct Vote Amendment

The House voted to amend the Constitution to allow the American people to elect their President by direct, popular vote.

The proposed constitutional amendment won by 339-70, more than the required two-thirds majority. Before it takes effect, however, it must be passed by two-thirds of the Senate and then ratified by 38 of the 50 states.

Before approving the labor-backed direct election plan, the House rejected a series of substitutes that would have retained the chief drawback of the antiquated Electoral College system—the possibility that a candidate who received fewer votes than his opponent could be elected President.

Conservatives sought unsuccessfully to substitute a district plan, which would have allocated one electoral vote to the popular vote winner in each congressional district and two to the candidate who carries the state.

As opponents pointed out, this would distort the electoral vote even more than the present system under which the winning candidate statewide takes all of a state's electoral votes. In 1960, it would have elected Richard M. Nixon over John F. Kennedy.

The district plan, whose chief sponsor was conservative Rep. John Dowdy (D-Tex.), was beaten on a 245-162 rollcall vote.

Also rejected was the "proportional" plan supported by Pres. Nixon as having the best chance of ratification by the states. It would have allocated a state's electoral votes among the candidates in pro-

Top Officials Set to Speak At Convention

Three members of Pres. Nixon's Cabinet have accepted invitations to address the eighth convention of the AFL-CIO opening Oct. 2 in Atlantic City, N.J., Federation Pres. George Meany announced.

Due to the demands of his official schedule, the President had to decline an invitation to address the expected 1,000 delegates, Meany said.

Presenting the Administration's views will be Labor Sec. George P. Shultz, Defense Sec. Melvin R. Laird and Sec. of State William R. Rogers.

Charges Nixon Retreat:

Rights Unit Assails Desegregation Lag

The Nixon Administration was accused by the U.S. Civil Rights Commission of "a major retreat in the struggle to achieve meaningful school desegregation."

The charge and other sharp criticisms were included in a unanimous report and an accompanying statement by the six-member commission.

Meanwhile, Negro elected officials meeting in Washington declared that the Administration is "at war with itself" over civil rights and "doing little or nothing" about problems that concern black Americans.

The Administration made no direct reply to the commission's report. However, Sec. of Health, Education & Welfare Robert H. Finch defended its actions at the meeting of Negro officials.

The commission accused the Administration of "slackening" efforts toward school desegregation by de-emphasizing cutoffs of federal funds for recalcitrant school districts in favor of court enforcements.

"Court orders to desegregate," the commission said, "have not generally been as effective a means of desegregating . . . schools as administrative proceedings backed by the threat of a fund cutoff."

One reason for this, the commission pointed out, is that federal judges in the South have been "unsympathetic" to eliminating segregation and "insensitive" to the orders coming down from higher courts and the requirements of Congress.

The report cited six cases in

Asks Senate To Reject Nomination

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany charged at a Senate hearing that Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., lacks the ethical standards required of a Supreme Court justice.

Haynsworth demonstrated his unfitness, Meany said, by sitting as a judge in a case that posed a clear conflict of interest—based on his long-standing business relationship with a textile chain accused of illegal union-busting tactics.

That's the "most important" reason the Senate should refuse to confirm Haynsworth, Meany told the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Haynsworth's nomination also should be rejected, Meany said, because his decisions as an appellate court judge show him to be anti-labor and hostile to civil rights for Negroes.

On the latter charge, Meany associated the AFL-CIO with a documented criticism of Haynsworth's decisions made by the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights. These showed the South Carolina judge upholding efforts by southern states to evade desegregation until overruled by the Supreme Court.

Meany submitted to the committee an analysis by AFL-CIO attorneys of controversial labor cases in which Haynsworth participated.

He said Haynsworth's record in labor cases demonstrated "insensitivity to the needs and aspirations of workers and to the plight of unorganized employes working for

Bakery Unions Agree On Plans for Merger

A merger agreement has been unanimously approved by the executive boards of the AFL-CIO American Bakery & Confectionery Workers and the Bakery & Confectionery Workers, the unions announced.

ABC Pres. Daniel E. Conway and B&C Pres. Max Kralstein worked out merger terms and submitted them to members of the two boards. Approval of the terms was voted by the B&C board Sept. 9 and the ABC board two days later.

Merger would heal a breach existing since 1957, when AFL-CIO convention delegates voted to expel B&C on grounds of domination by corrupt interests. The leadership that existed at that time is no longer in office.

The merged organization would have more than 150,000 members in some 266 local unions and would be affiliated with

House Bill Asks 50% Social Security Hike

Legislation designed to virtually wipe out poverty among the nation's elderly by raising total social security benefits at least 50 percent by 1974 has been introduced in Congress.

The measure, initially sponsored by Rep. Jacob H. Gilbert (D-N.Y.) of the House Ways & Means Committee, drew immediate support from the AFL-CIO and the National Council of Senior Citizens.

In explaining his bill at a press conference and on the House floor, Gilbert termed it "the most comprehensive social security bill ever submitted to Congress."

He pointed particularly to its increase in minimum benefits that "will place nearly all beneficiaries above the poverty level," general increases in benefits and "substantial" improvements in Medicare.

Meanwhile, Pres. Nixon announced that he will send a request for a 10 percent increase in social security benefits to Congress next week. That is 3 percent more than he had previously proposed.

Nixon made the announcement in signing a bill extending a federal support program for local projects that employ older Americans. He which southern federal judges have shown a "pro-segregation bias," adding that in some cases there appeared to be "a flagrant violation of judicial ethics."

In addition, the commission declared, "it is more difficult, under current law, to enforce a school board's compliance with a court order than it is to enforce by withholding federal funds. . . ."

The statement noted that when Atty. Gen. John N. Mitchell announced the new reliance on court procedures in July he said he wanted the nation to "watch what he did rather than focus on what he said."

"It is with this in mind," the commission continued, "that we find ourselves especially disheartened" by recent actions of HEW and the Justice Dept. in Mississippi, South Carolina and Alabama.

"For the first time since the Supreme Court ordered schools desegregated," the commission observed, the government has actually requested a "slowdown" in desegregation by asking a federal court to postpone desegregation in 30 Mississippi districts.

In South Carolina and Alabama, "the government took other action to delay desegregation," the statement added.

"Certainly," it concluded, "those who have placed their faith in the processes of law cannot be encouraged."

The commission rebuked the Administration for using statistics that give "an overly optimistic, misleading and inaccurate picture of the scope of desegregation" in schools.

The report noted that the Administration listed 2,994 school districts as "completely desegregated" but failed to mention at least 1,018 of these had no black students.

A more accurate measure, the report said, would be to point out that only one-eighth—114—of 914 districts in the seven most "resistant" states have been desegregated.

The commissioners voiced strong fears that even the "limited gains" made to date in school desegregation would be reversed if Congress passes an amendment sponsored by Rep. Jamie L. Whitten (D-Miss.)

As tacked on to a House-passed school appropriation bill, it would prevent cutoff of federal aid to school districts that refuse to comply with desegregation orders.

The commission recalled that the Administration took no position on the amendment in the House even though it was urged to do so. Just as the commission's report came out, Finch said the Administration would oppose the amendment in the Senate.

The Rev. Theodore M. Hesburgh, president of Notre Dame University and the commission's chairman, released the report and read the statement at a news conference. The statement was signed by Commissioners Stephen Horn, Mrs. Frankie Muse Freeman, Hector P. Garcia, Maurice B. Mitchell and Robert S. Rankin.

Horn, a Republican, agreed with the commission's statement but also appended one of his own charging that the Johnson Administration had allowed more delays in school desegregation than the Nixon Administration, 67 compared to 51.

More than 300 Negro office holders concluded a three-day meeting of the Institute for Black Elected Officials by adopting a statement that read:

"The major issue that emerged is that the Administration is at war with itself over the urgent civil rights questions. It is inconsistent and contradictory.

"It has done little or nothing about poverty, school desegregation and other problems. In saying this, we are reflecting the concern of all black Americans, Democrats and Republicans alike."

Finch appeared on a panel at the meeting and defended the Administration's reliance on courts to get desegregation by predicting there would be more integration of schools in the next two years than there has been in the past 15 years.

He released a report showing that the proportion of Negro students in desegregated schools in the South had risen from 20 to more than 33 percent in the past year.

The report conceded that most of the progress made this year was under the policies established by the Johnson Administration but added that "momentum was maintained since Jan. 20."

Iowa Delegates Set Campaign On Legislation

Waterloo, Iowa—The annual convention of the Iowa AFL-CIO set its sights on an intensive 1970 effort to get labor-supported bills out of committee and enacted by the state legislature.

The convention, with 350 delegates from 250 affiliated unions attending, approved officers' reports calling on all Iowa members to lobby for labor's legislative program with state senators and representatives well in advance of the next session.

Most labor bills have been pigeonholed, Pres. Hugh D. Clark and Sec.-Treas. James J. Wengert reported. The 1968 convention had adopted a program that included improved state safety standards, state minimum wages and consumer protection laws.

The delegates re-elected the two top officers, dropped the office of executive vice president from the constitution, named two new vice presidents to the state board, and chose Sioux City as the locale of the 1970 convention. The new board members are Gilbert Schevers of the Steelworkers, Keokuk, and Fred Nolting of the Meat Cutters, Waterloo.

The officers reminded the convention that monthly per capita payments will rise to 23 cents next Jan. 1, and the state body will start printing a monthly newspaper next August by mandate of the 1968 convention.

Speakers included Vice Pres. Robert K. Garrity of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL-CIO Dir. of Organization William L. Kircher, Executive Dir. William R. Hutton of the National Council of Senior Citizens, George Kourpias, grand lodge representative of the Machinists, and Gov. Robert D. Ray (R).

Astronaut Armstrong Saluted by Musicians

Wapokoneta, Ohio — Astronaut Neil Armstrong, who plays five instruments, became an honorary member of the Musicians here at a home-coming celebration.

New Phone System Set for AFL-CIO

Effective Monday, Sept. 22, the AFL-CIO Headquarters building will convert to a new "centrex" telephone system that will permit direct dialing to all staff personnel as well as to the building itself.

The new AFL-CIO number as of that date will be 293-5000. The area code, of course, will remain 202.

The new number for the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education (COPE) will be 293-5101.

Stereotypers Vote to Push Merger Talks

Detroit — The Stereotypers & Electrotypers voted at their convention here to continue merger talks with the Printing Pressmen and to send several proposed constitutional changes to referendum.

About 135 delegates from 78 locals and 200 guests heard reports of progress on meetings of two-union merger committees, held here the week before the convention opened. After debate, the delegates voted 301-86 to continue seeking agreement on merger terms for final submission to a referendum vote of the membership.

Agreeing on details "turned out to be a bigger job than we expected," said Stereotypers Pres. James H. Sampson. Jurisdiction is a key issue, and the committees from both unions will meet again shortly to resume negotiations, according to Sec.-Treas. Frank G. Creamer.

Sampson told the convention that both he and Pres. Anthony J. DeAndrade of the Pressmen addressed the committee sessions and encouraged members to continue their deliberations.

The Stereotypers have held two membership votes on merger in recent years but fell slightly short of the required two-thirds majority —first on merger with the Lithographers & Photoengravers, then last December with the Pressmen. Two conventions have now acted to authorize continued negotiations.

The most recent convention approved proposals to reduce the apprenticeship training period from six years to four, to increase the convention expense fund, and to change the constitution to provide for a merger convention. All must be ratified by membership vote.

Demands Repeal:

Transport Union Hits Taylor Law

By John R. Oravec

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The Transport Workers called for an early special session of the New York state legislature to repeal the Taylor Law that stifles the rights of public employes.

The enforcement of the Taylor Law could be a major factor should a dispute arise in coming negotiations between the union and the New York City Transit Authority. The TWU represents 36,000 bus and subway workers.

A resolution at the TWU's 13th convention here labeled the law harsh and repressive, observing that it violates the safeguards in the state's constitution that "employes shall have the right to organize and to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing."

Delegates further urged the enactment of a Magna Charta for public workers "granting them the same freedom to settle their disputes with governmental agencies as do employes in private industry."

The convention re-elected Pres. Matthew Guinan, Sec.-Treas. Douglas L. MacMahon and Executive Vice Pres. James F. Horst to new four-year terms. Guinan, an AFL-CIO vice president, succeeded the late Michael J. Quill in 1966.

Four new vice presidents were elected to the union's executive council which was expanded from 12 to 14 members. The new vice presidents are John J. O'Connell, Timothy Cronin and Charles Faulding, all of New York City, and William Redford of Miami.

Delegates also elected 17 new members of the TWU executive board, which was enlarged by two seats to 31. The new members fill vacancies caused by deaths and retirements, in addition to the two new seats.

Per capita dues were increased from $1.50 a month to $2 to cover increased costs of operations.

Rep. Claude D. Pepper (D-Fla.) alerted delegates to the battle pro-labor candidates face in the 1970 elections. He warned that the Republican party is massing a huge war chest in a campaign to take over control of Congress.

Pepper said that this drive is part of a concerted effort by anti-labor forces to elect congressmen and senators who would adopt national legislation detrimental to unions and social progress.

COPE Dir. Al Barkan of the AFL-CIO and Pres. Raymond Corbett of the New York State AFL-CIO also emphasized the importance of labor's role in electing candidates friendly to the trade union movement.

Among the 40 resolutions adopted by the convention, delegates called for:

- A reduction of the workweek in the mass transit and utilities industry to 32 hours because of increased productivity and technological advances.
- Federal manpower legislation to eliminate unemployment and under employment.
- Reorganization of the unemployment compensation system to extend coverage to some 16 million workers now excluded from the benefits—including 2.3 million employes of non-profit religious, charitable and educational institutions.
- Improvements in pensions and retirement benefits of railroad workers under the Railroad Retirement Act.
- Establishment of a $40,000 scholarship fund to honor Quill, the TWU's founder. The scholarship would be awarded to children and dependents of TWU members.

Bakery Unions Agree to Plan For Merger

the AFL-CIO and the Canadian Labor Congress.

Conway has headed the ABC since its chartering by AFL-CIO as a successor organization. The merger announcement said:

"We now await the action of the B&C convention" to start Oct. 6 in Miami Beach. "Should that convention endorse the action of its executive board, the ABC and B&C will each call separate special conventions to be held simultaneously in the same city."

Following the separate conventions, a merger convention will be held. Delegates will "proceed to adopt the agreement to merge and the constitution, and elect the necessary officers of the merged organization."

CONTRIBUTIONS POUR IN at the Transport Workers convention in Bal Harbour, Fla., to aid the 1,000 members of the Machinists who were locked out of their jobs by National Airlines eight months ago. The TWU delegates raised $804 in the appeal on the convention floor and the union's executive board added more money to round out the total contribution at $1,000.

Labor Backs Measure:

House Bill Asks 50% Social Security Hike

did not elaborate on his announcement except to say he would ask that benefit increases be effective Apr. 1, 1970.

The need for "substantially" raising the general level of social security benefits, Gilbert said, "becomes very clear to everyone who looks at the low level of present benefits and considers the fact that most beneficiaries have very little other income."

"The bill recognizes for the first time," he added, "that the elderly have a right to live their declining years in dignity and in reasonable comfort."

Under the bill the minimum social security benefit would be increased by 87 percent, going from its present level of $55 a month to $80 in January 1970, to $90 in January 1972, and to $103 in January 1974.

Other benefits would be raised by 10 percent, 12 percent and 14 percent over the same three steps. Benefits for dependents and survivors would be increased proportionately.

For the first time there would be cost-of-living protection under social security, with benefits automatically adjusted annually for each 1 percent increase in the cost of living beginning in 1975.

The medical insurance part of Medicare, now paid for partly by the retiree, would be financed through contributions paid during the beneficiary's working years, in the same way hospital insurance is now financed.

The present insurance coverage under Medicare would be expanded to include the cost of prescription drugs, and the entire program would be extended to include persons under-65 who are receiving disability benefits under social security. These provisions would take effect in January 1972.

Gilbert cited these other provisions:

- The maximum lump-sum death payment would be raised from $255 to $500, effective in January 1970.
- The amount of earnings a person can have in a year and still get a full social security benefit would be increased from the present $1,680 to $1,800, effective in January 1970.
- Improvements in widows' benefits; higher benefits for those who retire under the Social Security Act before age 65; permitting a retiree's benefits to be based upon his highest 10 years' earnings out of any 15 consecutive years after 1950; reduction of the disability benefit waiting period from six months to three.

The bill would increase the contribution base (earnings on which social security taxes are paid) from $7,800 to $15,000 in three steps between 1970 and 1974. There is a provision for automatic adjustments beginning in 1976.

An important feature of the bill would bring the government in on helping to finance social security. The present employer-employe paid program would become tripartite with the federal contribution increasing until it paid for one-third of the total cost in 1980.

Gilbert stressed that actuaries have studied his bill and found it to be "financially sound." He pointed out that increased costs would be more than offset by a strengthened economy and savings on relief programs for the elderly.

AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman described Gilbert's bill as being "completely in line with the recommendations on social security adopted by the AFL-CIO convention in 1967."

The measure's "strong improvements" in social security benefits and Medicare, he said, "would have the effect of all but wiping out poverty among elderly citizens and assure them of decent health care."

"The bill contains goals the AFL-CIO has long sought and we intend to work with the elderly and other groups in securing its passage," Seidman declared.

Pres. Nelson H. Cruikshank of the National Council of Senior Citizens termed the bill's provisions "bold, imaginative and even daring—worthy of an America that is accustomed to thinking big."

Pointing out that the legislation is along the lines of a program advocated by the council convention earlier this year, he said, "I know that I can pledge you the full support of our organization."

Labor Dept. Lists Value Of Union Contracts in $$

What is a union contract worth to the average worker?

In 1966, according to the Labor Dept., it was worth $1.14 an hour or about $2,371 a year.

That was the difference in the average hourly compensation of non-office workers in establishments with union contracts and those without union contracts.

The dollar difference is almost certainly greater now, but the 1966 data was the latest available when the Bureau of Labor Statistics published its report on "Employe Compensation in the Private Nonfarm Economy."

Part of the difference was in the basic straight-time wage rates.

The average union worker made $2.62 an hour at the time of the survey, as compared to $1.88 an hour in non-union employment.

But the union worker also got substantially more vacation time, holidays, pension benefits, health insurance and other fringe benefits.

That brought his total hourly compensation—the amount the employer pays out on his behalf—to $3.37 an hour. For the worker without a union contract, the comparable figure was only $2.23 an hour.

Since the union worker puts in fewer hours on the job because of his longer vacations and added holidays the difference is even greater when measured in terms of total compensation per hour actually worked. The Labor Dept. figures for that category boost the union differential to $1.29 an hour more than the non-union worker.

CLOTHING WORKERS MEMBERS numbering more than 1,000, picketed R. H. Macy's in New York for more than an hour to protest the sale of suits made in Japan under substandard wages and working conditions. ACWA Vice Presidents Louis Hollander, right, and Vincent Lacapria lead the line.

Nixon Urged To Help Curb Cloth Imports

Four AFL-CIO unions have joined in urging Pres. Nixon to press for an agreement with Japan regulating the importation of Japanese textiles and apparel into the United States.

The Clothing Workers, Ladies' Garment Workers, Textile Workers Union of America and United Textile Workers warned that 2.5 million jobs are being threatened by the rising tide of such imports.

In an advertisement in the Washington Post, the unions said, "We urge our government to talk hard facts and cool common sense with our friends from Japan.

"There is no need to ban imports. There is no need to impose prohibitive tariffs. There is a need for international agreements to regulate the flow of textile and apparel imports."

The four unions also have agreed to cooperate in a "Save Our Jobs" campaign in which they will picket stores throughout the nation that sell Japanese products made under inferior wage and working conditions.

In a development growing out of the campaign, the Clothing Workers' joint board in Chicago filed suit in U.S. District Court there to require four Chicago newspapers to accept full-page advertisements, which were refused.

The board attempted to place the ads to explain why its members are picketing Marshall Field & Co. in downtown Chicago. The department store is one of the nation's largest importers of men's and boys' apparel.

The union, which has been picketing the store since early in August, has resorted to handbills and even the use of an airplane towing a banner to state its position.

Ralph Smith Fills Dirksen Vacancy

The Republican speaker of the Illinois House, Ralph T. Smith, has been appointed to the U.S. Senate seat vacated by the recent death of Everett M. Dirksen.

Gov. Richard Ogilvie (R) named Smith after State Atty. Gen. William J. Scott said he didn't want the job. The appointment runs only through 1970. In the 1970 general election, Illinois voters will choose a senator to serve out the four years that will then remain of Dirksen's term.

Farm Union Dedicates Building to Roy Reuther

Delano, Calif.—The AFL-CIO United Farm Workers dedicated their new headquarters building here in memory of the late Roy L. Reuther with a call to California grape growers to "come in brotherhood to the bargaining table."

Several thousand grape pickers and union supporters from across the nation stood in the blazing sun of the San Joaquin valley while the Rev. Mark Day conducted a dedication service on the floor of a flatbed truck.

"We bless this building," he said, "in the spirit of brotherhood and dedicate it to the memory of Roy Reuther, who fought for human rights and social justice all his life." The workers shouted "Viva—Viva Roy Reuther."

A message from AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to UFWOC Dir. Cesar Chavez called the occasion "a demonstration that unionism on the farms is here to stay. Certainly you and your fellow agricultural workers are traveling a difficult road, but I am confident this struggle to build a better life for farm workers and their families through trade unions will be successful."

Meany said the union, in naming its new headquarters, had chosen well because "Roy Reuther's life exemplified the spirit of trade union brotherhood. He believed in and practised the principles of trade union solidarity and unity."

Grower Donates Site

The hall was built at the edge of a 40-acre field about a mile outside the Delano city limits. The land was donated to the Farm Workers by a sympathetic grower, and California building trades unions donated their labor.

The Auto Workers donated $50,000 for the building in keeping with a promise by Pres. Walter P. Reuther, brother of Roy, before the UAW disaffiliated from the AFL-CIO. He attended the ceremony here with his wife and Alan Reuther, teen-age son of Roy.

Chavez paid tribute to Roy Reuther as a "brother who understood our struggle." The most honored position in life "is the position of helping your brother," he said.

The new building, Chavez said, "will be a beehive of activity in organizing and the best ray of hope for the American farm worker."

"We are convinced," he declared, "that if there was no labor movement today the country would go to hell in nothing flat. Imagine what the Wallaces and Reagans would do if there was no labor movement to hold them in check."

Chavez expressed thanks for the thousands of manhours of work contributed by building craftsmen. He gave credit to Local 11 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Los Angeles; Carpenters Local 743 from Bakersfield, Calif.; Painters Local 127, Oakland; the Carpet & Linoleum Workers Local 1247, Los Angeles, and many others.

Clive Knowles of the California Council of Carpenters, an early organizer of field hands in the 1930s, called for continued support from all workers to bring justice to the farm union.

Following the dedication, a gaily-decked mariache band led the crowd to the center of Memorial Park in Delano for a Mexican folk music concert and more speeches. In the park, Pres. Harry Van Arsdale of the New York City Central Labor Council announced that his central body, which just donated another $1,000 to the farm workers, would step up its support of the nationwide union boycott of struck California table grapes.

H. H. Seavey Dies, Region 13 Staffer

Minneapolis — Funeral services were held here Sept. 18 for Harold H. Seavey, assistant director of AFL-CIO Region 13, who died a few days earlier at 63.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland, in a message of sympathy to Mrs. Helen Seavey and their children, called Seavey "a loyal and devoted trade unionist" who "had an outstanding record" of service to union members in his region, comprising Minnesota, North Dakota and South Dakota.

Seavey was a member of the Teamsters and secretary-treasurer of the National Conference of Federal, State & Municipal Drivers when he was appointed to the national AFL staff in 1946. He had served since the AFL-CIO merger as assistant to the regional director, now Carl Winn.

The New Critics

THE HARSH NOTE of destructiveness that marks the right-wing assaults on the trade union movement is predictable, unlike the Alice-in-Wonderland quality of some of the analysis that surfaces occasionally from the left.

The attack from the right on the AFL-CIO for leading the fight for organization of farm workers and exposing the nation's conscience to the grape boycott grows apace; labor's leading role in the struggle for tax reform and tax justice draws fire in Congress as does the AFL-CIO struggle to block the confirmation of Judge Haynsworth to the Supreme Court.

Against this background The Nation magazine in a recent issue, raises the question of the validity of the labor movement and its role. Characteristic of the articles is one that claims to set the current climate with the comment: "More pay for less work is still the touchstone of union policy, without too much concern for anything else."

In this vein the article wanders along, charting what it sees as the errant course of the labor movement, commenting that the whole problem is compounded by "the relative paucity in recent years of news and comment about labor's policies and actions." It is some time since much attention has been paid "to the ambiguities of basic union policy, and the public has had little opportunity to affect the formulation of such policies."

If, as the article asserts, the touchstone of union policy is more pay for less work, and nothing more, why the concern? Where are the "ambiguities?"

But the reasoning is not quite finished yet. It goes on finally to pose the formula that "it will be the unions' own attitude toward public and candid disclosure of their internal affairs that will indicate most clearly which side they are on."

The last phrase is, of course, the title of a venerated union song and the thrust of The Nation articles is that the unions are no longer on the side of the workers.

THERE ARE, OF COURSE, other views. Writing in the September issue of the Monthly Labor Review, published by the U.S. Dept. of Labor, economist and labor historian Philip Taft takes a look back to the first Labor Days and concludes that "attitudes toward labor's objectives have not changed appreciably despite the recruitment of millions of semi-skilled and unskilled workers into the ranks." The goal as expressed by Samuel Gompers as "more and more," implies, says Taft "that the American economy offered opportunities for continual improvements of the life of the wage earner. . . . Gompers' view continues to dominate the outlook and tactics of the organized workers of the United States irrespective of their affiliation, and is in fact held by those who prefer to call their organizations social unions."

Helping the man or woman who works for wages or a salary to "make it," improving the quality of American life, defending and expanding freedom and democracy—that's what the trade union movement is all about and there has never been a question as to which side it's on, only what's new on the other side and who has joined them lately.

A Word Edgewise:

Ho Chi Minh's 'Father' Image Tainted by Binge of Executions

By John P. Roche

THE DEATH OF HO CHI MINH has touched off a lot of absurd rhetoric. One congressman suggested he was the Vietnamese equivalent of George Washington and Abraham Lincoln, while a favorite description leaned heavily on the word "mystic."

As far as Ho's mysticism was concerned, I am not prepared to argue—provided those who use the term would also apply it to Adolf Hitler, Sirhan Sirhan, and the organizers of the Spanish Inquisition.

However, I do find the analogy with George Washington and Abraham Lincoln too much to take. Without for a second denying Ho Chi Minh's dedication, courage, and strategic genius, the stark fact is that he became the "Father of His Country" by murdering the other candidates. The Stalinists pre-empted the cause of Vietnamese nationalism by their ruthless willingness to destroy non-Communist competition, particularly Marxist revolutionaries who rejected Moscow.

If George Washington had operated differently, he might have been a model for Ho. If, for example, in 1765, Patrick Henry had been found dead in a ditch with a bullet hole in the back of his neck; and in 1767 Thomas Jefferson had been found hanging from a barn rafter, an apparent suicide; and in 1771, John Adams had been found drowned in Boston harbor; and in 1775, Alexander Hamilton and James Madison—on their way to a secret meeting at Mt. Vernon—had been captured by the British—if our colonial history had been highlighted by such incidents, George Washington could have been an excellent preceptor of Ho Chi Minh.

For this was the basis of Ho's "mystical" commitment to Vietnamese nationalism. It was brought home vividly to me a few years ago when a friend introduced me to a Vietnamese who was on the lam from everybody.

At that point in time, both Ho Chi Minh and Pres. Diem had a price on this man's head. He was an authentic Vietnamese nationalist, a one-time leader of the Cao Dai resistance to the French in the Mekong delta. His story was incredible—but verifiably true.

In early 1947, after Ho broke with the French, the top leadership of the Viet Minh (which then had substantial non-Communist forces) was allegedly called to a meeting near Hanoi. The word came to Dr. Xuan (a pseudonym) and he set out on the long, dangerous journey.

Shortly before he reached the secret meeting place, French security agents seized him. French intelligence officers told him he had been betrayed by the Communists and tried to get him to sing. He thought it was a trick, refused to reveal anything even under torture, and was sentenced to death.

On the day of his execution, a French officer appeared with a squad of Senegalese. The French officer looked at him and suddenly called him by his real name. They had been classmates and friends at the famed Ecole Polytechnique in Paris.

THE OFFICER instructed him quickly: "Everything is chaotic around here; we will march you down towards the place of execution. When we reach a certain corner I will distract the soldiers and you take off. Good luck."

To make a long story short, he escaped, and keeping what the French intelligence officers had told him in mind, made no contact with the Viet Minh.

Later in Paris he met others who told him there had been no meeting, that he had been deliberately led into a trap. One of those who had set the stage was now himself a refugee from Gen. Giap's secret police (Giap was then Minister of the Interior); he had been denounced as a "Trotskyite."

The best estimates are that in 1946-47 about 10,000 key non-Stalinist Vietnamese nationalists were murdered. When it came to being the Father of His Country, Ho Chi Minh took no chances on paternity suits. And what makes the New Left acclaim for "Uncle Ho" savagely ironic is that they are precisely the sort of undisciplined, unreliable, talky types who were featured on the execution lists as "Trotskyites." In pragmatic terms, however, one has to hand it to Ho: after 1947, he had very little trouble with his intellectuals.

Workers, Negroes to Suffer:

Haynsworth Nomination Aims For 'Jim Crow' Constitutionality

By Bayard Rustin

THE NOMINATION of Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., to the Supreme Court indicates Pres. Nixon's intention to restore the doctrine of "separate but equal" to the courts and to the life of this nation. In one of the low points in our country's history, the Supreme Court sanctioned "separate but equal" in 1896 in the Plessy v. Furguson decision. The court struck down this doctrine in the famous Brown decision of 1954, and in the process it helped initiate a period of great social change.

By nominating Haynsworth, currently the chief judge of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit, Nixon has expressed his desire to halt that change and turn back the clock three quarters of a century. At the same time, he would like to recreate the Supreme Court of the 1920s whose conservatism on civil rights was equaled only by its hostility to labor unions.

Haynsworth's record on civil rights explains the enthusiasm with which Senators Eastland and Thurmond reacted to his nomination. In 1963 he supported Virginia's policy of massive resistance to the 1954 Supreme Court decision by refusing to shift to federal courts a suit by Negro parents demanding the re-opening of schools in Prince Edward County. The schools had been closed by white parents to block integration. In the New Kent County, Virginia, case in 1967, he upheld the "freedom of choice" plan even though the plan has been used by southern school districts to stall the process of desegregation.

The Supreme Court subsequently reversed Haynsworth's views in both of these decisions, as well as in two other decisions involving school integration. He also supported a transfer plan used by white parents in Charlottesville, Va., to remove their children from schools undergoing desegregation.

In a 1963 case involving the receipt of federal funds by a hospital in Greensboro, N.C., Haynsworth dissented from the majority which ruled that the hospital could not exclude Negroes. Haynsworth's long and involuted argument denying the applicability of the 14th Amendment could not disguise his clear and consistent intent to uphold the constitutionality of Jim Crow.

If Haynsworth's southern origins have influenced his views on civil rights, his involvement early in his career in business corporations has helped shape his anti-labor views. He has supported management in labor disputes as consistently as he has sided with segregationist school boards against Negro parents. Twice he sided with southern textile mill owners in cases involving collective bargaining rights for workers, and both times he was over-ruled by the Supreme Court.

IN ONE of these cases, Haynsworth cast the deciding vote in a decision invalidating claims of unfair labor practices made by the National Labor Relations Board against the Darlington Manufacturing Co. The NLRB contended that the company had closed a plant to avoid a union election and had failed to provide any compensation for the workers left unemployed.

It has since been revealed that at the time of this decision, Haynsworth held stock in Carolina-Vend-A-Matic which did business with the parent corporation of the Darlington textile firm. Since a conflict of interest caused Justice Fortas to step down from the court, it is entirely improper that his place should now be filled by a man guilty of a similar indiscretion.

It is possible that Haynsworth shall not fill the Fortas chair if sufficient opposition can be aroused. The civil rights and the labor movements are now fully united to prevent his confirmation by the Senate, and it is absolutely essential that citizens support these efforts. This can be done by each person writing to the two senators from his state urging that they vote against the appointment of Haynsworth. In fact, a telegram might even be in order, for the issues at stake are the direction of the Supreme Court, the welfare of Negroes and workers, and in a very real sense, the future of this nation.

To Fulfill Promise:

Government-Created Jobs Held Key to Decreasing Relief Rolls

THE ADMINISTRATION needs a campaign of job-creation as well as job training to keep its pledge to "get people off the relief rolls and onto payrolls" from being an empty promise, manpower expert Julius Rothman declared.

Rothman, president of the AFL-CIO-created Human Resources Development Institute, pointed out that if "all the able-bodied men . . . and 10 percent of the mothers" on welfare were trained, "you already have almost a quarter of a million jobs to find for them."

Rothman appeared on the public affairs interview, Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EDT, on the Mutual Broadcasting System. The Human Resources Development Institute is a non-profit corporation founded by the AFL-CIO to help support existing manpower programs and develop new ones.

He said the HRDI's efforts are "primarily aimed at the hard-core unemployed and young people . . . the groups that get left behind." He said that these people can be brought into useful, productive employment, if there is enough determination to do it.

Rothman also said that HRDI's network of manpower representatives across the nation was set up to support existing manpower programs, and "that is exactly what we are doing."

He described the institute's "buddy" system through which experienced union workers are trained to team up on a volunteer basis with new employes to help them "make the adjustment to plant routine and to their fellow workers."

He pointed to the institute's work with CAMPS —the Cooperative Area Manpower Planning System of the Labor Dept.—to plan manpower programs on the local level. He cited cooperation with Model Cities programs in establishing manpower training.

"During World War II," Rothman noted, "when we needed manpower, we made almost every person—regardless of his or her handicaps, physical or otherwise—productive people, in one way or another."

"WE CAN DO that again," he declared.

He renewed the AFL-CIO's call for "public service employment" as an "appropriate area for job-creation," and make it possible for people so employed to "ultimately . . . swing into the private sector."

"We have talked for a long time in this country about the declining quality of life . . . that public services aren't what they once were," he said. He said that public service employment would "give people work—meaningful work—and on the other hand, raise the quality of life" through the expansion of recreation facilities and other projects that would benefit all Americans.

Rothman said that Pres. Nixon's idea of reorganizing manpower programs to eliminate overlap is a "good one" but only if it is coupled with proposals to create more jobs.

This is necessary, he explained, because the public and private sectors of the economy cannot completely meet the manpower needs of a rapidly growing nation.

Congress must enact manpower legislation that has "job-creation mechanism" as an integral part, Rothman stated.

Without job-creation provisions, legislation "won't serve the needs adequately" no matter how much it consolidates and coordinates existing programs, he concluded, adding: "And that is what is missing in the Administration's program."

Reporters questioning Rothman were Robert Walters, of the Washington Evening Star and Sam Sharkey of the Newhouse Newspapers.

OF ALL THE PROBLEMS that concern the country these days one of the most frightening and perplexing is related to drugs.

And compounding the problem is that the federal government is doing relatively little about it; nor is it even providing any solid facts.

It is not that the Administration is unaware of the magnitude of the problem. In July, Pres. Nixon, in his message to the Congress on "The Drug Problem," pointed out:

"Between the years of 1960 and 1967 juvenile arrests involving the use of drugs rose by almost 800 percent; half of those now being arrested for the illicit use of narcotics are under 21 years of age. New York City alone has records of some 40,000 heroin addicts, and the number rises from 7,000 to 9,000 a year."

This, as the message stresses, is "only the tip of an iceberg whose dimensions we can only surmise."

The Administration forwarded to the Congress what it described as a "comprehensive" bill to control drug abuse and narcotic addiction. On close examination, however, the proposals appear to be little more than a codification of existing statutes concerning law enforcement.

What is apparent, however, is that the intake of drugs by young people has gone far beyond law enforcement, that as the President says, it has grown "from essentially a local police problem into a serious threat to the personal health and safety of millions of Americans."

Action in the drug abuse field has moved to Capitol Hill where both Houses of Congress are seriously studying it.

In the Senate, the Special Subcommittee on Alcoholism and Narcotics of the Senate Labor Committee, has been conducting public hearings under the chairmanship of Sen. Harold E. Hughes (D-Iowa).

The House Select Committee on Crime, under Rep. Claude D. Pepper (D-Fla.), also has held hearings.

Both chairmen are concerned about the inaction and absence of facts.

Said Hughes:

"Everywhere in America, parents are sick and scared about the exposure of their sons and daughters to the illicit use of drugs. It is a national nightmare.

"But the strangest and most frustrating phenomenon of all is that while our private fears about the drug problem reach a fever pitch, our action to meet it on the government level is pitifully token and wrong-footed.

"Our solution to correct what we have been doing that is wrong seems to be simply 'more of the same'. . . . We know more about the craters on Mars than we know about the drug problem."

Said Pepper:

"I have personally talked to many experts on this subject, including doctors, psychologists and psychiatrists, academicians, law enforcement officers and people from the young community.

"EACH OF THEM has expressed astonishment that the federal government has taken an ostrich-like approach to the problem and has been more inclined to ignore the issues than to discuss them."

Following his first series of hearings, Pepper wrote to the Surgeon General requesting him to prepare and issue a public report on the use and effects of marijuana. He said that such an inquiry should be along the lines of the now famous Surgeon General's report on cigarette smoking issued three years ago.

The Florida congressman posed 11 questions for the Surgeon General, largely dealing with seeking answers to the physical and psychological effects of marijuana, questions that no government agency has ever attempted to answer.

Hughes is seeking facts, too.

"I am not plugging for any particular program or approach to the drug problem. I am simply pleading for public recognition of the magnitude of the problem and the mess we have made of handling it so far. I am pleading that we take sensible action about it—before it is too late."

TO FULFILL ITS PLEDGE to "get people off the relief rolls and onto payrolls," the Administration needs a two-pronged attack of job-creation and job training, Julius Rothman, president of the AFL-CIO's Human Resources Development Institute, declared on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Sam Sharkey, left, of the Newhouse Newspapers and Robert Walters of the Washington Evening Star.

Union Protest Put to Music In Met Walkout

New York—To shouts of "Bravo" and enthusiastic applause, several hundred New Yorkers cheered a concert of union musicians and performers outside Lincoln Center that dramatized their dispute with the New York Metropolitan Opera.

Choristers and soloists of the Musical Artists boomed out the words of Giuseppe Verdi's opera "Aida" and waved picket signs protesting a lockout by the Met while members of the Musicians played the "Triumphal March."

The audience hailed the early afternoon performance given the day the Met was to open its 1969-70 season.

Negotiations have been deadlocked for some time between the Met management and the Musical Artists, who represent most of the opera performers. And the management has held little discussion with the other unions involved—the Musicians, Theatrical Stage Employes and the Service Employes.

The unions are attempting to win major wage improvements for their members to make up for the erosion of contract gains over the past five years caused by the soaring cost of living. Some of the unions had agreed to pacts with terms as long as five years to allow for easing the relocation of the Met from the Metropolitan Opera House to Lincoln Center.

Because of the impasse in negotiations, the opera association has already postponed the opening of the Met four weeks to Oct. 13.

While the Met management has made offers to the Musicians, Pres. Max Arons of AFM Local 802 has charged that the opera company "has never tried to negotiate with its musical staff. Instead it has always threatened to close the house. They have finally succeeded."

Arons further stated that the management has gone to unprecedented lengths "to starve them into submission, even seeking to deny them unemployment benefits."

Payments to performers have been cut off because the Met challenged a ruling by the New York State Division of Unemployment which had earlier found the performers eligible for benefits. A state referee is now restudying the performers' eligibility.

The bargaining deadlock centers on wages, hours, rehearsal rates and various grievances.

The on-again, off-again discussions between the unions and the Met were recessed earlier in September and may resume this week.

New York Mayor John V. Lindsay has appointed lawyer David L. Cole as mediator in an effort to bring the Met and the unions together for meaningful talks.

Clement Dowler Joins COPE Staff

Clement D. Dowler has been named area COPE director for the region comprising Georgia, Kentucky, North and South Carolina and Virginia, COPE Dir. Al Barkan announced. Dowler succeeds Wilbur Hobby, who was recently elected president of the North Carolina AFL-CIO.

Dowler, 45, was associate director of the Senior Aides program for the National Council of Senior Citizens until his appointment. Born in Parkersburg, W. Va., he served with an Air Force bomber crew in World War II on leave from an electrician's job at American Viscose Corp. Since then he served as business agent of his local union, international representative for the Textile Workers Union of America, and director of a TWUA joint board in Spray, N.C.

MARCHING MEMBERS of North Carolina unions turned out 12,000 strong in historic walk from Raleigh's Memorial Auditorium to state capitol to demonstrate for union wages and protest Carolina Power & Light Co. award of $681 million construction contract to non-union Brown & Root Co. March united black, white and Lumbee Indian members of craft and industrial unions.

12,000 Join in March Against Non-Union Jobs

Raleigh, N.C.—About 12,000 union members marched 25 abreast down Raleigh's main street here in an unprecedented demonstration of trade union solidarity in support of union-won wages, standards and working conditions.

Building tradesmen marched shoulder to shoulder with shop and office workers from Memorial Auditorium to the capitol and back again. Unionists of white, black and Indian origin—about 20 percent were Negroes—took part in the march and in meetings with state officials and private employers.

The North Carolina AFL-CIO and the state Building & Construction Trades Council sponsored the march to protest the importation of non-union labor to construct more than $681 million in new facilities for the Carolina Power & Light Co., the state's biggest public utility.

From all over the state, workers converged on Fayetteville St. for the demonstration. Many of them bore signs demanding, "Jobs—We Want Jobs—We Want Union Jobs."

Men and women, some carrying children and pushing baby carriages, lined up for nearly a mile behind the march leaders. Pausing before the power company's headquarters, the demonstrators pushed on to fill the four-block parklike setting of the capitol.

Thousands of spectators lined the streets and waved from windows. Some returned the V-for-victory sign, many applauded the signs and posters carried by the marchers.

One union committee met with power company spokesmen, another presented a resolution to an aide of Gov. Robert W. Scott (D) calling on Scott to use the state's influence to prevent destruction of union-won standards.

Carolina P & L recently awarded construction contracts in Asheville, Wilmington, Roxboro, Lumberton and Brunswick county to Brown & Root Construction Co., Texas builders accused of discrimination against unions. A company spokesman told newsmen it will employ workers "without regard to whether they are members of any union."

March leaders included Presidents Wilbur Hobby of the state AFL-CIO and Willie S. Hayes of the building trades council; Norman Hill of the A. Philip Randolph Institute; Robert Shadix, southern states director for the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.; Al Kehrer of the federation's Dept. of Civil Rights, and Alan Kistler, assistant director of organization.

Library Dedicated At IUE Headquarters

The Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers dedicated a library and study in its Washington, D.C., headquarters as a memorial to the late Sen. Robert F. Kennedy and the Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) joined IUE officers and executive board members in the ceremony. Kennedy in person and Mrs. Coretta King, widow of the slain civil rights leader, in a letter called the lounge a "fitting memorial" to men who worked for justice and full equality.

Battle for Consumers:

Texas Labor Helps Ease Tax Package

Austin, Tex.—After a five-week battle, the Texas legislature passed a tax bill with almost equal stress on consumer, business and luxury taxes.

"It wasn't what we wanted," Pres. H. S. Hank Brown of the Texas AFL-CIO, said. "But when we look back five weeks it was a whole lot better than we had expected."

Just over a month ago, the state's House passed a tax aimed totally at the consumer and the Senate came back with an 82 percent consumer tax package. The governor's recommendations had been for consumers to pay 90 percent of the additional $350 million the state needed for state employe and teacher pay raises, as well as construction of several new universities, medical schools and dental colleges.

The State AFL-CIO introduced a new technique into its lobbying activities in the tax fight — a 30-minute television special.

First, the state federation urged a group of liberal senators and House members to form the Texans for Tax Reform to focus opposition to the heavy consumer taxes that had been proposed.

Then, the United Labor Legislative Committee and the Texas AFL-CIO helped raise financing for the TV special, which was shown statewide.

The Austin office of Western Union was swamped with wires to senators and representatives protesting the proposed consumer tax package. Western Union's office manager said, "The response was the largest to any legislative issue that I can remember."

But the business lobby had already prepared another tax package for the legislature to consider. It would have extended the state's sales tax to food and farm machinery. This bill came up first in the Senate and was labeled a "bread tax" in a 30-hour filibuster by liberals. This, plus the TV special which had warned the public that a food tax might be next, brought a strong public outcry.

The "bread tax" passed the Senate anyway 15-14, but was defeated in the House 144-0.

From that point the business lobby was on the run.

After passage of the final tax package, which increased the limited sales tax by one-fourth of 1 percent to 3.25 percent, Harry Hubbard, Texas AFL-CIO legislative director, said:

"We had two runs with our corporate profits tax plan, but only got about a third of the votes in both houses. There's going to have to be some changes in the legislature before we pass it."

Texas has neither a corporate profits tax or personal income tax, and relies heavily on its sales tax for revenue. The final tax package also boosted rates on corporate franchises, cigarettes and liquor.

In the regular session of the legislature, several pieces of legislation supported by the Texas AFL-CIO were passed, including:

- A 40 percent increase in workmen's compensation benefits.
- A prevailing wage reform.
- The state's first minimum wage law.
- A pay increase for fire fighters.
- A law requiring that suits for injunctions against unions in labor disputes be filed in courts in the districts where the alleged infractions occur.
- A law to allow citizens to sue state agencies and subdivisions for damages caused by negligence.

The Texas AFL-CIO helped kill legislation that would have allowed cities and other subdivisions to issue industrial park bonds. Also opposed, and killed, was legislation to allow small loan companies to raise interest rates by 50 percent.

The AFL-CIO failed to win a law guaranteeing the rights of state, city and county employes to bargain collectively, but did win passage of a bill to allow cities to deduct union dues.

IUE Cites Profit Factor In Westinghouse Talks

Pittsburgh—Westinghouse Electric Corp. enjoys the "best economic position in its history" and therefore can "repay its employes for the patience, understanding and sacrifices" they made in past years, Pres. Paul Jennings of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers said in opening 1969 contract talks.

Committees representing the IUE and management will resume negotiations Sept. 23 on a new national agreement covering 40,000 employes under IUE contracts. Negotiations with the General Electric Co. opened in August.

Included on the IUE committee are members of nine other AFL-CIO unions and two unaffiliated unions that coordinate their bargaining activities—a device for the exchange of information that the courts have ruled is lawful.

Westinghouse issued a statement saying it was "not in any way accepting coalition bargaining, nor are we waiving the right to object later on." Also it offered to work with IUE in negotiating a "good settlement."

Jennings pointed out at the first meeting that a peaceful settlement can be reached if management responds promptly to each proposal so that the negotiators can "work together to reconcile" any differences.

No specific wage increase was mentioned, but Jennings said the IUE wants a substantial boost based on living cost rises in the past three years, rising worker productivity and settlements in other U.S. industries.

Living costs have risen by 12 percent since 1966 and by 23.5 percent since 1960, he said, "completely eroding all wage increases in that period." Jennings declared Westinghouse profits after taxes rose about 13 percent from 1966 to 1968 and that to this date in 1969, they have climbed 7 percent over last year's profits.

IUE also is seeking other contract improvements including a minimum pension payment of $7.50 a month times years of service, a shorter workweek and a full union shop.

Urges Rejection:

Meany Denounces Haynsworth As 'Unfit' for High Court Seat

an anti-union employer in a local environment hostile to unionism."

In sharp contrast, Meany noted, Haynsworth has shown himself to be "instinctively sympathetic with the problems of employers, including rabidly anti-union ones."

On the ethics issue, Meany traced Haynsworth's controversial role in the case that involved the closing of the Darlington, S.C., textile mill by the Deering Milliken chain after workers had voted for union representation.

To start with, Meany said, Haynsworth should have disqualified himself because his law firm—at the time he was its senior partner—had been counsel for a Deering Milliken mill as well as other textile companies.

But Haynsworth had an even more immediate conflict, since he was a director and a major stockholder in a vending machine firm doing a $100,000-a-year business with Deering Milliken mills at the same time he sat as a judge in the case.

"We submit that Judge Haynsworth lacks the ethical sensitivity a Supreme Court justice should have," Meany told the committee.

"He sat on a case involving an old client. He had a large interest in a concern which was doing business with that client, and was soliciting more business.

"He did not tell the union of these interests, and he did not disqualify himself."

Meany testified after Haynsworth had spent two days on the witness stand, first questioned gently and flatteringly by the conservative southerners who hold seniority on the Judiciary Committee, later more searchingly by younger senators. He will be called back to the stand. Committee Chairman James O. Eastland (D-Miss.) said, after other scheduled witnesses have testified.

He was introduced in glowing terms by the two South Carolina senators. Republican Strom Thurmond praised his "balanced" viewpoint as a judge. Democrat Ernest F. Hollings, who said he had suggested Haynsworth's nomination to Pres. Nixon, denounced "special interest groups" for probing Haynsworth's background in an effort to embarrass him. He said Haynsworth's business relationship with Deering Milliken was "remote . . . rather than substantial."

At the prompting of senators such as John L. McClellan (D-Ark.) and Sam J. Ervin, Jr. (D-N.C.), Haynsworth readily agreed that he felt there was no conflict of interest involved in his actions in the Deering Milliken case.

His decision in the case received strong support from Ervin who, although in the Senate at the time, argued the case for Deering Milliken and its Darlington subsidiary before the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court in effect rejected Haynsworth's viewpoint on a key issue. It said the workers in the closed plant were entitled to jobs and reinstatement if the purpose of the shutdown was to discourage workers in other Deering Milliken plants from joining unions. The National Labor Relations Board subsequently found that to be the case.

Later, Ervin tried to reargue the case for the Darlington management with Meany. Isn't it a fact, he suggested, that Darlington had "a very rocky road financially" when it decided to close down rather than bargain with a union.

"I don't know about that," Meany retorted. "But I do know the men who worked for Darlington had a very rocky road."

Ervin had no better success with Thomas E. Harris, the AFL-CIO associate general counsel. He gave a lengthy summary of one of Haynsworth's labor case decisions that was overturned by the Supreme Court and asked Harris whether that wasn't an accurate summary of the case.

"It's not even a remotely accurate description," Harris told the senator.

Haynsworth acknowledged that he made a profit of well over $400,000 on an initial investment of a few thousand dollars when he eventually sold his holdings in the vending machine firm. He also disclosed to the Senate committee that he presently has stock valued at nearly $1 million in other corporations. The list includes textile firms with rabid union-busting records such as J. P. Stevens & Co. Haynsworth said he did disqualify himself from sitting in J. P. Stevens cases because of his stock holdings.

While stock holdings by judges aren't barred by law, one of the Canons of Judicial Ethics of the American Bar Association declares:

"A judge should abstain from making personal investments in enterprises which are apt to be involved in litigation in the courts; and, after his accession to the bench, he should not retain such investment previously made longer than a period sufficient to enable him to dispose of them without serious loss."

Prodded by Sen. Birch Bayh (D-Ind.) about the apparent conflict between his extensive stock holdings and the ethics canon, Haynsworth said he thought the canon was intended to keep trial judges from investing in companies likely to be sued frequently rather than to appellate judges.

A new conflict of interest challenge emerged after Haynsworth left the stand. The committee called as a witness an Arizona lawyer who said Haynsworth did not act unethically in taking part in the Deering Milliken case. He would be obliged to disqualify himself only if he owned stock in a company which was a direct party to the case, the witness said.

Bayh then noted that Haynsworth's financial statement showed that he owned 1,000 shares of the Brunswick Corp. Yet he took part last year in judging a case involving the Brunswick firm in which he voted to uphold the company.

Haynsworth's account of his connections with the Carolina Vend-A-Matic Corp. indicate that he also served as a trustee of a pension fund. But a Chicago Daily News story reported that the plan did not file a report with the Labor Dept. as is required under federal law.

Haynsworth and his supporters on the committee centered their defense in the conflict of interest allegation on the argument that the Deering Milliken accounts represented only a small part of the vending machine's profits and that Haynsworth's personal stake in the business was insignificantly small.

Besides, they argued, he had been "cleared" of any impropriety in the case in 1964 and there was a letter from the late Robert F. Kennedy, then the Attorney General, to that effect.

Sen. Edward F. Kennedy angrily retorted that the letter did not deal with the conflict of interest issue.

Meany, in his testimony, charged that the White House had sought to mute criticism of Haynsworth when it announced his nomination to the Supreme Court by releasing "misleading excerpts of the correspondence in the case."

He said the AFL-CIO did not lightly decide to oppose Haynsworth. It is doing so, he stressed, strictly on "the record of anti-union and anti-civil rights bias, and of improper ethics on the part of Judge Haynsworth.

"We believe the record proves him unfit to sit on the Supreme Court," Meany concluded.

LABOR CONSIDERS Judge Haynsworth "unfit to sit on the Supreme Court," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told the Senate Judiciary Committee. With him are Thomas E. Harris, left, AFL-CIO associate general counsel, and Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller.

Transit Union Pushes Exact Fare on Buses

New York—A continued drive for exact-fare regulations as a means of protecting bus drivers from crime and violence was pledged by Pres. John M. Elliott as he closed the Amalgamated Transit Union's 40th biennial convention here.

Under the plan, passengers must have the exact fare either in tokens or cash when boarding transit vehicles.

"The ATU sponsored and established the exact fare plan as the only possible answer to the violence being inflicted upon our operating membership," Elliott told delegates.

He was optimistic about ATU efforts to obtain contract improvements in the year ahead and noted that its New York City membership included "the highest paid urban transit drivers in the world."

"Our Greyhound and Trailways drivers throughout the United States and Canada are the highest paid over-the-road transit drivers in the world," he added.

Elliott stressed, however, that vacation provisions, pension plans, and health and welfare plans "leave much to be desired on far too many of our properties."

The union took action to meet problems created by the changeover of some city transit systems from private to public ownership. The per capita dues payment was increased from $2.40 to $2.65 a month, and the ATU indicated that some of the increased revenue will be spent to offer professional assistance to divisions faced with changeover arrangements.

Under the Transportation Act of 1964, cities may apply for federal financial assistance in expanding or improving public transportation systems. Unions are permitted to scrutinize applications for funds under the act and see to it that workers' rights are protected.

The convention voted to increase weekly strike benefits for members from $25 to $35.

The incumbent officers were reelected and three new vice presidents were added to fill vacancies. They are John F. Healy, Springfield, Mass.; James Lasala, New Brunswick, N.J.; and Ivey G. Smith, Raleigh, N.C.

The union voted to hold its 1971 convention in Las Vegas, Nev.

Justice Dept. Ignores Standard In Clearing Haynsworth of Charge

A Supreme Court decision last year set a conflict of interest standard that bears directly on the dispute over the judicial ethics of Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr.

An AFL-CIO legal analysis cited the decision in response to a Justice Dept. letter absolving Haynsworth of impropriety in an important labor case involving the Deering Milliken textile chain.

The Justice Dept. said there was no reason for Haynsworth to disqualify himself because a company he served as an officer and director did a $100,000-a-year business with Deering Milliken textile plants. The Justice Dept. letter did not comment on the fact that Haynsworth did not disclose his business connection when the case was before his court.

Two Supreme Court decisions were quoted by the AFL-CIO in its refutation of the Justice Dept. position.

One stressed that even if there is no actual bias on the part of a judge, "justice must satisfy the appearance of justice."

In the other decision, cited as a close parallel to the Haynsworth case, the Supreme Court overturned an arbitration award because the arbitrator had occasional business dealings with one of the parties to the case.

These amounted to only $12,000 in engineering consultant fees over a period of four or five years—a considerably smaller amount than the dollar involvement of Haynsworth's Carolina Vend-A-Matic Corp. with Deering Milliken plants.

But the Supreme Court—to which Haynsworth has been nominated—set aside the award because the arbitrator had not followed "the simple requirement that arbitrators disclose to the parties any dealings that might create an impression of possible bias."

By ignoring this pertinent decision, the AFL-CIO charged, the Justice Dept. letter is exposed not as "an even-handed statement of the law" but as a defense of Haynsworth "proceeding from the assumption that it is sufficient for a judge's actions to meet the rough and ready standard of the marketplace" even if it falls short of the higher standards of judicial ethics.

And as for the purported ignorance of Deering Milliken officials of Haynsworth's connections with the vending machine firm and of the judge's claimed uninvolvement in the details of the business, the AFL-CIO commented:

"In light of the facts that the general manager of Carolina Vend-A-Matic was a former official of Judson Mill, a Deering Milliken operation which utilized the services of Judge Haynsworth's law firm; that Judge Haynsworth's wife was the secretary of the company; and that the judge was listed as its first vice president and a director, these statements strain belief."

Elliot Bredhoff, general counsel for the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., also cited the 1968 Supreme Court decision as directly applicable to the Haynsworth case.

In testimony prepared for the Senate Judicidary Committee, he noted that Haynsworth's law firm at the time he was still the senior partner, had represented a major Deering Milliken mill.

"Solely on the basis of this," Bredhoff suggested, "Judge Haynsworth should have disqualified himself."

By contrast, Bredhoff noted that his own former senior law partner, Arthur J. Goldberg, disqualified himself from the very same case when it reached the Supreme Court.

The reason that Goldberg—then a Supreme Court justice—did not take part in the case, Bredhoff said, is that "many years before, his former law firm had handled unrelated litigation for the Textile Workers Union," one of the parties to the case.

Top Officials Set to Speak At Convention

didate on the Democratic ticket endorsed by the AFL-CIO, will be a major speaker, Meany said.

Others who have accepted invitations are J. Curtis Counts, director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service and Col. Edwin E. Aldrin, Jr., who was the second man to land on the moon.

J. Milton Patrick, national commander of the American Legion, declined the invitation due to a conflict in dates, Meany said.

The Eighth Constitutional Convention of the AFL-CIO will open Oct. 2 in the Traymore Hotel in Atlantic City. It will be preceded by conventions of AFL-CIO constitutional departments: the Building & Construction Trades, Sept. 22-24; Industrial Union, Sept. 25-26; Metal Trades, Sept. 25-26; Maritime Trades Sept. 29-Oct. 1; Union Label, Sept. 29-30; Intl. Labor Press Association, Sept. 28-Oct. 1. The National Auxiliaries convention will be held Oct. 4-8.

Amendment to Constitution:

Direct Election Plan Approved by House

portion to the amount of the popular vote received.

But it too, as the AFL-CIO pointed out, could result in the election of a candidate who came out second in the nationwide tally.

The proportional plan was beaten, 179-147, and other substitutes were similarly rejected.

The final passage vote approved intact the proposal drafted by a big bipartisan majority of the House Judiciary Committee. It would:

- Assure the election of the candidates for President and Vice President with the most votes nationwide if the winning ticket received at least 40 percent of the popular vote.
- Provide for the runoff election between the two top slates if no presidential ticket received at least 40 percent of the popular vote.

On the eve of the House action, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller had written each House member urging approval of "this long overdue reform of our present antiquated electoral college system."

Before taking up the constitutional amendment proposal, the House rushed through a bill aimed at restoring the flow of bank loans to students who need the money to attend college.

Nearly all banks had stopped making student loans because the 7 percent interest ceiling on the government-guaranteed loans was below the return banks could get from other customers.

The House bill authorizes a government subsidy of up to 3 percent to banks which make student loans —in effect making the interest rate 10 percent, even though students would continue to pay the lower rate.

The chief controversy was procedural. The bill was brought up under a no-amendment suspension of the rules procedure which required a two-thirds vote for passage. The purpose of this was to block efforts to tie controversial penalties for student "rioters" to the legislation.

Despite efforts by conservatives to defeat the bill and force it to be resubmitted under an open-to-amendment rule, the legislation easily passed, 322-60. The Senate has passed a bill with similar provisions, but also dealing with other student loan matters.

The AFL-CIO, which is allied with conservation and consumer groups in a Citizens' Crusade for Clean Water, joined with a bipartisan group of congressmen in pressing for increased appropriations for anti-pollution facilities.

The first effort was expected to be made in the Appropriations Committee and if the Administration's budget request is not substantially increased in committee, a major floor battle is likely.

In a letter to all House members, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller expressed the federation's enthusiastic support of the effort to increase the funds.

House Democrats opened their first concerted attack on the Nixon Administration, charging in a caucus resolution that it has been marked by too much talk and too little action.

The resolution noted that the President has asked for a variety of new social programs in messages to Congress, but the Administration has submitted very few bills to carry out the programs.

The caucus promised to develop and press for passage of a Democratic legislative program, based on the party's 1968 platform.

As the Senate Finance Committee plowed along with its lengthy hearings on tax reform legislation, Democratic and Republican leaders clashed on when the bill should be brought to the floor.

Senate Republican Policy Committee Chairman Gordon Allott (Colo.) said it would be "impossible" to bring a tax bill to the floor before January.

Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (D-Mont.) retorted that the Finance Committee had pledged to complete its work by Oct. 31 and declared: "A promise was made, and a promise will be kept."

Neurologist Wins Meany Fellowship

Dr. Paul F. Larson, an instructor in neurology on leave from Louisiana State University, received the George Meany Postdoctoral Fellowship for a second year from the Muscular Dystrophy Associations of America.

The fellowship was established in Meany's name in recognition of his efforts to stimulate trade union support in the fight against dystrophy. It enables outstanding young scientists to take advanced training.

Dr. Larson is continuing studies in electromicroscopy at the Regional Neurological Center in Newcastle-upon-Tyne, England.

Percy Sutton; Miss Holly Schmidt, Muscular Dystrophy poster child and Little Miss Union Maid; Charles J. Garrahan, president of the Union Label & Service Trades Council and vice president of the Clothing Workers.

Labor Asks Stronger Curbs on Job Bias

The federal Equal Employment Opportunity Commission should be given power to enforce the law against job discrimination, the AFL-CIO told a Senate Labor subcommittee.

Thomas E. Harris, the federation's associate general counsel, endorsed legislation that would give the EEOC the same type of authority the National Labor Relations Board has in labor cases.
